Other two receipts in same form, also for money dated same day, each for the sum of 1757 79-100, signed 'Wm. W. Hart, guardian of Argyle Farmer' and 'Wm. W. Hart, guardian of James Farmer," with the other two notes sued on, and other notes, and interest computed on all amounting to the sum of $3515 59, which was equally divided to make the last mentioned receipts—endorsed thereon as account rendered.

Plaintiff also gave in evidence a statement marked F. as follows, to wit:

1841. Amounts of sale and hire of the land and negroes belonging to the estate of John Farmer, dec.: 337

Jan. 1.	Sale of land to W. W. Hart,	$4,800 00

"This is a true statement of the sale and hire of the land and negroes of the estate of John Farmer, dec., this March 9th, 1841.

ARCHER BURNEY, Guardian."

Sworn to, March 17th, 1841, before D. McRaney, Clerk, and filed in his office.

Also statement of Wm. W. Hart, guardian, from which statement the following is extracted, as referring to this cause:

"Wm. W. Hart, guardian in account with James, Argyle and Rufus Farmer:

Received of W. D. Moseley, executor of A. Burney, dec., in Cash,	$ 40 00
In notes and accounts,	3,463 00"

"The above is as near correct as I can at this time make it, being very sick. W. W. HART, Guardian."

Some debits then follow for negro hire, not needful to be stated here, also signed by Hart, guardian. To which is appended the following:

"I charge the guardian, as per account stated above, Cash,	40 00

Notes and accounts,	3,463 00
Hire of negroes for 1843,	250 00
	$3,753 00"

"The credits asked are not sustained by vouchers, and are suspended. June 5, 1842. J. E. BROOME, Judge Leon C. C."

The plaintiff then gave in evidence certified copies of three guardian bonds of Patrick Smith, dated 23d day of December, 1843.—One as guardian of Argyle Farmer, another as guardian of James Farmer, and a third as guardian of Rufus Farmer, all minors. Also a guardian bond of Arthur Burney, dated 24th November, 1843, as guardian for Susannah Farmer, Edward Farmer, James Farmer, 338
Argyle Farmer and Rufus Farmer, minors, and five in number. Also another bond of said Burney for the sum of ten thousand dollars, dated 14th February, 1840, conditioned to make a faithful and legal application of the proceeds of the sale of the real estate of the infant children of John Farmer, dec. Also the petition of Arthur Burney for leave to sell said real estate—representing it to be for the interest of his wards. And the order of the Judge of the County Court thereon, in these words, to wit:

"A bond having been filed by Arthur Burney, Sen., and his securities, satisfactory to the court, it is therefore ordered by the court, that on the first day of May, in the year 1840, Arthur Burney, Sen., guardian of the children of John Farmer, sell to the highest bidder the lands described in this petition aforesaid on the following terms: 1st. Notice to be given for two months previous, of the time and place and terms of sale. 2d. The terms shall be one-fifth of the purchase money payable on the 1st of January, 1841. One-fifth January, 1842,—and the balance in three equal annual instalments; the purchaser to give a joint and several bond, with three securities. The bond shall bear interest from this date; the interest shall be paid yearly. It is further ordered, that if it appear to the said Arthur Burney, Sen., that William W. Hart, in right of his wife, is entitled to one-fifth of said land, that then if the said William W. Hart and wife will execute an assignment of their rights, titles and interest to the same to the purchaser, the said Arthur Burney shall deliver over to W. W. Hart the bond which shall become due on January, 1841.

[SIGNED.] W. M. GIBSON, Judge."

Also an order dated December 13th, 1842, appointing Wm. W. Hart guardian of the estate of James Farmer, aged 12 or 13 years and his younger brothers, Argyle Farmer and Rufus Farmer, all children of John Farmer, dec., on his entering into bond, &c. All three guardian bonds of the said Wm. W. Hart, in the sum and with the securities named by the court dated 16th September, 1842. One as guardian of James Farmer, another as guardian of Rufus Farmer, and a third as guardian of Argyle Farmer. And here the Plaintiff rested his case.

The defendant offered Tom Peter Chaires as a witness. But plaintiff's counsel objected to his competency on the ground of 339 interest and relied on the deposition of Susan Murray and after proofs to prove that interest; which objection, after arguments, the court sustained, and excluded the witness. To which ruling of the court defendant by his counsel excepted.

Thomas Lang called by defendant, proved that part of the land mortgaged by Hart to Williams and Chaires, had been allotted as dower to Hart's widow, now Mrs. Murray the witness in this case. That he is administrator on Hart's estate having succeeded the Sheriff who acted sometimes ex virtute officii. That the estate of Hart is insolvent. Witness said that the notes sued on had never been in the possession of the Sheriff nor in possession of witness. That he had other notes in his possession on which the name of Hart remained, and from which the names of sureties had been clipped, which had been satisfied. That these notes were not the only papers in Hart's possession at the time of his death, which witness was entitled to possess, and which had been taken by some person without authority. That he knew of his own knowledge a great many other papers had been so taken.

David S. Walker called by defendant, proved that in the conversation he had with Governor Moseley, plaintiff in this case, said Moseley told witness that he, as executor of Arthur Burney, became possessed of the three notes upon which this suit is brought—that after William W. Hart was appointed guardian, he Moseley, as executor of A. Burney, delivered to said Hart, guardian as aforesaid, he having first exhibited his letters of guardianship, and his bond as guardian, which Moseley regarded as sufficient, the said notes, and took therefor the receipts of said Hart, as for so much cash—that he considered himself as then parting with all claim and interest which he, as executor aforesaid, had in or to said notes—that he had always regarded the transaction in that light, and that consequently, this suit to recover the amount of said notes in his name, for the use of Patrick Smith, guardian, &c., was instituted without his knowledge or consent—that if witness would let him know when the trial should come on, he would attend and state to the court and Jury what he had then stated to witness. Witness further stated, that a day or two before the trial took place, Gov. Moseley was called, unexpectedly, on official business, to Pensacola, and that was the reason why the witness was called upon by the defendant to testify to the above facts, instead of the Governor himself

This was the evidence offered

340 After counsel had been heard on both sides, the counsel for defendant moved the court to instruct the jury as follows:

1st. That the notes sued on were the property of Arthur Burney at the time of his death, and the legal title to the same passed to Moseley, his representative, who alone had the right to sue on the same.

2d. That if they believed from the evidence that Moseley, as representative of Burney, voluntarily and without fraud, delivered up the notes in question to William W. Hart, the principal obligor in the same, in consideration of the receipts offered in evidence, it operated as a divestiture of all title out of Moseley; and therefore, that this suit cannot be maintained in his name.

3d. That if the Jury believe from the evidence, that William D Moseley, executor of Burney, the payee of these notes, delivered them to William W. Hart, the principal obligor, the defendant Williams was released thereby.

4th. That if the Jury believe from the evidence, that William D. Moseley, executor of Arthur Burney, deceased, agreed, in consideration of a recepit to him, as executor, of so much money as they called for, to deliver up, and did so deliver up said notes to Wm. W. Hart, the principal obligor, the same amounted to a release of the obligors thereto, and annulled and extinguished the notes.

5th. That if Wm. W. Hart, the principal obligor, came lawfully into possession of these notes, all liability on them, as securities, was extinguished, and Hart became liable, as guardian, for the money, as though the same had been paid to him in cash

6th. That if Hart obtained the possession of these notes lawfully, he had a perfect right to destroy the same, and to cut off the names of his securities.

7th. That Hart's receipts to Moseley, offered in evidence by plaintiff, constitute perfect evidence of the payment of these notes by the principal obligor to the legal holder.

8th. That if the court shall charge the Jury, that the legal title to these notes did not pass to Moseley, Burney's representative, then and in that case, the court is requested to charge the Jury, that this suit cannot be maintained in his name, as instructed, in lieu of 1st instruction.

9th. That a suit cannot be maintained at law, in the name of any person, except the legal owner.

10th. That in the event of a verdict for plaintiff, he is only entitled to recover so much as "current Florida money" is proved to 341 be worth in specie at the time the notes fall due, and that this proof lies upon the plaintiff.

11th. If the jury believe, from the evidence produced by the plaintiff, that Moseley is the executor, and not the administrator, of A. Burney, deceased, then he cannot maintain this action as administrator.

All of which the court refused to give, but gave instead thereof, the following instruction, to wit:

1st. Instead of 1st instruction asked by defendant's counsel, the court instructs the jury, that the notes sued on in this action, were the trust property of Arthur Burney, as guardian of the infant heirs of John Farmer, deceased, at the time of said Burney's death; and that the legal title to the same passed to his administrator or executor, Moseley, in like character and effect in law, as it existed in his intestate, the said Moseley alone having the right to sue on the same.

2d. In lieu of the 4th instruction, the court instructs the jury, that if they believe from the evidence, that Moseley, executor of Burney, received from Wm. W. Hart the amount of the notes receipted for, in money, then the said notes, to the amount paid in money, were and are discharged.

3d. The court further instructed the jury, that the mere act of Wm. W. Hart, cutting the names of R. W. Williams, defendant, from the promissory note in question, cannot in any wise affect his liability, as one of the makers of said note; that if said note were void, said act was unnecessary in order to cancel it. And that if it were valid and binding in the hands of said Hart, he could not invalidate it, or release said Williams, by cutting off his name, or that of T. P. Chaires, as aforesaid; and that the jury should apply the evidence, under this and the other instructions of the court.

To which said several rulings and opinions of the court, the defendant, by his counsel, excepted.

It is also admitted by the plaintiff, that the court instructed the jury, that if they shall find for the plaintiff, that they must, in assessing the damages, find the same amount as if the notes were payable in money, instead of "current Florida" money. And it is admitted by the defendant, that Lang testified that he became administrator of Hart, on the day of A. D. These admissions to be part and parcel of the Bill of Exceptions, to the 342 same extent as if the same were signed by the presiding judge.

JAMES T. ARCHER,
for plaintiff,
LONG & WALKER,
Attorneys for defendant.

The errors assigned are as follows:

1. The Circuit Court erred, in refusing to allow the defendant below to examine Tom Peter Chaires as a witness in this cause, or even to swear said Chaires as a witness.

2. The Court erred, in refusing to allow Thomas Lang to answer the question propounded to him, to which exception was taken, as appears from the bill of exceptions in this cause.

3. The Court erred, in refusing to give each of the instructions to the Jury, asked by the counsel of defendant below, numbered in the bill of exceptions from one to eleven, inclusive.

4. The Court erred, in each of its instructions to the Jury, set forth in the bill of exceptions, from one to three, inclusive.

5. The Court erred, in trying this cause, and pronouncing judgment in the same, on the twenty-third day of May, A. D. one thousand, eight hundred and forty-six, as set forth in said record,—the said 23d day of May, A. D. 1846, not being embraced within either of the terms of the Leon Circuit Court, as established by law.

LONG & WALKER,
Atty's for Appellant

We will for the present pass over the first and second assignment of errors in this record, and consider the third and fourth. This brings before us the instructions asked by defendant below and refused, and also those which were given by the court. And the first enquiry necessary to be made is, who are John Farmer's heirs? By reference to the bond executed by Arthur Burney, it will be seen they are Susannah Farmer, Edward Farmer, James Farmer, Argyle Farmer, and Rufus Farmer. Five minors and infant children of John Farmer, deceased

2d. What interest had Arthur Burney, guardian, in the notes sued on at the time of his death?

It is admitted on all sides, and indeed is too plain to be denied, he was the legal holder and had the right to sue on them when past due. But they were made payable to "Arthur Burney, guardian of the heirs of John Farmer, deceased," and were not negotiable

343 It is true the words guardian, &c., may be considered as mere descriptio personam, and do not necessarily include the idea that Burney took and held the notes as guardian. But the consideration on which the notes was given is explained by the testimony of Mrs. Murray. It was for the sale of the lands belonging to the five children and heirs of John Farmer, deceased, and if Burney strictly pursued his authority to sell, would vest the equity in the proceeds of the notes in his wards unless he has clearly shewn an election otherwise.

Did Burney pursue his authority for selling the lands of his wards? By reference to the order of the County Court it will be seen, 1st. He was to give notice for two months previous of the time, place and terms of sale. It does not appear by the record whether he did or did not; it is not shewn and cannot be inferred.

2. The sale was ordered to be on the first day of May, 1840.—It occurred on the first day of January, 1841.

3d. The terms were five annual and equal instalments of the purchase money, the first on the first of January, 1841, and yearly thereafter. The purchaser to give joint and several bonds with three securities. He gave joint and several promissory notes with two securities.

4th. The bonds were to bear interest from the day of sale (1st of May, 1840.) The notes bear interest from the 2d of January, 1841

5th. The interest to be paid yearly. By the notes it is payable when they respectively become due.

6th. The bonds were to be payable in money. The notes made payable in current Florida money.

It will be apparent to every one that Burney repeatedly, and in some respects materially, departed from his authority to sell. The difference in the value of the fund arising from the sale of the land was on the 1st of January, 1845, $542 62—is was so much less valuable than if the sale had taken place when directed, and interest had been payable as directed, by reason of the non-observance of the terms. But Burney never reported the notes to the court as he took them, nor the securities he had taken to secure their payment. On the contrary he merely reported to the court the sale of the lands, which is offered in evidence by the plaintiff, and hereinbefore set ou' As much as it as here material may be correctly stated thus:

344 "1841, January 1st. Amount of sale of land belonging to the estate of John Farmer, deceased.

"Sale of land to W. W. Hart, 4,800 00

"This is a true statement."

[SIGNED] "ARTHUR BURNEY, Guardian."

Which was sworn to March 17th, 1841, before the Clerk of Leon County Court, and filed in his office.

An enquiry naturally presents itself, what is the legal effect and import this statement, and return made by Arthur Burney, guardian, to the County Court? No exhibit of bonds as required by the order of court, nor of the notes taken, no mention of the securities or their number—nothing to show any departure from the order requiring the payment of interest annually—nor any effort to obtain from the court an approval of his actings and doing in the premises. It must be considered an admission that he as guardian had in his possession $4,800 00 for the sale of the land, to bear interest according to law, and to be distributed among his five wards as they should respectively arrive at lawful age. He by his return bound himself as guardian, as fully for the purchase money arising from sale of the lands as he did for the hire of the negroes. Not having been ordered by the County Court (so far as appears) to put out this money at interest upon mortgage security as directed by the statute, see Thomp. Dig. p. 207, sec. 2, it results he retained it by leave of the court, and bound himself to pay interest for it according to law.—He upon his own petition obtained the order of court to sell those lands. He stood before the court in the double position of quasi commissioner to sell the lands, and of guardian to the five heirs.—He does not as commissioner report what he has done, but as guardian what he has in possession. His authority to sell was not pursued, but departed from, and therefore cannot bind his wards. But his statemnt of having sold the land to W. W. Hart for $4,800 binds him, binds his securities, and binds Moseley his legal representative. Having elected merely to report the amount of the sale and being bound thereby as guardian—the notes taken to secure the purchase money, became his, not only legally but equitably.—The day he charged himself on the record as guardian with the amount of the sale, all equity in the notes taken to secure payment vested in him absolutely.

Moreover, Burney paid the share of one of the heirs to W. W.

R. W. Williams, Appellant, vs. W. D. Moseley for the use of P. Smith, Appellee.

Hart, her husband, and thereby extinguished the interest, which she 345
(Susan Farmer) had in the notes, so that eo nomine "heirs of John Farmer, deceased, could not be the claimants in equity of the notes or of their proceeds, his guardianship of her interests was surrendered to Hart her husband. But Burney was as appears by the testimony adduced and made a part of the record of this case, at the time of his death guardian of the four other heirs of John Farmer, deceased, to wit: of Edward Farmer, and of the three for whom after his death Wm. W. Hart was appointed guardian, and for whom after his death Patrick Smith gave bonds as guardian.—Burney having in his life time paid and settled the interest and claim of one of the heirs of John Farmer, deceased, it is not even plausible, that he was the mere legal holder of notes payable to "Arthur Burney, guardian of the heirs of John Farmer, deceased," for the use of the remaining four heirs, and less plausible when a less number claim—suppose Burney in his life time had paid four of them and but one remained to be paid, might not that one with equal propriety claim the equity of these notes, as the three for whom Patrick Smith has given bond as guardian. If the plaintiff succeeds in this case, it is for his own benefit or for the use of Patrick Smith, or for the use of the heirs of John Farmer, deceased. If for the use of the heirs of John Farmer, deceased, it will be unjust because one of them has received her share. If for the use of Patrick Smith he has neither legal or equitable claim to it. If for the benefit of the plaintiff Moseley, he must shew a strict legal right.

The truth is, this suit is brought wrong to enure to the benefit of the heirs of John Farmer or any of them—if intended for the benefit of the wards of Patrick Smith, and if they have a joint interest, it should have been, James and Argyle, and Rufus Farmer, by their next friend Patrick Smith, 4 J. J. Marshal, 389. Thomp. Dig., 320, sec. 5. If their interests are several their suits should have been.

The designation of Patrick Smith, guardian of the heirs of John Farmer, deceased, is not supported by the proofs on the record. There are five of them, he has given bonds as guardian for but three—and unless his claim is for his own use (and of that there is no pretence) he has neither legal or equitable standing in the case.

Waiving for the present the legal liability which Burney in his life time had incurred by binding himself and his securities for the amount of the purchase money and interest accruing on the sale of the lands belonging to Farmer's heirs—let us proceed to the 346 time of his death and consider what follows that event. Moseley the plaintiff in this suit, took letters testamentary under his will and consequently became his legal representative. He examined the condition of affairs, made himself acquainted with Burney's liability as guardian of the heirs of John Farmer, saw that he was bound on two bonds, one in the penalty of $5000, and another in the penalty of $10,000, conditioned for a faithful application of the proceeds of the sale of the lands, and for paying the heirs as they respectively attained lawful age. Saw that his testator had paid Hart, the husband of Susan, her share—and that there remained four to settle with. Saw that Hart had been appointed guardian of three of them. Examined his appointment and his bonds, and considered them good. Saw the return his testator had made to the County Court, and considered his estate bound for the amount. And being so bound that the notes sued on belonged to his estate. He knew moreover that the receipts of the newly appointed guardian for any debts, rents, or sums of money belonging to each of his wards would be a good discharge for his testator Burney, and effectual in law signed severally as guardian for his several wards, if he could obto full age, see Thomp. Dig., 201, sec. 6. Knowing, or believing all this, it is not difficult to suppose he would come to a settlement with Hart, strongly disposed to procure from him receipts for money, signed severally as guardian fr his several wards, if he could obtain them. That a receipt for the notes to be held for the use of John Farmer's heirs, would not suit his purpose. But if it would, Hart could not give such receipt being guardian for but three of them.

Coming to this settlement under these impressions, he, Moseley, the plaintiff in this action, wrote the receipts himself—he stated the account current on the back of them himself. He took them severally for each of Hart's wards, for money expressed to be in part payment of the amount due from Burney as guardian—and Hart signed them as guardian of the wards in each case

It is not possible to perceive what consideration was given Hart, to induce him to sign and deliver money receipts, to Moseley, executor of Burney, unless he and Moseley agreed to consider his notes due to Moseley, executor, as cash. And the account current (in the hand writing of Moseley,) on the back of the receipts, charging up these notes and the interest due on them, as part consideration-

R. W. Williams, Appellant, vs. W. D. Moseley for the use of P. Smith, Appellee.

347 for the receipts, well sustains this idea. This was at the suggestion of Moseley, he was prominent actor in shaping these receipts.—They are as he fixed them. They were filed in the Clerk's office of the county, to protect Burney's estate pro tanto against Farmer's heirs; to operate as a credit in favor of Moseley, executor, in the settlement of his accounts with the estate of Burney, his testator.—It may be added, they served the purpose of shewing the amount of Hart's liability as guardian to his three wards severally. No allegation is made of any surprise, mistake, or fraud, in obtaining these receipts—to the contrary, it was admitted all was fair and correct. But it is objected to allow these receipts to operate is to allow Hart to make testimony for himself. This is not perceived. The plaintiff offered them in testimony. He wrote them—he obtained them—he uses them against Hart to discharge Burney's estate for so much—and for the additional purpose of crediting himself with their amount as executor, in his settlement with the estate. They shew that Hart received their amount in money, which binds him and his securities to his wards. Moreover Hart is not a party to this suit, but Williams; and his, Hart's interest is equal both ways, if Williams is bound his, Hart's securities on his guardian bonds are not, if Williams is not bound they are. But in either event Hart's estate is bound. The evidence of Hart's liability to his wards as their guardian is found in his receipts to Moseley.—The evidence that Moseley parted with the notes and all interest in them to Hart is found in the account current on the back of them in Moseley's hand-writing. He did not assign them in writing, but by delivery—he did not assign for the use of John Farmer's heirs; but if for their use then severally to three of them. If he intended to deliver the notes to Hart to be kept as notes for the use of the three young Farmers why did he not take receipts to that effect? he could as easily have written such as those he did write. Or why did he enquire into the solvency of Hart's securities on his guardian bonds, but with a view to convert Hart's notes given to Burney into cash.

There is every evidence it was the intention of Hart, and the understanding of Moseley at the time of making those receipts, that he, Hart, elected thereby to bind himself as guardian for the amounts specified in the receipts? Indeed it is preposterous to suppose him bound as guardian for the amount of the receipts, and also bound for the proceeds of the notes. But if Burney's estate can have 348 credit for the amount of the receipts, and this is not controverted, Hart, and his sureties on his guardian bond are bound for the amount.

Moseley then delivered the notes sued on to Hart, the principal obligor in them, as and for payment for the receipts which Hart gave him. He considered them in that transaction, as Walker testified as so much cash, and that he parted with all claim and interest in them—and it must be they were considered as cash by both parties, or Moseley obtained receipts for money without paying it, and such a transaction would not be free from surprise, or mistake, or fraud.

Who is it that is at liberty to explain by extraneous proof a written receipt. This rule was manifestly intended to protect the maker against surprise, mistake, &c., in executing a receipt. But I apprehend no case will be found where the party protected by it or for whose use it was given has claimed the benefit of the rule especially when he wrote it himself. The receipts of Hart, made evidence by plaintiff, shew that Hart paid the notes sued on—and they were delivered to him. Other testimony of plaintiff shews that Hart while possessor, cut off the names of Chaires and Williams (the defendant,) who were his securities on these notes, as he did in other cases of his notes with sureties when he paid them—that this was done at the instance of Chaires in the case of these notes—and that the notes remained, and were in possession of Hart, at the time of his death.

How or on what consideration Moseley again became possessed of them is not shown. Counsel seemed coy in approaching this inquiry. It is not pretended that Hart's administrator ever delivered them away. He thinks himself still the legal custodiary of them—and says in his testimony "they were taken from among Hart's papers by some person having no authority." These circumstances raise a violent presumption in this case, that Moseley is not now the rightful holder of the notes, and has no legal interest in them or right to sue on them.

It was incumbent on him to repel this presumption. The record furnishes no such proof.

It is said this suit was brought for the use of Farmer's heirs, that the equitable interest attaches in them in the notes, and they have the right to elect their remedy on the notes. It has been shewn that the equity as well as the legal right was in Burney in his life time, by his election to charge himself as guardian with the 34 amount of the sale of land. It has been shown that this suit is not and cannot be for the use of Farmer's heirs.—The record shews that the three for whom Hart was guardian are yet minors. Their right of election is personal to themselves when they arrive at mature age and cannot be delegated during their minority. It has been shewn that Moseley paid these notes to Hart the principal obligor for the receipts which he obtained, and extinguished all demand which he as executor had on them, unless he may be allowed to take the receipts as for money, use them for purposes valuable to himself and his testator as money; and deny in this action having given money for them. It does seem equity, as well as law, would estop him from alleging anything to the prejudice of these receipts. An estoppel, says Lord Coke, "is where a man is concluded by his own act or acceptance to say the truth." Cited 2 Smith's L. C., 430. In this case Moseley, the executor, wrote the receipts, and induced Hart to consider his notes as money, and as payment for them. Hart signed them severally as guardian and Moseley accepted and used them as money receipts. Ought he now to be allowed to allege them to be anything else.

Mr. Justice Cowen in the case of Dezell vs. Odell, 3 Hill's Rep., 219, lays down an estoppel in pais to be "an admisison intended to influence the conduct of the man with whom the party is dealing, and actually leading him into a line of conduct, which must be prejudicial to his interest, unless the party estopped be cut off from the power of retraction."

Applying this rule which appears both lucid and just: Moseley to obtain money receipts from Hart the guardian considers his Hart's notes to Burney as cash, admission tending and intended to influence Hart to give receipts to him for money; by this admission of Moseley to Hart, he, Hart, is actually led into a line of conduct prejudicial to his interest unless Moseley be estopped the power to retract. He and his sureties on his guardian bonds are bound to his wards severally for the sums which by his receipts he acknowledges to have received. This retraction, if allowed, would bind him also to Burney's estate or to Farmer's heirs for the amount of the notes—which were the consideration in part for the receipts.

These receipts being then valid when given, and not alleged to have been executed by surprise, or mistake or fraud, but to have been fairly given and fairly received; and having been offered in evidence in this case by the plaintiff Moseley, may be considered 35 good evidence of such facts as they establish. The prominent facts established by them are, That Hart acknowledged by them the receipt as guardian of the sums of money specified in them respectively, and thereby elected to charge himself in his liability as guardian with the amount; and second, in consideration of so charging himself as guardian the notes sued on were delivered to him by Moseley as paid and discharged.

This view is supported by the return of W. W. Hart as guardian of James, Argyle and Rufus Farmer. He reports himself as having received of Wm. D. Moseley, Executor of A. Burney, dec.:

In notes and accounts,	3,463 00

And adds, "The above account as near correct as I can at this time make it, being very sick." He then accounts for the hire of certain negroes amounting to $250 00. And the Judge of the County Court enters thereon "I charge the guardian as per account stated above;" and after setting forth the items, again sums up and says $3,753 00. Thus it will be seen the judge on the return made by Hart, as guardian, charges him as such with the whole amount which he admits he had received. The return was in amount obviously incorrect; but Hart says it was as near correct as he could make it, being very sick. The proof shews he was sick in March, and died during the year; there is no date to his return. It may therefore be as true as he could make it at the time when made.—But right or wrong the Judge of the County Court considered it sufficient and proper evidence on which to charge him as guardian with the whole amount.

From the foregoing it is plain, that at the time of settlement between Hart and Moseley, Hart was debtor to Burney's estate, therefore to Moseley the representative of that estate, on sundry notes given by him to Burney, guardian of the heirs of John Farmer, dec.; and also that he was guardian of three of these heirs. That in consideration of the delivery of these notes to him, and their supposed payment, (by both parties) he gave Moseley the money receipts in evidence in this suit, and bound himself and sureties on his guardian bonds for so much money; does this amount to an extinguishment of the notes due from him as a principal debtor, and by operation of the law of retainer, render him liable as guardian?

It will be remembered these receipts shew the several sums which

R. W. Williams, Appellant, vs. W. D. Moseley for the use of P. Smith, Appellee.

351 he acknowledges to have received, as guardian, severally of his wards, and in addition to this evidence of election to hold as guardian. The County Court charges him as guardian, with the whole amount he acknowledges to have received. The evidence in both ways is sufficient to fix his indebtedness in that character. He was the person to pay and the person to receive; by operation of law when this conjunction occurs, the money is regarded as ipso facto paid. Gray vs. Brown, 1 Richardson L. R., 337. Simpkins vs. Cable, 2 Bailey R., 60. Joyner vs. Cooper, same, 199, 202-3.

The case of Gray vs. Brown above cited, was an action against the surety on a guardian bond.

The court held that when the right of receiving a fund as guardian, and the duty of paying it as trustee unite in the same person, the law presumes performance of the duty, and without further proof a surety of the guardian is liable. But the court say when the right to receive and the duty to pay absolutely concur there can be no election. Whenever, by this concurrence or by election, the retainer is established, it is no answer for the surety of the character that has received by retainer to say, that the default occurred in the other character. In that case Carroll the principal held funds as trustee which he had been directed to re-invest but had failed to do so.—He was also guardian of his cestui que trust—and the question was whether the liability fell on his sureties, on his bond as trustee, or as guardian. The court say, "If in the case before us it should be supposed, that under the bond taken by the commissioner of B. R. Carroll as trustee there was a right of action in the commissioner for the trustee's default to re-invest, or that said right of action was in the minors, suing by their next friend, it will be perceived that whatever sum may have been received in either form, would have belonged to the minors, and might have been made payable to the guardian whenever the order of the court of equity should have been made for said payment. The case would have been just as it is now if judgment or decree for the amount of his default as trustee had been obtained against B. R. Carroll, and that the chancellor had directed his retainer as guardian." The court further said, "Proof of the trustees inability to pay his debts could not prevent the presumption of retainer, for this debt may have been met, although others could not have been. Even entire destitution of means would not seem to arrest the presumption of payment, which by law results from the union of debtor and creditor in the same per-352 son." The cases of Simkins vs. Gable, 2 Bailey, 60. McDowell vs. Caldwell, 2 McCord, 304. Joyner vs. Cooper, 2 Bailey, 199. Schneill vs. Schroeder, et al., Bail Eq. Rep., 334. O'Neal vs. Hurbert, McMull.'s Equity Report 496, all seem (the court say) to regard the extinguishment of the prior debt as a necessary legal result of this union. Gray vs. Brown, 1 Rich. R., 364.

In Schneill vs. Schroeder et al., 1 Bail. Eq. Rep., 364, the court held "a debt due by an administrator to his intestates estate is assets in his hands; and if the administrator of an intestate becomes also the administrator of one of the distributees, his liability for the distributive share of the latter, in the estate of the former, attaches upon his second administration. And if he also becomes guardian of the sole distributee of his second intestate, his liability attaches upon him in the latter character, and for a default in paying over of funds in his hands, to which his ward is entitled as distributee of the first intestate, the sureties on his guardianship bond are alone responsible.

Jacob H. Boyer died intestate in 1817, leaving three children, Mrs. Schroeder, wife of John Schroeder, the defendant, Jacob F. Boyer, and Mrs. Wirtemburgh, who were the distributees of his estate. The defendant Schroeder took out letters of administration on the estate—and Schneill, the complainant, and one Herman Moore became sureties on his administration bond. Mrs. Wirtemburgh died subsequently leaving an only child, a daughter, who since intermarried with the defendant Marshburn. Schroeder also administered on the estate of Mrs. Wirtemburgh, and thereafter was appointed guardian of her child.

The bill in this case was filed by Schneill, one of the sureties on Schroeder's original administration bond, to enjoin proceedings at law, in an action brought against him on said bond, for the recovery of a sum alleged to be in the hands of his principal, Schroeder as administrator. And the court held, upon the death of Mrs. Wirtembrugh, Schroeder, as her administrator, was himself alone entitled to receive her dividend of the estate of her father, Jacob H. Boyer. It was in his hands, and (the court say) the condition of the bond was not only legally but literally fulfilled. The whole object of the bond is to secure the payment of the proceeds of the estate to those who may be legally entitled to receive them. But the claim of Marshburn and wife upon the complainant are still one degree further removed. Schroeder was appointed guardian of Mrs. Marshburne when she was an infant (supposed regularly and 353 upon sufficient security) and the necessary consequence of this was that the amount in his hands, to which she was entitled as distributee of her mother became so much held by him in trust for her as guardian; and according to McDowell vs. Caldwell, 2 McCord Ch. R., 55, the sureties to the guardianship bond are responsible for it. And the circumstances referred to constitute a complete bar to the right of Marshburne and wife to recover at law. 1 Bail. Eq. R., 340.

In the case of Hall vs. Hall, 2 McCord Ch. R. where it was shewn that the executors themselves owed considerable sums to the estate, the court held the following language:—"The decided cases say, that these debts are so much cash in the hands of the executor; and the court will often order executors to pay the debts they owe, into the hands of the proper officer of the court for the security of the parties interested, 2 Cox's Ca., 377; Eggleston and Coventry vs. Kingston, 8 Vesey, Jr., 466; Berry vs. Usher, 11 Ves., Jr., 87; Toller on Ex., 480; 6 Mass. R., 149; 11 do., 256.

A debt due by the executor of the estate of a testator, is assets upon the same plain reason upon which an executor, who is a creditor, may retain; that he cannot sue himself. 13 Ves., Jr., 263; Hankey vs. Garrett, 3 Bro. C. C., 458; and it has been held a sufficient cause for the appointment of a receiver, Winthrop vs. Bass, 12 Mass. R., 199; Middleton vs. Dodwell, 13 Ves., Jr., 268-9. Thus the principle seems well settled, that where an executor or administrator having assets in his hands is also guardian, he can elect to hold the share of the legatee or distributee (his ward) in his character of guardian, and thus exonerate the sureties on the administration bond, and thus charge those on the guardian bond.

In the case of Joyner vs. Cooper, 2 Bailey's Equity Reports, one indebted by specialty to the estate of a lunatic, is appointed committee of his estate, and the specialty is transferred to and accepted by him as committee. The court held the debt extinguished, and the sureties to his bond as commissioner are liable for so much received by him. So far as that case is applicable, it is as follows:

John McNish was by a decree of the Court of Equity directed to account with the commissioner for his actings and doings as commissioner of John Dupont, the lunatic. He was reported by the commissioner to be indebted to the estate of the lunatic in the sum of $8,802 47-100, and the report was confirmed and made a decree of the court. In the amount reported was included the sum, prin- 354 cipal, and interest, of a bond for 1,200, which McNish owed, and which was due to the estate of the lunatic before his appointment to be committee; after his appointment this bond was transferred to him by Thomas Dupont his predecessor in the office of committee and accepted by him. And it remained in the hands of his attorney uncancelled at the trial of the case. McNish being removed his successor instituted suit on his bond as committee and recovered judgment on it for the whole amount of the decree in equity. On this judgment among the questions raised one was: whether John McNish was properly charged as committee with the amount of his own debt, as so much money received by virtue of his trust.

Upon this point the presiding Judge delivering the opinion of the court, says: "I regard the point as settled, that where one owes a debt to a trust, and afterwards assumes the management of the trust, the amount of his debt shall be considered as so much cash in his hands". Upon appeal the court said, "This court concurs in the opinion of the presiding Judge below, on all the questions he has discussed. The second ground, however, presents a question which although in effect decided by the judgment below, it may be necessary to decide expressly here. It cannot be denied that the committee of a lunatic is not subject to any further liability, if on the revocation of his powers he has accounted for and paid over the funds in his hands, to whomsoever may be legally entitled to receive them. Who in this case was entitled to receive from the former committee, Thomas Dupont, the funds in his hands? Unquestionably the committee, John McNish, who was appointed in his place. The commisisoner of the court had no right to receive them, unless specially authorized by the court. McNish's appointment clothed him with all the power to receive and manage the estate of the lunatic. If he thought proper to settle with the former committee without even an account before the commissioner, he could do so, and his receipt for the funds was an act, to which he was fully competent. If he thought proper to receive his own bond there was nothing in the undertaking or duties of his trust to prevent his doing so; and the money due on the bond became thereby a part of the trust fund, and his sureties are answerable for it." See Joyner vs. Cooper, 2 Bail. Eq. R., 205.

The foregoing case seems analogous in principle and in every

R. W. Williams, Appellant, vs. W. D. Moseley for the use of P. Smith, Appellee.

355 essential feature, parallel with the case under consideration.

In the case of Galphin vs. McKinney, 1 McCord Ch. R., 298.—Nott, Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court said, quoting from the Chancellor's opinion appealed from, "The order of the court it is said, directing the delivery of the bond to McKinney as the executor of the estate of Galphin, was not intended to operate as a discharge of the debt, for there was no proof of payment made; nor was it put to the court, that in making that order it was intended to cancel the bond, and release the surety." The Justice in reply to these views of the Chancellor says: "With the most respectful deference for the opinion of the learned Chancellor who delivered that decree, I cannot bring my mind to concur in that construction of the order delivering the bond to the obligor must of itself imply an intention to place it entirely at his disposal. What other intention can possibly be conceived? It is said it was delivered to him as executor "eo nomine," for the benefit of the estate, and if he destroyed it he was guilty of a breach of trust. If it was delivered to him for the benefit of the estate, it was for the purpose of enabling him to appropriate the money due on it, to the payment of the debts and legacies of the estate. It was then giving the entire credit to the principal; and the court would violate its own rules, not to construe it into a release of the surety. The destruction of the bond was no breach of trust, because being in the hands of the obligor it became a dead letter. The misapplication of the fund might have been a breach of the trust; but the surety on the bond was not answerable for that. He was not security for the faithful administration of McKinney."

If the foregoing views have any force or propriety, and they are authoritative in South Carolina, where they have been acquiesced in and approved by the courts, they seem to apply themselves to the case we are now discussing with peculiar fitness.

In the case of O'Neall vs. Herbert, Dud. Law and Equity Rep. Dec. Term, 1837, page 31-2, Chancellor Harper, delivering the opinion of the court, said, "I suppose that if an administrator have in his hands the balance of an estate, and is afterwards appointed as guardian of an infant entitled to it, he will be chargeable as guardian, and the sureties on his guardianship bond will be liable, as in the case of Simkins vs. Cobb, (2 Bailey R. 60) referred to by the Chancellor. So, if before his appointment he has received a sum of money as in McDowell vs. Caldwell (2 McCord's Ch. R., 55) or if in any 356 other capacity he be indebted to himself as guardian, being unable to sue himself, the debt shall be presumed to be paid, and he and his sureties will be liable.

In the case of Pratt et al. vs. Northom et al., 5 Mason R., 108, Mr. Justice Story says: If any act had been done by Ambrose by which he elected to pass the property to his guardianship account, or if he had charged himself with it, in the Probate Court as guardian, there would be little difficulty in adopting the construction, that by operation of law it was instantaneously transferred to his accounts as guardian.

The real question in this part of the case, is, whether without any admission of assets, or any admission of responsibility as guardian, a Court of Equity is bound to make that application for the party, which he has not made for himself; in this respect it differs materially from Taylor vs. Deblois. See 5 Mason R. 108.

In the case of Taylor vs. Deblois, 4 Mason R., 133, the court said: "The principle of retainer is, where the party unites in himself by representation, or otherwise the character of debtor and creditor, inasmuch as he cannot sue himself, he is entitled to retain, and the law will presume a retainer in satisfaction of the debt, if there are assets in his hands." The learned judge further said, "I see no reason upon a review of the authorities, to doubt the accuracy of the statement; and it is supported by Burdett vs. Fix, 1 Roll. Abr. Title Executors L. 3, C. 45. 2 Browlows, R. 50. Woodward vs. Lord Darcy, Plowden R. 184. Toller, C. 3, Chap. 3. Same 109. 8 Serg't & R. 24, 30. 1 Pothier on Ob. 425.

In the case at bar, Hart did not owe money by representation, but admitting that Burney in his life time, and Moseley his representative, after his death, held these notes in trust for the use of Hart's wards, after that transfer, then he owed them otherwise, to wit, as principal; and according to the doctrine in the last case cited, inasmuch as he could not sue himself, was entitled to retain, and the law will presume a retainer in satisfaction of his debts to them.—This case is very unlike the case of Pratt et al. vs. Northom et al. There the guardian admitted no assets either in that or any other character; but it is plain from the case, had he admitted assets as guardian, Judge Story, who tried that cause would have charged him as such, and held all responsibility under his administration bond as extinguished. Here Hart receipts for the notes as cash, and signs the receipts as guardian. He accounts with the County Court for what he had received as guardian, and is charged by the court 357 in that character with the amount. In this case then the duty to pay and receive both devolved on him, and the law presumes a retainer as guardian, and an extinguishment of the notes sued on. In this case, Hart elected to receive as guardian and account with the court as guardian. And by his election a retainer of the funds as guardian, and an extinguishment of his notes as principal was worked, according to the authorities cited, "as a necessary legal result."—And he not only became chargeable as guardian for the amount so received, but to the extent of his return to the County Court, in fact was so charged.

Is Moseley bound to Hart's wards, the young Farmers, for the amount of these notes?—most obviously not, because the receipts he took of Hart the guardian, releases the estate he represents for that much; and are also good vouchers for him in his settlement of that estate.

That the mere loss or destruction of a note will discharge the liability of principal or surety, is a proposition which we apprehend will not be seriously urged by any one; we do not understand, however, that Williams the appellant, rests his defence on that ground.

But because the notes were delivered to Hart the principal as paid and released—or if not so, because by delivery to him as guardian the amount became chargeable against him and his sureties on his guardianship bonds—or because by delivery to him as guardian the right of action became suspended by operation of which his sureties, on the original notes (the subject of this suit,) were discharged. It was suggested in argument on the part of the appellee Moseley, that these receipts of Hart, guardian, to Moseley, executor of Burney's estate, are receipts made by the debtor, and to allow them as evidence of extinguishment of the original notes, or of retainer as guardian, is to permit the party to make evidence for himself. It must be recollected these receipts were taken by, and delivered to Moseley the plaintiff in this suit below; it also appears by the testimony they are in his hand writing, and by the bill of exceptions, that they were put in evidence by him in the Circuit Court. It is too late to make the objection after he, Moseley, has used them and offered them in evidence below, to refuse to the appellant any benefit he may derive from them here. A party offering evidence is understood to waive all objection to its competency. Greenleaf vs. Birth, 5 Pet. R., 132-7-8. These receipts were received by Moseley, executor of Burney, from Hart, guardian of three of Farmer's heirs; 358 Moseley, the appellee wrote them; Hart, as guardian, signed them; Moseley offered them in evidence. Williams, the appellant, had nothing to do, as far as appears, with the making of them, or their custody, or any connexion with them whatever—why may he not avail himself of evidence thus thrown in his way? Their chief effect is to shew that Hart elected to charge himself with their amount as guardian of his wards; and this is evidence of the same kind usually referred to for that purpose; most of the cases before cited turn on such testimony—to which may be added the case of Alston vs. Munford, where the guardian Munford was charged as such, (though he was testamentary guardian without security, and his securities as executor were discharged,) because he so charged himself on his own books, and to a bond debtor, whose debt had been bequeathed as a specific legacy to his ward, he wrote, apprizing him of the fact. 1 Brock. R., 278. In the case of Taylor et al. vs. Deblois, et al., 4 Mason R., 135, the only evidence of transfer was a certificate given by Mrs. Deblois to the Probate Court that she (who was administratrix,) held the funds as guardian, this Judge Story held to be conclusive, and she became bound as guardian, and her securities as administratrix were discharged.

The weight of the objection that Hart received these notes, eo nomine for the use of Farmer's heirs, is not perceived. He did not receipt for them as notes; but for their amount, both principal and interest, as money. He did not receipt for them as guardian of Farmer's heirs; but separately as guardian of three of them, there being five. Moseley, the appellee, was an actor in making and receiving these receipts, they were moulded, as he thought best, to serve his interest. He surrendered the notes to Hart the principal obligor in them, as the consideration for the receipts and according to his own statements in evidence in the record, thought he was parting with all interest in them. By that act he suspended his right of action against Hart and his sureties on these notes for an indefinite period, that is during Hart's life time afterwards. This (if the doctrine of retainer did not apply) would be giving time to the principal in consideration of the receipts, without the privity or consent of the surety, and would in law discharge him. U. S. vs. Hillegan, 3 Wash. C. C., 70; Bank of Steubenville vs. Hogue, 6 Hamm., 17; Kennebec Bank vs. Tuckerman, 5 Greenl., 130; Bank vs. Woodward, 5 New H., 99. The delivery of a note, bill or execution, with intend to transfer the debt upon a fair bargain, and for a valuable consideration, is a sufficient assignment. Fitcomb vs. Thomas, 5 Greenl., 282; Clark vs. Rogers, 2 do., 157; Jones vs. Witter, 13 Mass., 304; Dunn vs. Schnell, 15 do., 485. And so held of other choses in action. Briggs vs. Dorr, 19 John., 95; Prescott vs. Hall, 17 do., 284; Vose vs. Handy, 2 Greenl., 322; Robbins vs. Bacon, 3 do., 349; Onion vs. Paul, 1 Har. & John., 114. These and numerous other authorities sustain and make valid the transfer by Moseley to Hart of the notes sued on.

It is said in argument, these notes were not extinguished, but the right of action was suspended during the lifetime of Hart, the guardian, and again revived at his death. It will be remembered the only legal holders of these notes were Burney in his life time; Moseley, his executor, after his death, and Hart, the guardian, by transfer, by delivery, from Moseley for a valuable consideration.—So that any time after the notes were five years past due, the statute of limitations would have been a valid as well as meritorious plea, for the appellant, Williams, who is only a surety. The accident of the death of Hart is the fact on which the law of the case is therefore made to depend. Had Hart lived until these notes, or any of them, were five years past due—after that, a plea of the statute of limitations, would have been a bar to a suit brought against Williams the surety, on all of them so conditioned. For during Hart's life, Moseley, the appellee, had no right of action against the surety Wiliams, he having parted with all interest in the notes. It seems therefore the right of Moseley to maintain this action does not depend upon any legal title, which he has in, or to the notes sued on; but upon the death of Hart, to whom he had transferred them, and all interest in them for a full and valuable consideration.

The court being equally divided in opinion the judgment of the Circuit Court will stand. But I for the reasons herein stated, think that W. D. Moseley, the appellee, in this Court, and plaintiff in the Court below, has not shown a legal ground of action against Robert W. Williams, the appellant here, and defendant in the Circuit Court, and that the judgment of that Court ought to be reversed.

Upon the question of holding adjourned terms of the Circuit Court raised by the exceptions in the record of this cause, the 3d section of the act of 1828 to regulate judicial proceedings, Duval L., 90, provides "when any Judge shall not attend on the first day of the term, the Court shall stand adjourned until twelve o'clock on the second day, and if said Judge shall not then attend, it shall be the duty of the Clerk at that time to continue all causes and adjourn the Court to such time as the Judge may appoint, or until the next regular term by law established." Justice Lancaster, and Chief Justice Douglas, are of opinion that the Judges have power under this section to adjourn the term of the Circuit Court at the time, and under the circumstances provided in the section above mentioned (to hold adjourned terms of the Court) at any time not to interfere with the regular term of any other Court in the Circuit, but that their powers to adjourn terms under other circumstances, seem not to be created by statute; therefore, no opinion is given on that point.

HAWKINS, J., for Affirmance.

DOUGLAS, C. J., for Reversal.

JOSEPH C. OSBORNE AND WIFE, vs. THADDEUS D. VANHORN, ET AL.

It may be regarded, as established by the English and American decisions, that a mother is entitled to an allowance for the maintenance of her children out of their fortunes, especially where her own fortune is inadequate.

In gneral this allowance is to be confined to the annual income, and should not extend beyond it; but where the property is small and more than the annual income is necessary for the maintenance of the infants, the Court will sometimes allow the capital to be broken in upon.

If there is a necessity for breaking in upon the caiptal of an infant for his maintenance, the proper course is first to apply to the Courts for its sanction. If, however, this course is not adopted disbrusements beyond the income are at the peril of the guardian, and he is bound, before he obtains an allowance for such disbursements, to show a state of facts demanding and justifying them and should produce the vouchers, &c., of his expenditures.

The statute of limitations is no bar to items of such expenditure, disbursed more than five years anterior to the filing of a bill by the distributees for an account and distribution.

Where real estate is, by order of the County Court, converted into money, the heirs and distributees cannot claim that the one-third belonging to the widow of intestate for her natural life, be paid over to a master, to be by him laid out at interest. Her life interest in money in her hands is not subject to be disturbed, except on a shewing of fear of loss or making away with it, and even then she should have the privilege of giving security for it.

Appeal from a decree in Chancery rendered in Leon Circuit Court, DOUGLAS, Chief Justice, presiding.

Thadeus D. VanHorn, in right of his wife, Mary Ann, daughter of Daniel Faust, deceased, with others, also children of said Daniel, filed their bill in Chancery against Mary Ann Osborne, (formerly Mary Ann Faust, widow of said Daniel,) administratrix of Daniel Faust, and Joseph C. Osborne her present husband, for an account of the administration, and distribution of the surplus. The defendants answered and submitted their accounts, and claimed an allowance for many items of expenditure for the children of Daniel Faust disbursed since his death. The defendants also claimed the use, during the life of Mrs. Osborne, of one-third of certain moneys, realized by a sale of real estate of the intestate made by order of Leon County Court. It was referred to a master to make and state an account of the administration, and of the surplus for distribution. The report of the master allowed the administratrix the disbursements for the maintenance of the children of Daniel Faust, and the use for life of one-third of the moneys realized from the sale of real estate. The allowance for maintenance of the children was not confined to the annual income of the children. Exceptions were filed to the master's report, and are considered in the opinion of the court delivered by Justice Baltzell to which reference is made for the further material facts in this case.

In the court below a decree was rendered in favor of complainants directing the widow's third of the money arising from the sale of the real estate to be preserved in the hands of the master to be laid out at interest for her benefit during her life, and excluding all disbursments by the administratrix for the maintenance of her children (heirs of Daniel Faust) made more than five years previous to the filing of the bill.

From this decree the defendants (appellants in this court) appealed, and the complainants took a cross appeal.

This cause was argued by,

Mr. Archer, for Appellants, and

Mr. Gwynn and Messrs. Long & Walker for Appellees.

BALTZELL, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit is instituted by the Complainants to recover from the administratrix of Daniel Faust, dec., the distributive share due to them as heirs of the decedent. The accounts of the administratrix where referred to a master, the exceptions to whose report constitute the ground of appeal to this court. The mother, now Mrs. Osborne, was administratrix, and complainants object to allowing her "any sum whatever for board and clothing her own children; this they say was her duty by law and nature." And, secondly, admitting the claim, she was entitled to use no more in their support than the annual interest or profit of their estate. By the common law it was the duty of parents to support their minor children. 1 Bl. Com., 446.

It has been, and continues to be, an established rule in equity to allow maintenance where the parents are not of ability. Harley vs. Bannister, 4 Mod., 275. "It is not necessary that the father should be absolutely insolvent, but that he should not be in sufficient circumstances to maintain his child suitably to his reputation." Buckworth vs. Buckworth, 1 Cox, 80. "So in previous cases it was held that a parent must maintain his child unless totally incapable, or by having a numerous family of children he borders on necessity.' 1 Mad. Chy., 344.

Where the circumstances of the father are sufficient for the maintenance of the infant, the court will compel him to do it, and refuse an allowance. 1 Ark., 514. 6 Vesey, 349.

A mother seems to occupy a position somewhat different from the father. Thus Lord Hardwick, in said, "As to compelling the mother to maintain her daughter out of her own estate, it will be going too far." 2 Atk., 446.

Lord Eldon has repeatedly declared, "a master cannot do a wiser thing for the benefit of a family than to make a liberal allowance out of the children's fortune for their maintenance and education to a mother who is inadequately provided for." Note to 1 Brown Ch. R., 164, Bradshaw vs. Bradshaw, 1 Jac. Pr. 647.

The maintenance will be allowed when the father is not of ability although the mother has a separate estate. 1 Cox, 275.

A mother married to the second husband is not obliged to maintain the children by the first, but shall have an allowance from the interest of their fortunes. 1 Brown, Ch. R., 268.

The English authorities are to the effect stated. Let us see how far the American Courts agree. In Hoffman's Master in Chancery we find "it is the course of the English Courts to appropriate a cer-

Joseph C. Osborne and wife, vs. Thadeus D. VanHorn, et al.

363 tain sum out of the fortune of the infant for his support, and to direct a reference to fix the amount. This is not usual here; the disbursements are judged on the settlement of the guardian's account. The English course is in some respects preferable, least troublesome to the guardian, and least expensive—as the guardian would be allowed the whole sum fixed for his maintenance without providing his disbursements. But it has this disadvantage, that the guardian having a fixed sum, may be tempted to profit by it by diminishing the proper allowance to the infant. 2 Atk., 618. Hoffman's M. C., 135.

The case of Susannah Bostwick, decided by Chancellor Kent was that of a mother of six children having a share of her husband's estate amounting to $3,682.99, a legacy of $250, 1-5 of a house and lot in New York, subject to life estate of her mother, 56 years of age. The Chancellor directed an enquiry as to what yearly sum would be a proper allowance for the mother and children, and to examine and report on the justness and truth of the charges for past maintenance. In the case of Hayward vs. Hayward's executor, the Court of Chancery of S. Carolina say, "The children are entitled to a considerable estate, and she has not more than a competent provision for herself. It is reasonable, therefore, that she should be relieved from the burthen of maintaining and educating them. The allowances ought to be liberal but not beneficial. The mother ought to be indemnified for all expenses on account of her children, but not for her care and attention." In this case the sum of $2000 annually was allowed for the maintenance and education of her daughter, and the maintenance of her sons. 4 Dess., 445. It may then be regarded as established both by the English and American decisions, that a mother is entitled to an allowance for maintenance out of the property of her children, especially in cases where her own provision is inadequate.

The second exception is, that this allowance is to be confined to the annual income, and should not extend beyond it.

This no doubt the general rule, the exception is where the property is small, and more means are necessary for the due maintenance of the infant. In this event the court will sometimes allow the capital to be broken in upon. 2 Story's Eq., 584.

This rule is founded in prudence and a just regard to the rights of infants, to prevent extravagance and incautious action on the part of guardians. The rule, however, is not inflexible. In the case of 364 Bostwick above referred to, the subject of breaking in upon the capital of the infant, and of allowance out of the infant's estate for past maintenance were both considered, and the Chancellor says of the former: "We must impair the principal sum or give no relief.—The capital is small when divided among the six children, and we may well adopt the remarks of Lord Keeper North in Barlow vs. Grant, "that it was fit and reasonable that part of the principal of a child's legacy of £100 should be allowed for his education.—The money laid out in the child's education was most advantageous and beneficial for the infant, and therefore he should make no scruple of breaking into the principal where so small a sum was devised that the interest thereof would not suffice to give the legatee a competent maintenance and education. But in the case of a legacy of £1000 or the like, it might be reasonable to restrain the maintenance to the interest of the money.

The petitioner also asks for reimbursement for the past maintenance of her children, or for the discharge of debts which she has of necessity incurred for that purpose. Such an allowance is also within the rules and practice of the court. Lord Thurlow held that no such allowance could be made; but afterwards, 6 Vesey, 454, Lord Eldon approved of this old practice by Lord Rosslyn, and allowed a father to be reimbursed for the past maintenance of the child.

Lord Thurlow was said to have changed his first opinion on this point, and Ld. Alvanly frequently made a retrospective allowance for maintenance, and the practice afterwards grew familiar. 9 Ves., 285. 11 Ves., 1. 14 Ves., 449. The old rule says Chancellor Kent would lead to great inconvenience, for though the wants of the infant might be ever so pressing he could not receive any maintenance (charity excepted) without the expense of a suit and reference to a master." 4 John. Chy., 104.

In addition to the quotation already made from Hoffman's Master in Chy. we find the opinion of Lord Hardwick as to exparte applications for maintenance. "I had a doubt whether the court could upon exparte applications allow maintenance for an infant where no cause is pending, for it is at the peril of a guardian in socage what he applies for maintenance, and he will be allowed according to the discretion he has used, &c. 2 Atkins, 315. Hoffman's M. C. 136. The same authority says, "if the petition prays maintenance as well as a guardian, which is usually the case in England, the order includes a direction to the master to consider what is proper to 365 be allowed for the maintenance and education of the infant. If the guardian proposed has expended anything before, the words for the time past and to come should be added."

In such a case the state of facts laid before the master should contain in addition to what is requisite to the appointment of a guardian, a statement of the items of previous disbursements, which may be by way of schedule and a proposal of their amount to be allowed for previous disbursements, as well as an annual sum for future maintenance. The statement of expenditures must be proved by vouchers as usual. The state of facts should contain everything except what is peculiar to the proposal for guardianship. It should be sworn to, and the voucher produced of past expense if any."—Hoffman's M. C., 136. 3 Br. Ch. R., 88. 1 Br. Ch. R., 179.

In the case of McDowell vs. Caldwell, the subject was considered by the S. C. of South Carolina, on exceptions to the report of the master, and the court said, "no account has been furnished of the actual expenditures, or of the length of time they were boarded abroad; and the basis of the charge against them is by probale conjecture as to what would be the expenses of board, tuition, clothing, &c., for the whole length of time. It is a well settled rule that the guardian is not entitled to break in upon the capital of his ward for his subsistence, except under peculiar circumstances which do not enter into this case, and generally it is limited within the income. 2 McCord's Chy., 58.

We are of opinion then, that as a general rule, the guardian should be confined to the income; and if there is necessity for invading it, his proper course is to apply to a court for its sanction in the first instance. If, however, he does not adopt this course, disbursements beyond the income are at his peril, and he is bound to shew a state of facts and circumstances demanding and justifying them, and should produce the vouchers, &c., of his expenditures. The exceptions in this case assert the general principle that the mother is not entitled to anything, and secondly, to no more than the income. Had specific objections been presented as to the mode of allowance by the master, the want of vouchers, &c., there might have been greater difficulty in sustaining the report.

The second exception presents the enquiry whether there are in the facts of this case as presented by the master, a sufficient excuse and justification for the guardian to break in upon the capital of these infants. This can be determined only by reference to the 366 condition of the estate in the hands of the widow, shewing her income as well as that of the infants. There were seven children of the intestate, all of them daughters but one, at the time of his death, Oct., 1833. One died four months after him, another eleven months, and the boy two years afterwards.

The administratrix had four negroes,

The legal interest on the amount of the portions belonging to the widow and the distributees will be, according to an authority quoted, a fair test of the annual income of each, and we have endeavored so to regard it, without aiming at entire accuracy in the calculations.

Deducting the thirds of the widow from the $1,406 in her hands to Jan., 1835, and there will be as a portion to the children $937 34; the interest on which for a year would be $74 98, to be divided amongst seven children for their support, making an allowance of near eleven dollars to each, for board, clothing and education to the 1st Jan. 1835. Proceeding to 1838, and adding this principal of 937 34 to the sales made in that year, after deducting the widow's dower, ($632) we have the sum of $1,596, the income of which, $125, is to be divided amongst four children, making $31 for each, for maintenance and education to March, 1838. Progressing to this period, and adding the sum of $1,569 to the $3,620.92 deducting the dower, ($1,206.97) leaves $2,413.95, which added to $1,568 makes $3,982.95 as the property of the infants, the interest of which is $318.36, making $79.68 each, to be divided amongst the four children.

We will now enquire as to her means of support for herself. Her share to Jan., 1835 was $468.66, yielding an interest of $37.39. In 1835 her share was enlarged 632, making with the 408, $1,100.66, and giving an interest of $88. In 1838 her share was enlarged 1,206, making with the 1,100, $2,306, giving an interest of $184.48.

If correct in this view we think it very clear that at least until 1838 there was a deficiency of means, both of the widow and children, and that a Court of Equity, if applied to, would have allowed the capital to be broken in upon; and there being no complaint of the exhorbitance of the charges, or mistake of the master in this respect, we see no reason for disturbing his report. These two exceptions were then, in the opinion of this court, properly overruled by the court below.

We do not concur, however, with that court in sustaining the eighth exception of complainants. The statute of limitations does not, in our opinion, bar the items charged for support of the children. The complainants ask equity, and must be required to do equity. They cannot expect to exact payment from the administratrix of this fund without allowing her all fair payments and deductions arising from and connected with her administration. This should be overruled.

We think, too, the court erred in ordering the amount in the hands of Mrs. Osborne, as her share for life, in place of dower in the lands, to be paid over to the master, and by him laid out at interest. Mrs. Osborne has a life interest in this, not subject to be disturbed except on a showing of fear of loss or making away with it by her; and even then, she should have the privilege of giving security for it. But there is neither proof nor allegation of any peril attending its being with her. On the contrary, looking to the care and prudence in the past management of the property, there is every fair presumption of her taking proper care of it in future. It would, in our opinion, be dealing very harshly with one who has acted so well and so faithfully to her children to exhibit a distrust of her honesty in this respect. It is so seldom that courts are called to pass upon a case exhibiting so much merit, such rare fidelity and worth, that we would by no means discourage it by undue harshness or severity.

Indeed in looking at the state of accounts as exhibited by the master, we have been struck with the extraordinary prudence and success attending the management of the affairs of this estate by this lady; and that during the disastrous periods of embarrassment and losses from 1838 to 1847. "No losses," says the master, "are claimed to be allowed for bad debts or depreciated money. No charge is made for supporting negro children, or taking care of sick negroes, and not a single medical bill charged."

Some reliance has been placed upon the agreement between Osborne and his wife, as preventing any allowance for board after the marriage. We do not regard it in that light. Osborne binds himself to his intended wife not to make a charge for board, but does this exclude and prevent her from doing it. This same agreement provides a separate interest to the wife in her property, and the design was probably to leave it to the management of the wife as a part of her separate affairs. The deed or contract is by no means clearly expressed. Still it is between Osborne and his wife, and not between them and the children. The latter were not parties—did not contribute to its consideration—are not bound by it in any way, how then can they claim under it?

A majority of the court are of opinion that a sufficient allowance has been made in this case independent of the ten per cent. on the interest and hire, and direct this to be disallowed. They are by no means prepared to reject it as a good general rule, but think under the circumstances of this case, a deduction should be made in this respect.

We are then of opinion that the exceptions of complainant be overruled, and that the decree allowing the exceptions as to the statute of limitations, and the order for distributing the life estate of Mrs. Osborne, and allowing the ten per cent. aforesaid, be reversed. In other respects the Master's Report is confirmed. The case will be remanded with instructions to enter a decree in conformity with this opinion.

Joseph B. Watts, Administrator of Thos. T. Clardy, vs. James Clardy. 369

A deed using the terms "have loaned to A. during her natural life, and after her death hath given unto the heirs of her body which shall survive her, to be equally divided amongst them:"

And a devise "I lend unto my daughter A., during her natural life and after her decease to the heirs of her body, share and share about," were held as well by the laws of South Carolina as the common law of England to create an estate-tail in personal property so as to vest it obsolutely in A., and on her marriage in her husband. On her death the property belonging to his administrator, and not to her heirs.

Writ of Error to Hamilton Circuit Court.

Joseph B. Watts, administrator of Thomas T. Clardy, brought suit in Hamilton county in detinue against James M. Clardy for the recovery of certain slaves named in the declaration, and alleged to be detained by defendant.

The jury at the trial, on the 6th of April, 1846, found a special verdict as follows:

We, the jury, find that Thomas T. Clardy, the plaintiff's intestate, died possessed of the negroes sued for, that the plaintiff demanded the same from the defendant, who after the death of the said Clardy detained and still detains the said negroes, that said demand was duly made before suit was brought; and the jury assess the value of the negroes as follows:

Charles at	$600	Sanco at	$200
Daniel at	$600	Moses at	$300
Samuel at	$300	Bellat at	$300
Charlotte at	$400	Patience at	$200
Silvey at	$500	Lavinia at	$300
Tenor at	$500	Violet at	$100
Maria at	$500	Maria at	$500
Cass at	$600	Mary at	$150
Boston at	$600	Jenny at	$150

That the following named negroes, to-wit: Charles, Silvey and Tenor are the same negroes named in a certain instrument of writing, under which defendant claims for himself, and as guardian for his brothers and sisters, the property therein mentioned, dated April 370
21st, 1827, made by Wm. Gore, which is hereunto annexed, marked exhibit A., whereby the said negroes, with future increase, which increase since born are Maria, Boston, Cass, Sancho, Lavinia, Moses, Bella, Patience and Jenny, were deeded to Anner Clardy, to have, hold and enjoy during her natural life, as therein mentioned; that the following named negroes, to-wit: Sam, Violet and Maria, Daniel, and Charles, (together with Mary, child of Maria, since born,) are the same negroes which were devised, under and by virtue of the provisions of the last will and testament of William Gore, senior, in favor of Anner Clardy, as therein set forth, dated the 30th of May, 1825, and hereunto annexed, marked exhibit B., under the provisions of which will, and the eighth and ninth clauses thereof, the defendant, James M. Clardy, for himself and as guardian for the rest of the children of said Thomas T. and Anner Clardy, claim property. That the said William Gore died 30th October, 1828; that the said Anner Clardy was his daughter, and is the same person named in said will. And the said Anner Clardy and Thomas T. Clardy were married and resident in the State of South Carolina at the several times and before the dates of said instruments. Exhibits A. and B. That said exhibits are fully proved and authenaticated; that Anner Clardy departed this life in the year 1839, and that the said Thomas T. Clardy survived her and has since died, and that the plaintiff is his administrator; that the defendant, James M., and his sisters and brothers, to-wit: Amanda, John, Alva, Vienna and Mary Ann, the children of said Anner, survived her and her infants at the time of her death. And forasmuch as the jury are ignorant in point of law upon the facts of the case, on which side they ought to find the issue, they do agree that if the court should be of opinion, that Mrs. Anner Clardy took an absolute interest, as first taker in the negroes devised under William Gore's will, by virtue of the provisions in her favor, which negroes are herein before set forth; and, also, took a like interest in the negroes above mentioned, which were deeded, with their increase, by the deed of 1827, by said William Gore, which negroes in such event, by reason of such inter-marriage, vested in her husband, Thomas T. Clardy, as absolute owner, then they find for the plaintiff, that he recover the said goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned, and so above assessed, wrongfully detained by the said defendant, or the value there-

Joseph B. Watts, Administrator of Thomas T. Clardy, vs. James Clardy.

371 of, as above assessed, and his damages about his suit, to wit: ten dollars and costs.

But if the court are of an opposite opinion, and consider that the children of Anner Clardy took by purchase or remainder-men, or otherwise, at her death, under said will and under the limitations of said deed, then they find for defendant, and that he doth detain the the negroes above named; but in either event, he doth detain the negroes, Grace, of the value of one hundred dollars, and Chloe, of the value of three hundred dollars, and assess their value as above, with ten dollars damages, and costs of suit. We further find that defendant doth not detain negro Isaac, in said declaration mentioned.

Horry District.
STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

To all people to whom these presents shall come, I, William Gore, of the State and District aforesaid, send Greeting:

Know ye, that I, the said William Gore, for and in consideration of the natural love and affection which I have and bear unto Anner Clardy, during her natural life, and to the heirs of her body, and for divers good causes me hereunto moving, have loaned unto her the said Anner Clardy, during her natural life and after her death, hath given to the heirs of her body which shall survive her, to be equally divided amongst them, the following negroes, with their future increase, viz: Charlotte, Silvey and Tenor; the said Anner Clardy to have and to hold and enjoy during her natural life, the said negroes Charlotte, Silvey and Tenor, and their future increase. and after her decease, to be then equally divided between her surviving heirs, as their exclusive property. I, the said William Gore, do by these presents bind myself, my heirs, executors and administrators, and family, to the intent the said Anner Clardy shall have a life time estate in the aforesaid negroes, and at her decease to be equally divided between her surviving heirs as aforesaid mentioned 372 One thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this April 21st day, Anno Domini 1827.

(Signed,) WM. GORE.

Recorded, Nov. 1827.

(EXHIBIT B.)

In the name of God: Amen.

I, William Gore, Senior, of Horry District and State of South Carolina, being of sound and perfect mind and memory, blessed be God for it, do this 30 day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, make and publish this my last will and testament, in manner as follows: I resign my body to the dust from whence it came, my soul to God who gave it me. First. I lend unto my beloved wife Mary, during her natural life, as much of the plantation where I now live, as much as Exectuors, hereafter to be named, shall think necessary for her support. Also as many of the negroes as they shall deem proper for her comfortable support. Also as much of my stock of cattle, sheep and hogs, household furniture, plantation tools and so forth, together with a good riding horse; all which shall be during my said wife Mary's natural life and no longer; then to be equally divided between my lawful heirs, share and share about.

Secondly. I give unto my son John Gore, one hundred acres of land that he has now in possession. Also two hundred and fifty acres lying on the Beaverdam swamp. Also three hundred and forty-two acres of the lower part of the Daniel Gore lands.

Third. I give and bequeath unto my son William Gore, the land that he has now in possession; also from Poplar Branch to Cyprus Branch, and up the said Cyprus Branch to the main road leading from Mourney's to George Reaves' ferry; also one hundred acres lying above said road, being all that tract.

Fourth. I lend unto my son Jonathan Isaac Gore, the balance of my plantation whereupon I now live, after my Executors has laid off my wife her part, and after her death, the said land which my said Executors has laid off for my said wife Mary. Said land shall begin on the lower line on Capt. Randall's corner, thence running up little river, such a distance and out to the back line as shall make 373 three hundred and eighty acres out of a tract of seven hundred acres which said tract of three hundred and eighty acres shall include my buildings and at least four acres around them; should the dividing line not allow it, said dividing line shall be as nearly paralled with the East line of the said tract as possible, and the balance of the said tract of seven hundred acres shall be to my daughter Mary Meike, as hereafter will be mentioned.

Fifth. I lend to my daughter Rebecca Frink, two hundred and fifty acres of land lying in the Seven Creeks, known by the name of the Rich Island; also three hundred acres taken off the upper part of the Daniel Gore tract of land lying on Gum Swamp in Columbus county, during her natural life, then after decease, I give and bequeath the said unto the heirs of her body to be equally divided betwixt them.

Sixth. I lend unto my daughter Mary Miek during her natural life three hundred and twenty acres of land whereon she now lives, being the balance of the trust that I gave to my son Jonathan Isaac Gore, and provided that his part does not include the buildings, he shall extend to take them, and she shall be allowed as many acres out of his part immediately below it; also two hundred more out of a tract lying on Cedar Creek, the balance of the tract which is fifty two acres, to Jonathan Isaac Gore, and shall be taken off adjoining the hundred acres that he now lives upon, one hundred acres more to Jonathan I. Gore, lying on Cedar creek whereon he now lives, and if there are any of my Bigelow land left unsold at my decease to be equally divided between Mary Miek and J. I. Gore.

Seventh. I lend unto my daughter Kitey Thomas during her natural life, five hundred acres of land whereon she now lives, including Mullet creek land bought from Maj. Day. Also two hundred acres of my Bigelow land where she formerly lived, and after her death the land shall be equally divided between her heirs, share and share about.

Eighth. I lend unto my daughter Anner Clardy, during her natural life, a tract of land in her possession, containing one hundred and fifty acres, more or less; also one other tract of five hundred acres lying in Waccammay, where she now lives, and after her decease to return to the heirs of her body, share and share about.

Ninth. It is hereby declared to be my will, that at my decease my Executors hereafter to be named, shall divide all the remainder and residue of my negroes, stock of all kinds, household furniture, 374 plantation tools, ready money, debts that are due me, and all other any personal property not already divided, betwixt my said sons and daughters having an equal share, only my son Jonathan I. Gore, and my daughters Rebekah Frink, Mary Meik and Kitey Thomas and Anner Clardy are only lent during their natural lives, and then to return in manner above mentioned. Also what negroes, stock and property my wife Mary may have at her decease, shall also be equally divided between my sons and daughters in manner and form before directed.

Tenth. Also, if my lands lying in Columbia should be unsold at my decease, for to be equally divided between my sons John Gore and William Gore.

Eleventh. If there should be any debts due at my decease, each one of my heirs shall pay an equal share.

Twelfth. I also ordain my sons, John Gore and William Gore, executors to my last will and testament. I also appoint them as trustees for the heirs of Jonathan Isaac Gore and Rebekah Frink and Mary Meik and Kitey Thomas and Anner Clardy, to procure the property by me given, that they are not defrauded out of their right.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal, the day and date above mentioned.

WILLIAM VAUGHT,
THOMAS BRANTLEY, JR.,
JOSEPH VAUGHT.

On the first June, 1846, the court below (Judge Macrae presiding,) gave judgment for the defendant, on the points of law arising upon the special verdict.

The plaintiff filed his exceptions to the opinions of the court, and now prosecutes his writ of error in this court, upon the following errors assigned:

1. The court erred in giving judgment for the defendant in the court below.

2. The judgment of the court should have been for the plaintiff upon the special verdict in this case.

Randall & Hagner, for Plaintiff:

The question now submitted by the special verdict and presented to this court are:

1st. Whether the terms of said deed and will (either or both of them) legally import and convey to Anna Clardy, such an absolute interest and estate as, by reason of her intermarriage with Thomas T. Clardy, vested the same in him as absolute owner? Or,

2d. Whether the estate vested in said Anna Clardy and her husband, being only a life interest, the residue of the interest and estate, after her death, vested in her children, the heirs of her body, who survive her, as purchasers, or remainder-men, or otherwise?

It is our duty to maintain and prove the affirmative of the first proposition and the negative (of course) of the second.

And first, to examine the will, which is prior in point of date.

The verdict refers to the 8th and 9th clauses as determining the estate which is to pass to Anna Cleardy.

Both parties will probably invoke other clauses of the will as influencing the decision to be made.

On the whole will, then, we contend:

1st. That the terms used in the 8th clause, respecting the realty would have vested in her and did vest in her. at common law, an estate-tail general.

We here premise that this proposition is laid down and to be discussed and proved, as furnishing the true test and indeed the only rule for ascertaining the nature and extent of the estate in the personalty, bequeathed to Anna Clardy under the 9th clause taken in connection with the 8th clause. As regards the realty, it is in conformity with the rule in Shelly's case—now and at all times an authoritative rule in England and America. See 4th Kent's Com., 221.

That rule is stated to be "that when the ancestor, by any gift or conveyance, taketh an estate of free-hold, and in the same gift or conveyance an estate is limited, either mediately or immediately, to his heirs in fee or in tail, the heirs are words of limitation of the estate and not words of purchase." 4 Kent, 206. Hays on the disposition of real estate, p. 17, 46.

For the general rule we shall cite no other authorities directly, 376 but the court will find it confirmed and reiterated in citations made for other doctrine to be advanced.

The will in question contains precisely such a bequest or demise in its general terms, and we will now examine if any other supplementary terms in the will vary, restrict or control such limitation.

It may be contended that the words "lend and loan" used in reference to Anna Clardy's estate for life, vary and restrict the interest given to her, and, as containing evidence of a "secondary" intention variant from the general intention, overrule the latter. This we deny.

1st. Because it is one of those "petty distinctions" which in the language of Lords Eldon and Redesdale, in Jessen vs. Wright, 2 Bligh. 1, (quoted from 2 Jarman on Willis, p. 286,) should not overrule the paramount intention of the testator, as evinced by the use of the technical terms "heirs of the body."

2d. The terms are not technical nor appropriate, and being used in connection with other terms of clear, unequivocal legal import, shall not be allowed to qualify the meaning.

The most that these words could import would be, that the property was not specifically given, but only "its use" for life.

Conceding this effect, then we contend that such a bequest of the use or profits or interest of chattels, conveys the right to the chattels specifically and absolutely. Robinson vs. Fitzherbert, 2 Brown's C. C., 127. Butterfield vs. Butterfield, 1 Ves. Sen., 133. Bradley vs. Perixot, 3 Ves., 324. Keys vs. Goldsbro', 2 Har. & J., 369.

Another clause may be invoked by the other side to effect such variance or qualification in the terms "return to the heirs of her body share and share about." These words import a different order of distribution from that the law of descent would cast in England by the common law, and there the argument might have plausibility at least.

Here they can have no effect, where the law of descent or distribution and that wrought by the will are the same. That they produce no such effect in England, the following authorities will show. Pearson vs. Vickers, 5 East., 548. Doe vs. Smith, 7 T. R., 531. Doe, &c., vs. Cooper, 1 East., 229. Robinson vs. Robinson, 1 Bur., 15. 2 Jarman on Wills, 277, 280, 287.

But the 12th and last clause may be replied upon, to fix the construction of a life estate in Anna Clardy, by operating of the "trust" 377 assigned to be raised in the Executors, as Trustees, "to procure," such remainder to the "heirs."

To this we answer, 1st. That the raising of a trust (if such arise from the terms of the 12th clause, which we deny.) would produce not the asserted effect. Wright vs. Pearson, Amb., 358. Doe ex dem Thong vs. Bedford, 4 Maul. & Sel, 362. 8 T. R. 516-18. 1 Bro. C. C. 313.

2d. But in fact and law, this will raises no proper trust, technically so called.

No estate, vests in the trustees. No interest or property in the subject vests in them.

The estate, title and property in the slaves and lands had previously passed to the legatees in possession and expectancy.

There is certainly no express conveyance of title to the trustees, nor can one arise by implication, as here no power is conveyed "to sell," "to charge," "to settle," or to do any act from which such investure of estate or interest can arise to them. The case in the books nearest to the present, that I can find, is that of Pigot vs. Garnish, Croke, Eliz., 678.

This is, however, a leading case, as appears by reference to Fletcher on trustees, p. 12.

The authority there conferred was similiar to the present, and ruled to be a mere "naked power."

The above remarks apply particularly to the will.

The terms of the deed are not materially variant in their limitation, and should be taken even more strongly against the grantor than the testator, for an obvious reason.

Wills are construed to favor the intention of testator, while grants in deeds are always taken most strongly against the grantor. This is too plain a principle of law to need citation of authorities.

But we need not invoke this principle of construction. The only new clause appearing in the deed different from that in the will, is that the limitation is to the "surviving" heirs of the body of Anna Clardy. The cases I shall cite to prove the unimportance of this term is Richards vs. Lady Bergavinney, 2 Vernon, 324, where the terms used were—"and to such heirs of A's body as shall be living at her death"—terms fully equivalent to surviving heirs. In this case A. was ruled to have an estate tail. Sharp vs. Thompson, 1 Whart., 139. Kiffner vs. Knapper, 6 Watts, 18; Tidball vs. Lupton, 378
1 Rand., 194. Botts vs. Gillespie, 5 Rand., 273.

No trust is set up in this deed, and this point, therefore, does not arise.

II. The second general proposition. That the same terms of limitation being used in the 9th clause, connected with the 8th clause in regard to the slaves, the property in dispute, as were used in relation to the realty in the 8th clause, would have created in said slaves, also at law, an estate tail, if such limitation were allowed.—This so naturally results as a corollary from the first proposition and the facts above stated, that no distinct argument will be required to support it. It is also connected with and involved in the third general proposition, which I propound as follows:

III. The third general proposition: That terms of bequest of chattels real, or of other personalty, which in relation to devises of estates of inheritance would give either an express or implied estate-tail in the first legatee, give the absolute interst or property therein to such first legatee or taker. 4 Kent's Commen., p. 277

The reason given in Kent, and in all the authorities, is that such attempted limitation is personalty as an estate tail, is too remote and tends to produce a pepetuity.

As a rule of English Law the following cases establish it: Attorney Gen. vs. Bailey, 2 Brown C. C., 553; Robinson vs. Fitzherbert, Ibid, 127, Lord Kenyon's opinion; Lord Chatham vs. Tothill, 6 Bro., P. Long & Walker, on same side.

However edifying it may be to the "judicial scholar on whom his great master Coke has bestowed some portion of the gladsome light of jurisprudence," to trace out and dwell upon the intricate history of "the rule in Shelley's case," we are content to enter upon the discussion of the construction of this will and deed according to the simple rules of law as at present understood to exist.—The brief and elegant review of the various decisions of the British and American Courts on this subject from the Year Books down to 1830, to be found in the 4th volume of Chancellor Kent's Commentaries (214 to 233) is quite sufficient to show what is now the law on this subject. "All the modern cases contain one uniform language, and declare that the words heirs of the body, whether in deeds or wills, are construed as words of limitation, unless it clearly and unequivocally appears that they were used to designate certain individuals answering the description of heirs at the death of the party," is the remark of Kent in concluding his review of the English cases. It devolves upon us to satisfy the court that in this case it "clearly and unequivocally appears" that those words are not used in their technical sense; for says Chan. Kent, (Com. 220) "there are several cases in which in a devise, the words heirs or heirs of his body, have been taken to be words of purchase and not of limitation in opposition to the rule in Shelley's case," and then enumerates the several classes of these cases: 1. "Where no estate of freehold is devised to the ancestor." 2. "Where the testator annexes words of explanation to the words heirs, as to the heirs of A. now living, showing thereby that he meant by the word heirs, a mere descriptio personarum, or specific designation of certain individuals." 3. "Where the testator superadds words of explanation, or fresh words of limitation, and a new inheritance is grafted upon the heirs to whom he gives the estate."

In order to determine whether the case at bar comes within either of these exceptions to the rule in Shelley's case, we will exam-
380 ine the two instruments under which we claim title to the negroes in controversy, as remaindermen, after the termination of the life estate of Anner Clardy. And first, as to the deed: We contend that the words "heirs of her body" mean children, and not general heirs, because the other accompanying expressions clearly afford that explanation. First: The property is declared only to be loaned to Anner Clardy, and given to the children. Second: Because the loan is expressly declared to be for life only, and this thrice expressed. Third: Because the remainder is limited to such heirs of her body "as shall survive her," which would be nonsense if applied to heirs generally, but consistent if children are meant.—Fourth: Because the property so given to the surviving heirs of her body is "to be equally divided between them, share and share about," which is a provision that might be inevitably defeated if heirs generally are intended.

Now we contend that these explanatory expressions bring this case within the second rule of exception above quoted from Kent, viz: "Where a testator (or in a deed the donor) annexes words of explanation to the word heirs, as to the heirs of A. now living, showing that he meant by the word heirs, a mere descriptio personarum, or specific designation of certain individuals." In this deed, instead of the explanatory words, "the heirs of A. now living," we have the expression, "the heirs of her body which shall survive her," which equally constitute a "mere descriptio pensonarum, or specific designation of particular individuals." The case given by Kent to illustrate the rule of exception is exactly in point with the case afforded by these instruments. Indeed it is too obvious to require argument that the rule of exception laid down by Kent is as clearly illustrated by this case as the one which he puts. In both, the word heirs is used—in the one the heirs of A. now living, and in the other the heirs of Anner Clardy living at her death. There is exactly the same reason for regarding the one as meaning children, and not heirs generally, as the other, viz: because it excludes the idea of any other.

To show that the case at bar comes properly within some one or other of the exceptions before mentioned, we will cite such American decisions as we have been able to find on this subject. Judge Carmack having already dwelt sufficiently upon the English cases, we shall make no reference to them.

Learned counsel upon the other side laid great stress upon the case 38 of Keating and Wife vs. Reynolds, reported in 1st Bay, 80, because "it is a case decided in South Carolina where this deed was made." We also invoke the particular attention of the court to that case, not only "because it was decided in South Carolina, where the deed was made," but also because it is a case directly in point to sustain our position. It appears in that case that Samuel Thorpe had two daughters, Martha and Sarah. He gave fourteen negroes "to her, the said Martha Thorpe, and the heirs of her body forever." He gave fourteen other negroes "to the said Sarah Thorpe, and the heirs of her body forever" "But if the said Sarah and Martha Thorpe should die without having a lawful heir of their body to live, then and in that case he gave and devised those slaves above mentioned to be equally divided to the survivors." Martha died without issue living at her death, and her husband, Norris, sold some of her fourteen negroes to the defendant, Reynolds. Suit was brought by Sarah and her husbad, Keating, to recover said slaves from Reynolds, and the Supreme Court of South Carolina decided that Sarah and her husband should recover, because, in the language of Judge Waites, "the heirs of her body to live mean children, if they mean anything." So we think in the case at bar that the words "heirs of her body which shall survive her," "mean children, if they mean anything."

The decision in 1st Bay, 80, is not at all shaken by the decision in 2d Bay, 471, for "in the habendum of this deed (in 2d Bay, 471) the negroes were given to Miss Havens for life, and then to the heirs of her body, and in the warranty of this deed, he warrants the negroes to his daughter for life, and then to the heirs of her body."—"The majority of the Judges were of opinion that as the habendum of a deed is that part of it which declares and limits the use of the thing conveyed, and as the negroes in question are limited in the habendum to the heirs of the body of Mrs. Stockton after her death, it created an estate tail of a chattel which was too remote, and vested the property in the first taker," &c.

In no part either of the deed or will, in the case at bar, are the words heirs of her body ever used except with accompanying words of explanation. And this circumstance strikingly distinguishes this case of Stockton vs. Martin (2 Bay 471) from the case at bar, and shows its total inapplicability. But it may be remarked that the decision in Stockton vs. Martin is erroneous in determining that the 38 habendum of a deed shall govern the premises in such a case. This particular question was ably discussed in the case of Rogers vs. Rogers, 3 Wend., 503—which case was briefly as follows:—A devise in these words, "I give, devise and bequeath to my son Thomas Rogers, Jr., for and during his natural life, and the children of his body lawfully begotten, after his decease, all that certain, &c., (describing the premises,) to have and to hold the last mentioned premises unto my said son Thomas Rogers, Jr., for and during his natural life, and after his decease to the heirs of his body lawfully begotten, and to their heirs and assigns forever." Held to convey to Thomas Rogers, Jr., a life estate only, remainder in fee (the statute turning estates tail into fee) to his children. In this case the habendum to the heirs (which would have brought the case within the rule in Shelley's case, and conferred the whole estate upon Thomas Rogers, Jr.,) was construed not to control the premises which devised to the children; and this for two reasons: first, because the intention of the testator is clearly that way, and intention must govern where technical words are not uniformly used; and second, because even in a deed the habendum must give way to the premises. Plowden, 153; 4 Cruise 229; 4 Cruise, title deed, chapter 20, sec. 77; 2 Cokes Rep. (Buckler's case) 55 a; 4 Cruse, 226.

From these authorities, therefore, it appears very clearly that the case of Stockton vs. Martain would have been a case directly in our favor had the point upon which it turned been correctly decided.—And this is also a perfect answer to any objection which has been or may be made, that, in the deed under consideration, the premises are to the heirs of the body surviving, &c., habendum to the heias generally; for, if the superadded words are sufficient to show that the words used in the premises mean children, no words in the habendum can control that inference.

The doctrine of the foregoing cases is also very distinctly stated in Bacon's Abridgement, Vol. 6, p. 198, where it is said, "testator bequeathed to his wife 'a negro girl named Hannah and my horses, &c., and my plantation and all the lands adjoining to it, during her life time,' held to pass but a life estate in the negro girl,"—citing Black vs. Ray, 1 Rev. and Bat., 334.

Also, "a bequest of a slave for life with remainder to the lawful heirs of B., who it appears from the will was alive, is a bequest to

383 the children of B. and is to be divided among those who shall be in esse at the death of the first taker, and is not confined to those born at the death of the testator," citing Simms vs. Garrott, 1 Dev. and Bat. Eq., 393.

The leading case in Pennsylvania on this subject is that of the Lessee of Findlay vs. Riddle, 3 Binney, 139. In that case the facts were these, viz: John Findlay, the elder, gave a certain tract of land to his son, John Findlay, during his natural life, and after his decease, if he should die leaving lawful issue, TO HIS HEIRS, as tenants in common, and their respective heirs and assigns forever. But in case John should die without having lawful issue, then he gave said land to his brother James Findlay, and his heirs and assigns forever. After very long and able arguments on both sides, in which all the cases on this subject were cited and commented on, the Supreme Court decided that John Findlay took only a life estate, and Mr. Justice Yates, in concluding the opinion of the court, said, "I, therefore, feel myself authorized to construe the word heirs, in the first part of the devise, as children or sons and daughters, and as a mere designatio personarum." See this remark of J. Yates, p. 161.

The same doctrine has been established in Virginia. In the case of Warners vs. Mason & wife, 5 Mun., 242, William Warner devised to his son, William, a tract of land "during his natural life, and then to his heirs, lawfully begotten of his body, that is, born at the time of his death, or nine calendar months thereafter," and for want of such heirs, remainder over to his two grandsons, Jacob and George. William Warner, the first taker, dying without heirs, devised the same land to his sister, Mrs. Mason, who took possession thereof. The grandsons, Jacob and George, brought ejectment for the land, and the Supreme Court decided that the words 'heirs of the body lawfully to be begotten, that is born at the time of his death,' &c., were words of purchase and not of limitation. Consequently, it was held that William, the first taker, took only a life estate, and that Jacob and George, the grandsons, took by way of contingent, remainder, William having died without children.

In the case of Higginbotham vs. Rucker, 2 Call, 265, it was decided thus: "A man makes a gift of slaves to his daughter and the heirs of her body, and in case she died without issue, that is, children of her body, the slaves to return to the grantor. This limitation is not too remote and, therefore, is good."

384 In the case of Dunn and Wife vs. Bray, 1 Call's Reps., 294, the words of the devise are: "I give and bequeath unto my son Winter Bray, one negro boy named Peter, and a negro wench named Dinah, and her increase, to him and his heirs forever; but in case my said son Winter should die and leave no issue, THEN I give all the said negroes hereinbefore devised to my said son Winter, to my son Charles and his heirs forever." Held, "that in the present devise the remainder over to Charles (which was clearly intended to take effect upon the death of Winter, without leaving issue living at the time of his death, and not upon a general failure of issue,) is good as an executory devise within the rule" of exception to the rule in Shelley's case. Here the intention is made to supply the words, "living at the time of his death," which are not in the will. In the case at bar similar words are inserted, viz: "which shall survive her."

Where the testator bequeathed the improvement of certain personal property to his daughter during her natural life and at her decease to be equally divided among her heirs, it was ruled that by the word heirs was intended children, and that the legatee took an interest for life in the property with remainder to her children. Ellis vs. the Props. Es. M. Bridge, 2 Pick., 243.

2d. But there is another rule laid down by Kent, 4th Vol., 222 for the purpose of determining when the words heirs of the body, &c., shall be construed as words of limitation and when of purchase. He expresses it thus:

"If the term heir, as used in the instrument, comprehended the whole class of heirs, and they become entitled, on the death of the ancestor, to the estate, in the same manner, and to the same extent and with the same descendible qualities as if the grant or devise had been simply to A. and his heirs, then the word heirs is a word of limitation, and the intention will not control the legal effect of the word."

We shall attempt to show that this property would not, under this grant and will "descend in the same manner as if the grant had been simply to A. and her heirs." If this property had been granted or devised simply to A. and her heirs, how would it have descended in the event that A. died leaving two children and twelve grandchildren by one of her deceased children? I answer, it would have descended so that the property would have been equally divided into three parts, of which A.'s two children would have taken two parts, 385 and her twelve grandchildren the other part—the grandchildren taking per stirpes. But does the property descend "in the same manner" under the provisions of this deed and devise, supposing the words heirs to have its legal meaning? Certainly not; for it is given "to the heirs of her body which shall survive her, to be equally divided amongst them;" now a grandchild comes within the technical meaning of the word heirs, in this deed and devise, its technical meaning and carrying into effect the provisions of the devise in the case supposed, we would have to divide this property, not into three, but into fourteen parts, of which each of the heirs, children and grandchildren, would take one part. The grandchildren in this case would take per capita and not per stirpes, so that it is very clear that the heirs of A. would not "become entitled to the estate of their ancestor in the same manner, and to the same extent, and with the same descendible qualities as if the grant or devise had been simply to A. and her heirs." Therefore, if Kent be correct, the word heirs in this deed and devise must be construed not as a word of limitation, but a word of purchase. See 3 Binney, 158, 166.

As to the will in this case, the view here taken is equally applicable as to the deed. The property is loaned to Anner Clardy for life, and "after her decease to return to the heirs of her body, share and share about;" so that the will falls literally within the two rules of exception shewn to control and explain the deed.

We, therefore, conclude that this case is clearly embraced in two of the rules which exempt wills and deeds from the operation of the rule in Shelly's case. The reported cases cited are offered rather to prove the application of these rules to the case at bar, than to prove the existence of those rules, which we contend they do abundantly. These authorities, we think, should be regarded as of more weight than those from England. They are regarded as leading cases, and are from the States of South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Pennsylvania and New York.

It is obvious from the face of these instruments that if the children of Anner Clardy are deprived of this property, it will be in spite of the "clear and unequivocal" intention to the contrary of their grandfather, William Gore.

BALTZELL, J., delivered the following opinion: 386

The will and deed under which both parties claim in this case having been made in the State of South Carolina where the testator and grantor lived and where the property at the time was, the laws of that state as administerded by her judicial tribunals must form the rule of its decision. Story's Conflict, 402, 409; 4 Wilson and Shaw, 28, 37.

Referring to them we find that as early as the year 1795 a devise "of negroes to a daughter distinct from her husband during her life and at her death to the heirs of her body," was held to create an estate tail, the words were considered words of limitation and not ged to create an estate tail so as to vest an absolute interest in the daughter. Dott vs. Cunn., 1 Bay, 453. In 1833 the terms "I lend to my daughter Peggy Starke four negroes, and to another daughter other negroes during their natural lives, and then to the heirs of their bodies," with an appointment of executors of the will "in trust for the intents and purposes therein contained," were likewise adjudged to create an estate tall so as to vest an absolute interest in the daughter, and that the marital rights of the husband attached giving to his administrator the right of the property after his death,—

Judge O'Neill who delivered the opinion of the court saying "I have struggled to give effect to what I believe the clear intention of the testator that Mrs. Starke should take an estate for life and her children at her death should take as purchasers. But the technical rule is too strong and too well settled that words heirs of the body must be considered words of limitation and not words of purchase and that consequently the estate vests in the first taker." Hinson and Wife vs. Picket, 1 Hill, 37. This case is decisive of all the points in the present controversy, the terms "heirs of the body," "lend," and the trust in the will, or tantamount expressions thereto having been all very fully considered. The only difference is in the expressions "share and share about," to be found in the will before this Court, and "hath given to the heirs of her body which shall survive her," and to "be equally divided between her surviving heirs as their exclusive property," in the deed. We have not been able to find a direct adjudication in South Carolina upon these; the nearest approach to it being the case of Stockton vs. Martin in which the deed was "to the daughter during her life and then to her chil-

387 dren share and share alike, habendum to the daughter for life and the heirs of her body with a warranty to the like effect. The majority of the court held the habendum the controlling part of the deed and adjudged an estate tail so as to give the property to the first taker. 2d Bay, 471.

This case might be regarded as decisive so far as the words "share and share about" are concerned, as they formed a component part of the deed, and if not noticed by the court as material this of itself would be indicative of their opinion as to their immateriality. There is weight too in the fact that no case of recent date has been cited to us of the same court overruling or calling in question its authority, and none coming within our reach we have been strongly inclined to the opinion that it should be held as conclusive. We have not thought proper in a case like the present where a question is raised as to the law of a sister state to inquire into the grounds or reason for a decision made or given by her Courts and to say what they ought to have decided. This would be transcending our powers and assuming an office for which we are by no means disposed to assert our competency—it would be treating a court long distinguished for intelligence and ability with less than the regard justly its due either by courtesy or the rules of law. Our duty is to ascertain the law of that state, by no means to say what it ought to be. The decisions on this subject will, we think, be found in harmony with the English law which they profess to follow as will be seen in numerous cases to which a reference may be given, so that we have less reluctance to give to them all the weight of a decisive authority on the very point in question.

"The terms share and share alike create a tenancy in common." Bunch vs. Hurst, 3 Des., 288; Woodgate vs. Unwin, 4 Sim., 129; Westcott vs. Cady, 5 John. Ch., 334.

In the case of Doe and Candler vs. Smith "where a testator devised freehold lands to his daughter and the heirs of her body forever as tenants in common and not as joint tenants and in case of her dying without issue then over, it was held that the daughter took an estate tail." 7 D. & E., 532. So in Pierson vs. Vickers, 5 East., 548; Bennett vs. Earl Tankville, 19 Vesey, 170; Cole vs. Goldsmith, 7 Taunt, 209.

In Jenson vs. Wright decided in the House of Lords after full argument (and Lord Eldon said no case was ever better argued at 388 that bar,) the devise was to W. and after his decease to the heirs of the body of W. in such shares as he should appoint and for want of this then to the heirs of the body of W. share and share alike as tenants in common and if but one child the whole to such child, &c., it was held that W. took an estate tail." 2 Bligh., 1.

So in the recent case of Bosnal vs. Harvey with like provisions. In Atkinson vs. Featherstone, "the devise was to I. and E. his wife for their natural lives, and for the life of the longer liver of them and after the decease of the survivor to the heirs of the body of E. by I. already begotten or to be begotten, to be equally divided among them, share and share alike," it was held an estate tail. 1 Barn. and Ad., 944.

Survivorship is by no means an uncommon form of an estate tail —thus a grant to A. and B. and the survivor and the heirs of such survivor, is of frequent occurrence. "The doctrine of survivorship is the distinguishing incident of title by joint tenancy, and therefore at common law the entire tenancy or estate, upon the death of any of the joint tenants went to the survivors, and so on to the last survivor who took an estate of inheritance." "The common law favored title by joint tenancy by reason of this very right of survivorship." 4 Kent, 360.

We do not intend to convey the idea that in respect to the estate tail, there a uniform entire joint tenancy. On the contrary, it forms an exception to the rule "for inasmuch as the devisees with some exceptions cannot either in fact or contemplation of law have common heirs of their bodies, they are by necessity of reason tenants in common of the estate tail." Co. Litt., 184 a; 2 Vern, 545; Cooper, 777.

"As the reason, however, applies only to the inheritance in tail, and not, to the immediate freehold, the devisees are joint tenants for life with several inheritances in tail, so that on the death of one of them, whether he leave issue or not, the surviving devisee becomes entitld for life of his share under the joint tenancy and the inheritance in tail descends to the issue if any subject to such estate for life." Jarman on Wills, 158.

Nor is restriction to particular heirs destructive to the estate tail —thus to the heirs male or female—to the first or next heir male. 8 Viner, 234. Such an estate (estate tail) may be created "by an expression denoting an intention to give the devisee an estate of inheritance descendible to his or some of his lineal, but not to his collateral heirs which is the characteristic of an estate tail as distin- 38 guished from a fee simple. 2 Jarman on Wills, 232.

The term "surviving heirs' is one of unusual occurrence in the books, for whilst we have "survivors," "surviving children" "sons" "issue" and "daughters," there is in the books no such word attached to heirs as far as we have been able to discover, and we are inclined to the opinion that so connected, it is without meaning, neither enlarging nor contracting the estate. The heirs of Mrs. Clardy from necessity are those who survive her at her death—they could not have preceded her. Nemo est haeries viventis. There is no heir until the death of the ancestor. The fair import of the clause then would seem to be that the estate is to go to the heirs of her body at her decease. If this view be correct the case is freed from difficulty, and the deed is a naked grant to the heirs of the body.

It may however be more satisfactory supposing that we are mistaken in this respect, to consider how far words superadded to the term heirs of the body, change the character of the devise and whether by possibility this word "surviving" may produce this effect. It seems that "if the superadded words of limitation operate to change the course of descent, they will convert the words on which they are grafted into words of purchase." Jarman, 276.

It is not to be inferred that the words heirs of the body, are incapable of control or explanation by the effect of superadded expressions, clearly demonstrating that the testator used these words in some other than their ordinary acceptation, and as descriptive of another class of objects. Some of the examples given of words producing this change are of a devise to a first, second, third and every other son of B. and the heirs of the body of such, first, second, &c., son.

Love vs. Daviers, 2 Ld. Ray., 1561. To the first son of the body of E. and the heirs male of the body of such first son, and for default of such issue, to the use of the second son of the body of E., and so to all and every other, the heirs male of the body of E., and to the heirs male of their body according to seniority of age.

Lisle vs. Gray, 2 Lev., 263. These cases it is said leave no doubt of the design of the testator and we conceive do not. 2 Jarman, 302.

The cases bearing the nearest analogy to the present are to this effect. A person devised to his three daughters to be equally divided, and if any of them died before the other then the one to be the other's heir equally to be divided, and if his three daughters died 39 without issue then over, adjudged that his daughters took an estate tail. King vs. Rumbal, Cro. Ja., 448.

In Richards vs. Lady Bergaviney, the devise was to the Lady Bergaviney, and such heir of her body as shall be living at her death with remainder over, and it was adjudged an estate tail. 2 Vernon, 324.

A devise to W. for life, and after his decease to the use of the heirs, male, of the body of W., lawfully begotten, severally, respectively, and in remainder the one after the other, as they and every of them shall be in seniority of age, and priority of birth, gave W. an estate tail. Lord Thurlow said where the estate is so given that it is to go to every person who can claim as heir to the first taker, the word heirs must be a word of limitation. All heirs taking as heirs must take by descent. Jones vs. Morgan, 1 B. C. C., 206.

Now it is not perceived that the word "surviving" clearly demonstrates that the testator used it and the word heirs of the body in some other than the ordinary acceptation of the latter expression, and as descriptive of another class of objects. It is clear that it is not embraced within any of the cases which have been held to alter the rule. Obviously those who take as surviving heirs claim as heirs to the mother at her death, and taking as heirs they take by descent. According to our view the property would descend to the whole class of heirs of Mrs. Clardy, and they would become entitled to the estate in same manner, and to the same extent, and with the same descendible qualities as if the grant had been simply to her and her heirs. 4 Kent, 222.

It is scarcely necessary to quote authority to the effect that where personal estate is bequeathed in language which, if applied to real estate, would create an estate tail, it vests absolutely in the person who would be the immediate donee in tail, and it is immaterial whether the bequest itself contain the words of limitation or refer to a devise of realty creating an estate tail. 2 Jarman on Wills, 492; 1 Beav., 150.

We have been asked to consider this question as a new one, and and as if the cases of Doe & Laning, Doe & Goff, and a few others asserting a doctrine contrary to those cited to sustain the rule in Shelley's case still continued to be authority in the English Courts. It has been insisted that these cases have not been overruled, and are quite reconcilable with the latter authorities; but we think differently. That great jurist the late Chancelllor Kent, than whom no one could speak with greater truth and propriety on this subject says: "The rule in Shelley's case survived all the rude assaults which it received in the controversy under Perrin & Blake, and it has continued down to the present time in full vigor with commanding authority, and with its roots struck immovably deep in the foundations of the English law. All the modern cases contain one uniform language, and declare that the words heirs of the body, whether in deeds or wills, are construed as words of limitation, unless it clearly and unequivocally appears that they were used to designate certain individuals answering the description of heirs at the death of the party."

An English author of whose recent production the present Chief Baron of the Exchequer has spoken "as a very learned work," after noticing the case of Perrin and Blake, says: "since this solemn determination the rule in question, has been regarded as one of the most firmly established rules of property, and strictly speaking no instance can be adduced of a departure from it." 2 Jarm., 243; 14 M. & W., 706.

The same author says, after speaking of the various cases opposed to Doe vs. Laming, "we may then reasonably hope never to hear the case of Doe vs. Laming again cited as an authority in a court of law." 2 Jarm., 288.

In Jessen vs. Wright, Lord Redesdale said: "It is impossible to decide this case without holding that Doe vs. Goff is not law." 2 Jarm., 292.

It is said: "if the children of Anner Clardy are deprived of this property it will be in spite of the clear and unequivocal intention to the contrary of their grandfather, William Gore." To language of this kind we would oppose the forcible remarks of the Supreme Court of South Carolina in the case of Carr vs. Porter, with this additional observation, that after an acquiescence by the people of that State for upwards of fifty years in a law as announced by her courts, it is rather too late to call in question its propriety. The reply to such remark is best made in the language of the court responsible for the result to which we have arrived. They condemn with great force and propriety the idea of a Judge making a decision according to his own views of the intention of a testator.—"Wherever a construction has been given by a competent tribunal to any form of words, such decision has always been held obligatory on all succeeding Judges in cases of wills as in any other cases. Fearne speaking of the notion that we must lay aside all precedent in the construction of wills, and that a Judge must be governed by his own views, says, 'such a mode of construing wills, if ever fully established, would open an almost unlimited power to the Judge of disposing of the property of testators, and diverting the circulation of it to his own mind.' If rules and maxims of law were to ebb and flow with the taste of the judge, or to assume that shape which in his fancy best becomes the times, &c., I should be glad to know what person would venture to purchase an estate without first having the judgment of a Court of justice respecting the identical title which he means to purchase." 1 McCord, 71.

After the most mature consideration we are of opinion that the court below erred in giving judgment for the defendant. It should, in our opinion have been for plaintiff on the special verdict.

BAILEY vs. CLARDY.

BALTZELL, Justice:

This case is in effect decided by the opinion just delivered in the case of Watts, administrator, &c., vs. Clardy, and for the reasons given therein must be reversed, with directions to the Circuit Court to dismiss the bill, and dissolve the injunction of complainant.

JOHN W. SIMONTON, vs. PEDRO A. GANDOLFO.

Where the mortgage of real estate covered by a mortgage conveys to a purchaser, and the purchaser to complete his title procures the mortgagee to release to mortgagor, and promises in consideration of such release to pay a given sum to the mortgagee, Held:

That such promise need not be in writing.

Appeal from Monroe Circuit Court.

The plaintiff brought assumpsit against defendant, and in his declaration sets forth substantially, that on the 15th of January, 1847, one Fielding A. Brown was possessed of certain lots in Key West by deed from one John Barcroft, trustee of the plaintiff, and that Barcroft as trustee held a lien on the same by mortgage executed by Brown for the purchase money. That Brown conveyed parts of two of said lots (4 and 5 in Whitehead's plan of said city) to defendant. That defendant agreed with plaintiff to pay him six hundred dollars upon the execution by plaintiff of a release to said Brown and his assigns of all claims or demands which said Barcroft, trustee as aforesaid, had "against said Brown as mortgagor as aforesaid for and on account of the said mortgage," and that the plaintiff on the 16th of April, 1847, executed the release.

The defendant demurred to the declaration on the ground that the assumpsit should have been in writing, and also so alleged in the declaration.

The demurrer was sustained in the court below and judgment entered on 22d November, 1847, for defendant.

Mr. Towle, for Appellant:

Two points are raised by the demurrer:

First. Is the contract declared on one within the statute of Fraud and void because not in writing:

Second. Could the defendant demur for the reason that no copy was given, and that declaration did not state that it was in writing.

I. To answer the second point first: Admitting the contract within Statute Frauds, (Duv. 206) yet the demurrer is not sustainable.

1. No copy of the cause of action is required to be filed. This case does not come under any of those mentioned in Duval, 96, Sec. 35. If required, the remedy is not by demurrer—the defendant should apply for a rule.

2. The declaration need not have stated the contract to be in writing. (Salk. 519 anon.) The plaintiff was not bound to anticipate objections which might be raised by defendant. 1 Ch. Pl. 222.

3. The demurrer is defective—in not being based upon matter appearing on the record. It assumes a fact, which the declaration nowhere states—to wit: that the contract was parol.

II. The contract was not within the Statute of Frauds.

1. The contract was not about LAND. The thing released is a debt due by F. A. Brown—not land. Though the mortgage created a lien on the land, still that is only an incident, and THAT is considered as personalty going to the executor and not the heir. Releasing the debt extinguishes the mortgage and no reconveyance is necessary. 4 Kent's Com., 193 and 194 in notes, 5th edition.

Again, the releasor was not even the mortgagee, but a cestui que trust who had no claim whatever upon the land but an equitable claim on the money and its income, &c.

2. It was not a "sale" which was contracted for. Sale implies a transfer over. Here was none, but a mere cancellation—extinguishment.

3. This contract is not within our statute of Frauds though it may be within the English statute. There is a very important difference between them. Our statute does not like the English avoid a contract or sale, but only a "contract for the sale." The foundation of the present action is not a "contract" to sell or to do any other thing in futuro, but a sale or release executed and complete.

4. It is not within even the English Statute. A "contract or sale" (to use the words of the statute,) which is executed or even party executed, is not void for want of a writing. Clarke vs. Vankirk, 14 Serg. & Rawl., 354; Teal vs. Anty, 4 Moore, 547; 2 Broderip & Bingham, 99; Hoby vs. Roebuck, 7 Taunt., 157; 3 Barn. & Ad., 899; Wilbur vs. Paine, 1 Ham., Ohio R., 251; Pomeroy vs. Winship, 12 Mass., 523; Chapman vs. Allen, Kirby, Conn. R., 400; Davenport vs. Mason, 15 Mass. R., 82-89; Crosby vs. Wadsworth, 6 East., 602; Miller vs. Hower, 2 Rawl., Penn. R., 53; Jones vs. Peterman, 3 Serg. & Rawl., 543; 2 Marsh., 433; Parkhurst vs. Van Courtland, 14 John. R., 15.

Carmack & Baker, for Appellee:

This is an action of assumpsit on a parol promise for the purchase of an interest in land, that is to say: the relinquishment of a mortgage held by the trustee of the plaintiff.

1st. As no written promise is declared on, or set out in the declaration, or copy of such writing given as required by the act of Legislature, Duv., 96, Sec. 35; it results that the declaration is upon a verbal promise.

2d. By the act regulating conveyancing, Duv., 206, Sec. 10, it is provided that no action shall be brought to charge any person for the sale of land, or of any uncertain interest in or concerning them, unless the agreement or promise upon which such action shall be

395 brought, or some note or memorandum thereof shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith. See also sec. 1, of this act. Its phraseology imparts light as to construction of sec. 10.

Sec. 4. Stat. 29, Charles 2, which is in force here, uses the words, "or upon any contract or sale of lands, &c., or any interest in or concerning them." Rob. on Frauds, Append., 468.

If no action shall be brought none can be maintained.

A release or any agreement to discharge a mortgage is embraced by the statute.

A release according to Blackstone is the conveyance of a man's rights in land. 2 Bl., 324; Litt., 445, 465-6; 1 Inst., 264, 267; Am. Com. L. Title St. Frauds; Day's Digest; Kain vs. Sanger, 14 John., 89; Jackson, ex dem., Bain vs. Talver, 8 John., 370.

Baltzell, J., delivered the following opinion:

The defendant Gandolo demurred in the court below to the declaration of the plaintiff, assigning the following special grounds:

1st. "That the assumpsit declared on should have been in writing and so stated in the declaration."

2d. "A parol promise respecting the sale of lands is illegal and cannot be enforced in a court of law." Judgment on the demurrer having been for defendant the plaintiff has appealed to his court.

We do not regard the agreement as set forth to be within the statute of Frauds. Mortgages are not considered as conveyances of lands within the statute. 2 Burr., 969; 1 Pow. Mortg., 144.

In Massachusetts where it is held that the equity of redemption may not be transferred by parol, an action was maintained by the grantor against the grantee to recover the consideration acknowledged in the deed to have been paid. The Court saying "it is not a contract for the sale of lands, that contract was executed and finished by the deed. This is only a demand for money arising out of that contract." Scott vs. McFarland, 13 Mass., 311; Wilkinson vs. Scott, 17 Mass., 249.

In Hess vs. Fox. Executor of Fox, plaintiff declared on a special agreement to this effect, that plaintiff being indebted to Fox the testator in the sum of $400 secured by mortgage, it was agreed that plaintiff should convey the premises by absolute deed, and deliver them to Fox, and he should discharge plaintiff from the debt of $400, 396 and sell the premises at the best price, and pay over to plaintiff any surplus over the $400. This was insisted to be void within the statute of frauds. The court say after reciting the statute which is substantially the same as ours, "the meaning is that no interest in land shall pass otherwise than by deed or writing," and they held the agreement not within the statute but valid and binding. 10 Wend., 439, 440.

Now in that case the agreement was to the benefit of the mortgagor, in this it is the mortgagee that asks the aid of the court in his behalf. The principle we regard as the same, the statute not operating in the one case we cannot see how it can be made to bear in the other. There is another difference. Gandolfo is the assignee of the mortgagor, having purchased a portion of the lots. In reference to these he occupies the same position to the mortgagee as the original mortgagor, with the exception that he is not liable to judgment on the notes originally given. As assignee, however, a suit for foreclosure would properly be maintainable against him, and a decree for the sale of the lots be had against him. We then see that he had a direct and fixed interest of his own in the discharge of the mortgage. There was express benefit and advantage to him, and injury to the plaintiff in parting with the security of the mortgage by the release given, thus making an original independent promise in his behalf. 2 Peter's. S. C. R., 182; 5 Bing., 464.

A different result could not well be arrived at without holding the release of the mortgage void and the lots held by Gandolfo subject to the incumbrance. It is scarcely consistent with right, that he shall have the advantage and benefit of the release, and keep the money also which he was to pay the mortgagee for it.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed and the cause remanded with directions to overrule the demurrer of defendant to the plaintiffs declaration, and for further proceedings to be had therein agreeably to the principles of law.

Executor of Jesse H. Willis, vs. John S. Shepard. 39

A judgment in favor of one execution creditor of an estate upon a rule against another execution creditor of the estate, determining the right of the parties to moneys in the hands of the Sheriff is irregular, such mode of proceeding not being authorized by Common Law or Statute.

The proper course in such case is for each execution creditor to take his rule against the Sheriff.

Appeal from Leon Circuit Court.

Jesse H. Willis, plaintiff, in an execution against the executors of Alfred M. Gatlin, upon motion, obtained a rule in the Leon Circuit Court, against Alfred A. Fisher, Sheriff, John S. Shepard, assignee of the Union Bank of Florida, and William D. Moseley, plaintiffs in other executions in the same court, against the executors of Gatlin, to show cause instanter, why the said Sheriff should not pay over to the attorneys of the said Willis, certain moneys arising from a sale of slaves made by virtue of sundry executions against Gatlin's estate, including the execution in favor of Willis.

It does not appear what answers were made by the defendants to the rule, except that according to the bill of exceptions, the Sheriff at the hearing made a return of all the executions under which the sale was made, and of the levies and sales, &c., and that testimony was taken to prove various facts deemed important, and that other facts were admitted and entered by consent in the bill of exceptions.

The following entry of the final decision in the court below appears in the record:—

"Upon hearing the several parties in interest and claiming the proceeds of the said sale of the first Monday in December last: It is ordered, that the sum of four hundred and five dollars, the proceed of the sale of Ben Tillet be deducted from the amount in the Registry of the court, and that the residue of said sum, be distributed pro rata amongst and upon the execution in favor of said Willis, numbered 2981, and the executions numbered 2982, 2983, and 2984, in favor of the Union Bank of Florida, and the execution numbered 2985, in favor of William D. Moseley; the execution numbered 2887 in favor of the said Union Bank of Florida, upon which John S. Shepard, the assignee, ordered a stay of execution, 39 being considered as dormant, the stay thus ordered operating as a waiver and relinquishment of all the levies made under it, except that of the 7th of October, 1844, which has been otherwise disposed of. And the said Jesse H. Willis, by his attorney, prayed an appeal from the foregoing order, to the Supreme Court, which is granted; and the said John S. Shepard, by his attorney, also prayed a cross appeal therefrom, in case said appeal of the said Jesse H. Willis, shall be prosecuted by him, to the end that the questions be decided by the Supreme Court: First, Whether his execution, numbered 2887, is not entitled to the whole of the moneys in controversy. And, second, Whether if it be not entitled to the whole it is not entitled to a pro rata portion thereof, with all the other executions, which is also granted, and by consent of parties, bond and security is dispensed with on said appeals respectively, and by consent of parties, it is further ordered, that these several orders be entered as of the 20th day of November last."

"THOMAS DOUGLAS, Judge."

Thompson & Hagner, for Appellants.

Long & Walker, for Appellee.

Baltzell, J., delivered the following opinion:

We have not been able to decide the important question presented to us in the argument of counsel, upon any rule or principle of law satisfactory to ourselves. The case in this court is between Willis's executor, appellant, and Shepard appellee, and there is also a cross appeal. In the court below it was entitled, Willis against Gatlin's executors, and was commenced by rule as well against Shepard as the Sheriff and Moseley, ordering them to appear and show cause why the Sheriff should not pay over to Willis's attorneys moneys arising from sale of certain slaves, &c. To this there was no answer by any one. The trial seems to have progressed between Shepard and Willis until finally an order was passed for "the distribution of the residue after deducting $405 the proceeeds of sale of a negro from the amount in the registry of the court." Now we are not aware of any such mode of proceeding at common law or by statute as a rule between two individuals to try the right of money in the hands of a third person, the Sheriff. There is no statute authorizing it that we are aware of, and by the common law and a special rule of the court also, a rule by way of attachment for contempt, was allowed against an officer to compel the payment of money when collected under execution. But the jurisdiction is against the officer, and the authority is ample to compel obedience to the order of the court. But where is the jurisdiction or authority for a rule of this kind between private individuals? Suppose a judgment in the present case in favor of one or the other parties, how is it to operate? Can it enforce obedience? Neither of the parties has the money, and the Sheriff is not a party, nor does it appear from the record that he has the money in his possession. To whom would the order be directed? We see a difficulty in the order of the court below to that effect—it is directed to no one.

But there is another objection to the present mode of proceeding. Shepard is defendant in the rule, and required to shew cause why the money should not be paid to Willis. He prefers no claim of his own, and according to legal principles no judgment could be given in his favor, yet in this court and the court below he claims, and is allowed, a share in the distribution. The proper course, in our opinion, is for such claimant to take his rule against the Sheriff—the allowance of one will be the refusal of the others. By an order of consolidation all can be tried together, and in case of appeal by any, the stay of the others may be had as directed until final decision.

Inn Blewitt vs. Nicholson, an application of a like character to decide questions raised in argument, and not by the case in the record was considered by the court, and deniend after mature consideration. We see no reason to change the determination then expressed. It is not matter of mere form, but of substance. We consider it by far safer and more prudent, more in the spirit of the constitution, and in harmony with the character of our institutions to keep within the range and limits of a rightful jurisdiction than to subject ourselves to the reproach of traveling beyond it, and exercising a doubtful and questionable power.

We are therefore of opinion that the order of the court below be reversed and set aside, and this cause remanded for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

00 THOMAS HARRIS AND LUKE MOORE vs. A. H. COLE.

An appeal is the only proper method whereby to bring up a degree in Chancery to this Court, for review and revision. A Writ of Error will not lie in such case.

Writ of Error to Circuit Court for Columbia county, to reverse a decree in Chancery.

Mr. McCants, for Plaintiff in Error.

Mr. Hagner, for Defendant in Error.

DOUGLAS, Ch. J., delivered the following opinion:

This is a suit in Chancery which was brought up from the Circuit Court of Columbia county by a writ of error, and a motion is now made on behalf of the defendant to dismiss it, on the ground that a writ of error will not lie in such a case.

This is the same ground upon which the case of Richard Bradford, administrator of Leigh Read, deceased, vs. Wm. Marvin and N. M. Martin, was dismissed on a former day of the present term of this court, and the motion must therefore prevail for the reasons assigned in that case, to which however we deem it proper to add another, not then adverted to, but which we consider material, viz: The difference between the object and purpose of a writ of error and an appeal.

The object of a writ of error is to review and correct an error of law, which is not amendable or cured at common law, by some of the statutes of amendment and jeofails. 3 Bl. Comm., 405; 1 Bac. Abr. title Error; 2 Saunders,46, note 6; Graham's Pr. B., 4; 1 Tidd's Pr. Chap., 43.

Tomlin in his Law Dict., 647, says "The writ of error only lies upon matter of law arising on the face of the proceedings, so that no evidence is required to substantiate or support it," and Bro. P. C., 515 is cited.

"The writ lies (says Viner) when a man is grieved by any error in the foundation, proceedings, judgment or execution, and thereupon it is called "breve de errore corrigendo." 9 Viner's Abr., 473, letter A., title Error.

An appeal is defined to be the removal of a cause from the sen- 401 tennce of an inferior to a superior Judge. The United States vs. Wonson, Jun., 1 Gallison's Rep., 13; or as Blackstone has expressed it, 4 Comm., 312: "A complaint to a Superior Court of an injustice done by an inferior one." Its object is to review the whole case upon its merits. An nappeal differs from proceedings in error under which the errors alleged to have been committed in the proceedings are examined, and if any have been committed the first judgment is reversed because in the appeal, the whole case is examined and tried as if it had not been tried before. 1 Bourvier's L. Dict., 114; Sergeant's Const. law article, upon courts of the United States, page, 50; Conn. vs. Penn, 5 Wheat. Reps., 424.

Of course we do not here allude to the appeal in cases at law provided for by our statute. (Thompson's Digest, 446; Duval's Comp., 108,) which it has uniformly been held only to bring up the errors in the proceeding, in the same manner as would a writ of error. And so Mr. Justice Story held under a statute of Masaschusetts similar to ours, on that subject above cited. After an able review of the question in which he refers to the various statutes of that State, relating to the matter, and to numerous authorities he says: "I am clearly of opinion that an appeal in a common law suit from a District Court removes error of law only, for the consideration of this (Circuit) Court."

Our remarks are intended to shew that according to our view of the law, an appeal is the only proper method whereby to bring up a decree in Chancery to this court, for review and revision, and when thus brought up, the whole case is before the court for that purpose.

In the case of Anderson and Thompson vs. Biddle, 9 Missouri Rep., 580, it was expressly ruled that "a writ of error will not lie to a decree in Chancery."

The motion is therefore sustained and the case dismissed.

Per Curiam.

RICHARD H. LONG, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, vs. BENJAMIN F. ALLEN, USE, &C., DEFENDANT IN ERROR.

In an action upon a note given to secure the payment of the purchase money of lands, an equity existing in a third person is not sufficient to sustain a plea of failure of consideration.

A mere equity in another person is no defence at law, in an action brought to recover the purchase money. There must be fraud or eviction or something equivalent thereto; or admitted or unquestionable paramount title.

When the vendor of land has a patent from the United States, and the payment of the purchase money is resisted on the ground that there is an outstanding title in another person, evidenced by a receipt given to such other person by the Receiver of the Land Office, the defence is not such a one as can be set up in a court of law against the person holding and exhibiting the patent, and who is seeking to recover on a note given by the purchaser. Especially will a court not be inclined to admit such a defence, where it appears that, at the time of the purchase, the purchaser had knowledge of the existence of the claim so set up.

A bond or covenant constitutes a good and valuable consideration for a note given upon a sale of lands; and a want or failure of title is no defence to an action on the note.

A court of law, though the proper tribunal to try the title to land, will not try such title collaterally.

This case was brought up by writ of error from Jackson Circuit Court. The action, which was assumpsit, was brought by Allen as administrator of Richard C. Allen, deceased, for the use of the Kentucky Asylum for teaching the deaf and dumb, and was founded upon a note given by Richard H. Long, the plaintiff in error, to the said Richard C. Allen in his life time, and which, it was admitted, was 404 given to secure the purchase money for the northwest quarter of section twenty-two, in township five, of range ten, north and west, purchased from Allen, as the agent of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum of Kentucky.

The cause was tried before Judge MAGRAE, at the Fall Term of Jackson Circuit Court, 1846.

The defendant in the court below and the plaintiff in error here, pleaded non asumpsit, and a failure of consideration and want of title in the Deaf and Dumb Asylum.

To rebut the plea of a failure of consideration and want of title in the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, the plaintiff below offered in evidence the original patent for the land sold, signed by John Q. Adams, President of the United States, and dated on the 31st day of July, 1829, conveying the absolute title to the Asylum. The plaintiff also proved upon the trial that defendant went into possession of the land, and that he has always remained in the quiet enjoyment of the same.

The defendant, to supoprt his plea of failure of consideration and want of title, offered in evidence a receipt signed by R. K. Call, Receiver of the Land Office at Tallahassee, dated January 1, 1827, given to Charles Wiliamson, assignee of William T. Kilbee, for a sum of money paid by him for the identical land sold by Allen to defendant. This receipt of the Receiver of the Land Office was offered for the purpose of showing that the title to the land was outstanding and in another person, to wit: in Charles Williamson. The defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that the receipt was evidence of title to the land in Williamson, which was received; and the court instructed the jury, that the receipt was not evidence of title against the patent.

Defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that it was competent for them to inquire and decide from the evidence offered by said receipt and patent, whether the United States had not parted with the title to said land, before the grant of the patent—and if so, wheher the patent was not void, so that the plaintiff could not make a good title to defendant—which instruction the court refused, and charged the jury that it was not competent for a court of law to inquire into the validity of the patent in the mode proposed.

Defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury, that, under his replication, the plaintiff was bound to prove that the Kentucky Asylum was authorized, by its act of incorporation, to sell and convey 405 real estate belonging to it, and that, having failed to do so, the defendant was entitled to a verdict—which instruction the court also refused to give, but charged that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict upon the evidence.

The bill of exceptions shows that the defendant adduced in evidence a paper which was called a title bond, given by R. C. Allen, for the Asylum, containing a covenant to make good and sufficient legal conveyance, upon payment of the note given by defendant.

The court in this case instructed the jury generally, that, whatever might be the law in regard to the validity and force of the papers submitted by the defendant, there being no other evidence to show fraud or mistake in the rendition and execution of the patent exhibited, the latter was conclusive in law as to the title of the plaintiff, and that the same having been tendered to the defendant as evidence of title, the latter could not at law, upon the evidence in this case, avoid the payment of the note sued on.

To all which opinions and instructions, the defendant below excepted; and by his counsel assigned for error in this court the instructions so given and refused.

Carmack, Stephens & Baker, for Plaintiff in Error.

The question presented by the assignment of error is, whether the plaintiff in error, Long, was not under the proof entitled to a verdict, on the ground that the title to the land purchased was not in the Asylum, but in Williamson, assignee of Kilbee.

1. Under the contract with the Kentucky Asylum, Long had a right to insist upon a title clear from suspicion. 1 Eng. Com. Law, case of Maberly vs. Robins, 214. 12 Johns., 247. 4 Taunton, 334.

A contract to make and execute "a good and sufficient deed to convey title is not performed unless a good title passes by the deed." Chitty on Cont., p. 729—note 1.

The party must be able to convey such a title as the other party has a right to expect. Idem.

2. Had the Kentucky Asylum a clear title to the land purchased by Long?

The evidence in the case proves that, before the patent under which the Kentucky Asylum claims, was obtained, a certificate for the same land was issued to Williamson.

It is admitted that, in an action at law between the patentee and the tenant in possession who holds against the patent, the patent 40 is conclusive of title. See Bagwell vs. Broderick, 13 Peters, 436. But it appears from the same case, that those who claim against the patent may file a bill in equity, and show that the patent issued by mistake—a court of equity being the forum in which the equities of the parties may be investigated. Williamson, then, as assignee of Kilbee, may, at any time, file a bill in equity against the Kentucky Asylum and those claiming under it, and upon showing that the patent issued by mistake, procure a patent himself for the same land—which patent, when obtained, (though younger than that held by the Kentucky Asylum,) would by relation take effect from the date of the entry, and thereby prove a prior legal title. Taylor & Quarles vs. Brown, 2 Cond. R., 243.

Chief Justice Marshall, who delivers the opinion of the court in the case above cited, says: "The principle on which relief is granted is, that the patent, which is the consummation of title, does in equity relate to the inception of title, and therefore in a court of equity, the person who has first appropriated the land in contest, has the best legal title, unless his equity is impaired by the circumstances of the case.

If this be true, as soon as Williamson shall have successfully asserted his title in a court of Equity, Long, or any other person who takes possession under the patent of the Kentucky Asylum, may be evicted. It depends, then, upon Williamson, whether Long shall have the land or not. If the title fail, it cannot be material to Long, whether Williamson causes it to fail, by going into a court of equity, or waiting for a patent and proceeding in a court of law. Let him adopt either course, the consideration fails, and the plea is sustained.

3. That the court was bound to notice equitable objections to the title. See Elliott vs. Edwards, 3 Bos. & Pull., 181. Maberly vs. Robins, 5 Taunt., 625.

4. It is no answer to say, that the bond for title was taken by Long, or tendered him by the Asylum; for when a note is given for the price of land, and the title fails, this is a good defence to an action on the note. Frisbee vs. Hofingale, 11 John. R., 50.

C. H. Dupont, for Defendant in Eror:

The defence set up by the defendant below, was that the Deaf and Dumb Asylum of Kentucky had not a valid title to the land, and could 407 not comply with the contract to make a good title to the defendant; and to support this defence, the defendant sought to give in evidence proof of an "entry" of the said tract of land in the office of the Register at Tallahassee, by another person in 1827.

The plaintiff to sustain the allegation contained in his replication, viz: that the Deaf and Dumb Asylum was prepared to convey to the defendant a good title, upon the payment of the purchase money, offered in evidence the patent of the government, conveying the said tract of land in fee to the said Deaf and Dumb Asylum. Upon this state of the case, the defendant in error assumes the following positions, to-wit:

I. In an action at law, the "patent" from the United States for part of the public lands is conclusive as to title. Bagwell vs. Broderick, 13 Peters, 436. McArthur vs. Browder, 4 Wheat., 488. 4 Con. Rep., 517.

II. The patent is the foundation and completion of the title, and establishes in a court of law the performance of every prerequisite, and no inquiry into the preliminary measures which ought to precede it, can be raised in a trial at law. McArthur vs. Browder, 4 Wheat., 488. 4 Con. R. 517. Stringer vs. lessee of Young, 3 Peters, 337.

It may be proper to remark, that the cases cited to sustain the foregoing propositions, were actions of ejectment, but I think that the following corollary may be legitimately deduced therefrom, to-wit: If in an action of ejectment, when "title" constitutes the primary question, the validity of a patent from the government may not be impeached, much less will it be tolerated, when the question of "title" is only incidentally involved, as in the case at bar.

III. In an action of assumpsit to recover money deposited upon a purchase of real estate, upon an allegation that the defendant has failed to make a proper title, the court will not consider whether the title is of a doubtful description, (such as a court of equity would not compel an unwilling purchaser to take,) but simply whether the vendor has or has not a legal title to convey. Bayman vs. Gutch, 7 Bingham R., 379. 20 En. C. L. R., 170.

IV. The vendee of real estate cannot avoid the payment of the purchase money by alleging a want of title in the vendor, so long as he retains possession of the premises sold. Archer vs. Bamford, 3 Starkie R., 175. 14 En. C. L. R., 176-8.

408 V. The possession of the patents of the United States is conclusive evidence of a title in the Kentucky Asylum to convey, and the validity of the same, as against any muniment of title less than a patent, can be inquired of only in a court of equity. Bagwell vs. Broderick, 13 Peters, 436.

Opinion by Justice BALTZELL.

This is a suit on a promissory note, payable at the Union Bank of Florida, given for the purchase of a tract of land, and the defence is a failure of consideration, based upon an equitable right in a third person. The case was tried upon the evidence, without reference to the pleadings, the court instructing the jury as to the points presented. The propriety of these instructions is now raised in this court. The error assigned presents the main question in the case—that under the proof defendant was entitled to a verdict, on the ground that the title to the land purchased was not in the Asylum, but in Williamson, assignee of Kilbee. Strictly speaking the instructions might have been refused, on the ground that the title was not as asserted but in the Asylum obviously, through the patent of the United States, which they held and tendered in evidence. The more appropriate question is, whether through the equity existing in Williamson, the defendant could maintain his plea of a failure on that account. To solve this question we must refer to the bond taken by defendant, on executing his note. This formed the consideration for it, and to the extent of the covenant contained in it, plaintiff is bound, and no further—it not being pretended that there was fraud in any respect. The covenant there is to make "good and sufficient legal conveyance, upon the payment and full discharge of the said promissory note." We do not consider it necessary, on the present occasion, to determine the relative effect of these arguments, whether they are dependent or independent—the point has not been argued before us, and the case may be decided upon other grounds, admitting, in our opinion, of neither doubt nor question.

In argument, and on the trial in the Circuit Court, the case was treated as if there had been a covenant for good and sufficient title—a covenant in the opinion of at least two of the most enlightened courts in the Union, of very different import from that of a sufficient deed of conveyance. The words, "good and sufficient deed," have no reference to the title; "It is a covenant relating merely to the validity and sufficiency of the conveyance in point of law to pass what- 409 ever right the plaintiff had in the lands to the defendant." "It is impossible," says C. J. Spencer, in a case reviewing the decisions in New York in this respect, "to torture the covenant to give a good warrantee deed of conveyance to mean that he will give a good title." 20 John., p. 132. 12 John., 436. 13 John., 350. 16 John., 268. 6 Cowen, 21-2. 15 Pickering, 553.

Even this question seems to be unsettled in the American Courts, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania holding the adverse doctrine; nor do we design to express a positive opinion on the present occasion.

In the case under consideration, we find the plaintiff in possession of the patent of the United States, granted in July, 1829, nearly twenty years since, and during that long period it has not been assailed. The defence set up under Williamson is, in the pleadings, alleged to be a claim—not even a subsisting, or a good and valid one. At the best it is a mere equity—dormant from its existence in 1827, and never asserted in court or elsewhere, as appears from the record, to the present time. It has not disturbed the defendant's possession obtained under the purchase from the Asylum and which he has held for several years, nor is there an allegation that there is any fear of its disturbance, or that there is a design to assert the claim to his injury. Admitting that Williamson might, in a court of equity, have obtained his right over the patent and compelled a conveyance of the land, yet it by no means follows that the defence would be available to defendant here. But in addition to all this, by the plea in the case, this very claim of Williamson was known to defendant at the time of his purchase. Under such circumstances, to hold the defence available, would be going far beyond the decisions of any of the courts that have permitted objections of this character. The cases on the subject in the American Courts are based on the ground of fraud or eviction, or that which is equivalent, or of admitted or unquestionable paramount title. The general rule at common law, and that now prevailing, is that the bond or covenant constitutes a good and valuable consideration for the note, and, of course, a want or failure of title would be no defence to an action on the note. 1 Greenleaf, p. 352. 2 Wheat., p. 13. If there be no ingredient of fraud in the case, and the party has not had the precaution to secure himself by covenants, he has no remedy for his money, even on a failure of title." 3 Kent, 473.

The case of Frisbee v. Hoffnagle, cited by defendant's counsel, 11th 410
Johnson, p. 50, asserting a different rule, has been overruled—not only by the same court, 19 Johns., 77—21 Wend., 132, 134—25th Wend., 107, reviewing the entire ground, but by other courts—3 Pickering, 452. 3 Martin's La. Rep., 111. 8 Smede & Marshall, 742. In this latter case, the court say: "A court of law, although the proper tribunal for the trial of titles to land, will not try such titles collaterally. The proceeding must be direct, otherwise the title cannot be questioned. Where there has been an eviction, the defence of failure of consideration may be let in, because the superiority of the outstanding title is then established by a judicial determination." Hay, &c., v. Taliaferro, Mississippi Reports. In South Carolina, where defences of this character have prevailed to the greatest extent, the courts have evinced a disposition to retrace their steps, and admit that some of their decisions have led to extravagant results. Thus in Van Leer vs. Parr, upon the question whether Van Leer had or had not a good title to the lands against the contingent remainder men, &c., "I give no opinion," says one of the judges, "and the court ought still to avoid deciding upon the possible future rights of such absentees. Let them first lay in their claims. The series of our decisions has finally established this proposition in the laws of South Carolina, that, whenever in the sale of lands, the seller makes a general warranty of title, and a subsisting paramount title at law to the same lands belongs to a third person, as for instance an older grantee of the same lands, in such cases the purchaser is not obliged to wait for eviction, &c." 2 Richardson Equity, 324.

We are of opinion that this objection may not be set up at law in this action, so as to set aside this agreement, being more appropriate to a court of equity, where, if necessary or proper, the contract may be rescinded or modified upon such terms as the peculiar circumstances of the case may demand, and where Williamson, or those holding under him may be made parties, and the merits of his claim directly investigated.

An embarrassment has existed in our minds as to the proper disposition of the case, owing to the very defective character of the pleadings. The defendant sets up an arrangement to extinguish Williamson's claim, and avers that the Asylum has no title; plaintiff replies that he is now and will be ready to make title whenever defendant is ready to offer to pay the purchase money, and this last 411 seems to have been the issue submitted to the jury. As there was no offer to pay at the trial, or at any other time, the contingency had not arrived when it would be proper to determine such a question.—It was, in our opinion, an immaterial issue, and we were, at first, inclined to reverse the case and send it back, on that account; but as the point was not noticed in argument and both parties have desired a decision upon the merits, we have concluded to consider the question as if properly presented and raised by the pleadings and decided by the jury. If there were a prospect of the defendant presenting the matter of his defence anew, in another firm, we should direct a repleader. 1 Burrows, 301. Cowper, 510. 16 Johns, 227. Evans v. Gee, 11 Peters, 85.

The case will then be affirmed with costs.

Chief Justice DOUGLAS dissenting.

WILLIAM CURRY, APPELLANT, vs. WILLIAM MARVIN, APPELLEE.

The second section of the act of July 25, 1845, which limits the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to cases where the matter in controversy exceeds the amount or value of fifty dollars, is not in conflict with that provision of the Constitution of this State, which declares that the Supreme Court, except in cases otherwise directed in this Constitution, shall have appellate jurisdiction only, which shall be co-extensive with the State, under such restrictions and regulations not repugnant thereto, as may, from time to time, be prescribed by law.

The word restriction means limitation, confinement within bounds," and as used in the Constitution, applies to the amount and to the time within which an appeal may be taken, or a writ of error sued out. The word regulation more properly applies to the mode and form of proceeding.

Courts of justice cannot act upon the presumption that powers conferred by the Constitution will be abused—or, because they may be, determine that they have not been given.

Where the sum in controversy is less than fifty dollars, this court has no jurisdiction.

William Curry, being an auctioneer in the County of Monroe, instituted a suit in the Circuit Court of that county, to recover from William Marvin, the defendant, the sum of eighteen dollars and 412 twenty-nine cents, being one per cent. on the sum of eighteen hundred and twenty-nine dollars, the amount of sales of certain lots belonging to defendant, and sold for defendant by plaintiff. The sum sought to be recovered was the amount of tax imposed by the county commissioners upon auction sales, alleged in this case to be the aforesaid sum of eighteen dollars and twenty-nine cents.

The defendant filed a demurrer to plaintiff's declaration in these words: "The said defendant in person says that the declaration is not sufficient in law, because he says that the county commisioners of said county levied said tax of one per cent. on auction sales without the authority of law."

At the spring term of the Circuit Court, sitting in and for the county of Monroe, Judge LANCASTER presiding, the demurrer to plaintiff's declaration was sustained, and plaintiff appealed to this court. The only question considered here, as appears from the opinion of the court, was whether this court has jurisdiction of the case.

Thomas S. King, for Appellant,

Contended that the 1st section of the act of the General Assembly of July, 25, 1845, pamphlet 12, conflicts with section 2, article 5 of the Constitution, and that appeals may be taken in any case brought to the Circuit Court.

The object of the Constitution in providing for appeals, is to ascertain the legal rights of parties, and to secure them. Every such right is intended to be secured to each individual, and any provision abridging the means of obtaining it must be expressed without ambiguity. The words of the Constitution in art 5, sec. 2, that the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, "under such restrictions and regulations," cannot be construed to authorize the Legislature to debar a party of his right of appeal. The words, "restrictions and regulations," apply to the modes and forms of proceeding in taking and prosecuting appeals. The restrictions were intended to be of the same nature with those which existed at the making of the Constitution, and operated then in prosecuting appeals. It will be seen, by reference to the laws regulating appeals and writs of error at that time, that there was no limit as to the amount in controversy, except in cases of $10 and under, over which justices of the peace had final jurisdiction. The restrictions in prosecuting appeals, then, are found in Duval, p. 109 to 112. The appeal must have been

ment was rendered, p. 108, sec. 1. Before it would be heard, there must have been a bond filed with securities, if plaintiff, for the costs—if defendant, for the amount of the judgment and costs; a copy of the proceedings must have been filed the first day of the term, or the case would be dismissed. Sec. 2 & 4, p. 108, 109. For a writ of error to operate as a supersedeas, there must have been a special order of court; and a bond filed in double the amount of the judgment or costs, and the writ must have been sued out within two years after judgment. Sec. 7 & 10, p. 109, 110. In judgments against officers of the court, the same bonds and limitations as to time are provided as in other cases. Sec. 3, p. 111, 112. By act February 12, 1836, before appeal taken, the costs accrued and to accrue must have been paid, p. 112. In criminal cases, before the appeal could operate as a supersedeas, there must have been bond and security given to abide the judgment or sentence, p. 112.

These provisions are restrictions upon parties—they are intended to restrain them from taking appeals as of course—or from unfounded and vexatious appeals, and to give full security upon the final decisions. They are mere "regulations"—which refer to the terms and order of proceeding in taking appeals, and are in part prescribed by the acts before referred to, and by the rules adopted by the Court of Appeals, under sec. 12, p. 110, where it is authorized to make rules for the "regulation" of cases brought to it. A restriction as to the time in which appeals must be taken, and to prosecuting them without giving bond and security, is something more than a regulation for the forms and order of proceeding in taking up and prosecuting an appeal. There is a wide distinction between these restrictions as to bonds and securities and limitations of time, and restrictions upon the right to which every individual is entitled, of appeal to a higher tribunal to obtain a legal claim, of which he is deprived by the judgment of the inferior court. Such a right can be barred only by clear and unmistakable language in the Constitution. The Constitution does not and intends not to prohibit an appeal to obtain a legal claim—its object is to provide such restrictions and regulations as will give full security and prevent injustice to parties, and of this nature are the restrictions and regulations that existed at its formation.

If the Legislature can restrict appeals to cases where the amount 41 claimed is over $50, it can restrict them to the highest amounts, and may exclude questions on the construction of a statute it may pass, or any question, except those of the nature it may specify, from appeal. Such a construction of the Constitution might otherwise work great wrong. A party may have a multitude of accounts, each under $50, amounting to thousands of dollars, the recovery of all which depends on the same principle of law, yet, because none of his accounts amount to $50, he may lose all for want of an appeal. Suits are often brought on small amounts, to test questions (which is the design in this case) involving principles on which large claims depend, and in the establishment of which the community is deeply interested. In none are they more interested than in settling the construction of statutes by the courts. No construction should, if possible, be given to the Constitution which might work inconvenience or injustice, or which militates against its spirit, as would certainly be the case if any one, however small his claim, were prohibited from appealing. Further: the Constitution can alone limit the jurisdiction of this court.

The 2d Sec. Art. 5, referred to, is the only one in the Constitution that gives jurisdiction to the Supreme Court. This is the clause from which it derives not only the power of "appellate jurisdiction only, except, &c.," but whatever power it has. This power authorizes its exercise of appellate jurisdiction, which is the only jurisdiction the court has, except the power given in the same section, to issue certain writs for maintaining its control over other courts. The clause conferring jurisdiction is connected with the words, "except in cases otherwise directed in this constitution," and is intended to convey the meaning as if read "the appellate jurisdiction shall extend to all cases, except to cases otherwise directed in this Constitution," as well as to read "the court shall have appellate jurisdiction only, except in cases otherwise directed in this Constitution." If, then, there be any limitation as to the amount in cases, it must be sought for in the Constitution. Such a limitation does not exist there.

Marvin, for Appellee.

Chief Justice DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was brought up by appeal from the Circuit Court of Monroe County. The plaintiff in his declaration demands of the defendant the sum of eighteen 29-100 dollars, the damage laid is ten dollars—making in the aggregate the sum of twenty-eight 29-100 dollars only. We are, therefore, met at the threshold of the case here, with the question, whether this court has jurisdiction in it?

The Constitution of this State, chap. 4, sec. 2, No. 1, of Thompson's Digest, page 50, declares that the Supreme Court, except in cases otherwise directed in this constitution, shall have appellate jurisdiction only—which shall be co-extensive with the State, under such restrictions and regulations not repugnant to this constitution, as may, from time to time, be prescribed by law."

The act of the General Assembly of July 25th, 1845, 1 Pamphlet Laws, page 12, Thompson's Digest, sec. 2, No. 5, pages 50, 51, prescribes that "the Supreme Court of this State shall have and exercise appellate jurisdictions in all cases brought up by appeal or writ of error from the several Circuit Courts, when the matter in controversy exceeds the amount or value fifty dollars." This act limits the jurisdiction of this court, and must govern the proceedings in this case, unless it is repugnant to and conflicts with the provision of the constitution above cited.

It is contended by the counsel for the appellant that it does so conflict; at least we understand the argument to be, that a strict construction of the article of the constitution before referred to, would make it thus conflict; that the words of that article, "the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, under such restrictions and regulations, ought not and cannot properly be construed to authorize the Legislature to debar the party of his right of appeal, however small the sum or value in controversy may be. Those words, it is argued, apply only to the modes and forms of proceding in taking and prosecuting appeals. To this proposition as thus laid down, we cannot yield our assent. The word restriction is defined by the best lexicographers to mean limitation, confinement within bounds, and would seem, as used in the constitution, to apply to the amount and to the time within which an appeal might be taken, or a writ of error sued out. The word regulation has a different signification—it means method, and is defined by Webster in his Dictionary, folio 3d, page 929, to be "a rule or order prescribed by a superior for the management of some business, or for the government of a company or society." This more properly perhaps applies to the mode and form of proceeding in taking and prosecuting appeals and writs of 416 error. By the use of both of those terms, we think that something more was intended than merely regulating the mode and form of proceedings in such cases; and that the word restriction, as used in the constitution, supports and fully sustains the provisions of the 2d section of the act of 25th July, 1845, which by its terms limits the jurisdiction of this court to cases where "the matter in controversy exceeds the amount or value of fifty dollars."

It is further argued that "If the Legislature can restrict appeals to cases where the amount claimed is over fifty dollars, it can restrict them to the highest amounts, and may exclude questions on the construction of statutes it may pass." But it is not to be presumed that the General Assembly would thus abuse the authority which, by the clause of the constitution above cited has been conferred upon it.—The same argument would hold as to any discretionary power. All such powers may be misused; but courts of justice cannot act upon the presumption that they will be, or because they may, determine that they have not been given. These were more properly matters for the consideration of the convention that formed the constitution and the people who adopted it. The Constitution of the United States (Art. 3, Sec. 2,) provides that "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States; and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens or subjects." In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all other cases, before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make. 1st United States Statutes at large, 18. Thomson's Digest, App. 561. Under the power conferred by this Article, Congress (by the Act of 24th September, 1789, 1st U. S. Statutes at large, 80,) provided that "Final judgments and decrees in civil actions and suits in equity in a circuit court, brought there by original process, or removed there by appeal from the district court, where the matter in dispute exceeds 417 the sum or value of two thousand dollars, exclusive of costs, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court.

Curry vs. Marvin.—Opinion of Court.

Now it may as well be said that, if the Congress of the United States can restrict appeals and writs of error to the Supreme Court to civil cases where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of two thousand dollars, exclusive of costs, it may restrict them to the highest amount; or that, if it may except one class of cases, it may except all or, at least, so large a portion as to render that high tribunal almost entirely useless. We have seen that the judicial power extends to all cases in law and equity, yet the Supreme Court of the United States has no appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases, and cannot revise the judgments of the circuit courts by writ of error or habeas corpus, in any case where a party has been convicted of a public offence. Ex parte Kearney, 7 Wheat. 38. It could not, if the excess of the fine were apparent on the record. Ex parte Tobias Watkins, 7 Peters, Reps. 568, 574. The appellate jurisdiction given to the Supreme Court by the Constitution, (Art. 3, Sec. 2,) being with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make. If Congress has provided no rule, the Court cannot exercise the appellate jurisdiction; if the rule is provided, it cannot be departed from. Wiscart v. Danely, 3 Dall., 321, 327. 1 Peters Cond. Rep., 144, 146. The term civil actions would, from its natural import, embrace every species of suits which is not of a criminal kind. 3 Dall., 321. 1 Peters' Cond. R., 146; yet the Supreme Court of the U. S. has no revising power over the decrees of the District Court sitting in bankruptcy. Ex parte Christy, 3 Howard, S. C. Reps., 292. But "because there is no appeal given, it by no means follows (say the court in the latter case) that the jurisdiction is either oppressive or dangerous. No appeal lies from the judgments, either of the District or Circuit Court in criminal cases, and yet, within the cognizance of one or both of those courts, are all crimes and offences against the United States, from those which are capital down to the lowest misdemeanors affecting the liberty and the property of the citizens." And yet there can be no doubt that the denianl of appellate jurisdiction is founded in a wise, protectional public policy. The same reasoning would apply to the appellate jurisdiction from the decrees and judgments of the Circuit Court, which are limited to cases above $2,000, and cases below that sum embrace a large proportion of the business of that court." Ibidem, 317. So cases below the 418 sum of fifty dollars, may and generally do embrace a considerable portion of the business of our Circuit Courts; but the limitation of the right of prosecuting an appeal or writ of error to cases above that sum, is, we think, neither oppressive nor dangerous. And the appellate jurisdiction of this court, conferred upon it by the Constitution, being under such restrictions and regulations, not repugnant to that Constitution, as may, from time to time, be prescribed by law; and that jurisdiction having been limited by law to cases where the matter in controversy exceeds in amount or value fifty dollars; and that provision not being in our opinion repugnant to the Constitution; and the sum in controversy in this suit being less than fifty dollars, this Court has no jurisdiction of it, and it must, therefore, be dismissed.

PHILIP COMERFORD, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, vs. CHRISTOPHER C. COBB, ADMINISTRATOR de bonis non OF JAMES W. EXUM, DEFENDANT IN ERROR.

The regular mode of bringing the cause of action before the court is by craving oyer.

The word seal written in the scrawl attached to the name of the obligor, indicates the intention of the party executing the instrument to make it a specialty, and the intention must govern.

The word seal so written in the scrawl makes the instrument a writing obligatory or specialty, to which the plea of the statute of limitations is bad.

This case came up on a writ of error from Jackson Circuit Court. An action of debt was brought in that court by Christopher C. Cobb, administrator de bonis non of James W. Exum, on the instrument stated and set forth in the opinion delivered by the court, against Philip Comerford, the plaintiff in error in this court.

Comerford pleaded the statute of limitations—to which plea, Cobb, the plaintiff below, demurred, and for cause of demurrer, showed that the instrument sued on was a specialty, to which the statute pleaded does not apply.

419 The demurrer was sustained by the court; and the only question presented by the record is, whether the court erred in giving judgment for plaintiff upon the demurrer.

Keyes, for Plaintiff in Error, contended,

The statute of 1829 declares that a scrawl affixed as a seal shall be as effectual as a seal. Thompson's Digest, 348. It is clear that a scrawl is not, under the statute, de facto, a seal.

It is necessary that the instrument itself to which the scrawl is affixed, should bear witness that the scrawl was affixed as a seal. 1 Mun. Rep., 487, 491. 4 Mun. Rep. 442. Minor's (Ala.) Rep., 187. 2 Randolph Rep., 446. See 2 Cowen & Hill's notes. 10 Philip's Evidence, 1227, for the American learning on the point.

Some doubt may exist whether the point be properly presented. It is submitted that the statute, which requires the cause of action or a copy thereof to be filed with the declaration, makes the cause of action, or the copy when so filed, a part of the record. And as the demurrer to the plea of the statute of limitations presents the whole record to the court, the variance which appears between the cause of action and the description thereof in the declaration, is a ground well shown for the reversal of the judgment of the court below.

The court is also referred to 4 Ark. Rep., 196, and to 6 Ark., 117, where the point is mentioned as res adjudicata.

Carmack, Stephens N Baker, for Defendant in Error:

The record in this case presents the single question: Did the court below err in sustaining the demurrer to the plea of the statute of limitations?

1. Actions of debt founded on specialty are expressly excepted out of the statute of limitations. Th. Dig., 442, sec. 1.

In this case, the "cause of action" is described in the plaintiff's declaration as a specialty, "writing obligatory sealed with the seal," of which profert is made. The defendant, by his pleadings, admits the "cause of action" to be such as it is described in the declaration.

If the defendant in the court below desired to present the question, whether the cause of action was a specialty or not, he should have craved oyer and demurred. 1 Chitty Pl., 466-'7.

If this view of the subject be correct, it is unnecessary to enter into a discussion of the question presented by the argument on the other side, as to the effect of a scrawl.

420 By referring to the case cited on the other side,, 4 Ark., 195, the court will perceive that the question was presented by the defendants craving oyer and then demurring.

Justice LANCASTER delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, C. C. Cobb, Administrator, &c., brought suit in the court below against P. Comerford, the defendant in that court and plaintiff in error here, in an action of debt, and declared upon a writing obligatory. At the bottom of his declaration a copy of the cause of action is set forth in these words, viz:

"Twelve months after date we or either of us promise to pay Frederick L. Ming, Executor to the Estate of James W. Exum, deceased, the sum of one hundred and forty-nine dollars and fifty cents, for value received. December 29th, 1838.

(Signed), "H. J. MARLY, [SEAL.]
"CHARLES TRIPP, [SEAL.]
"PHILIP COMERFORD, [SEAL.]"

To this declaration sundry pleas were pleaded, but all were withdrawn but the plea of the statute of limitations, viz: non accrevit within five years; to which plea plaintiff demurred, issued was joined on demurrer and demurrer was sustained and judgment given for plaintiff.

The only question for this court to examine and inquire into is—whetner the demurrer was properly sustained, or not?

The plaintiff in error contends that the demurrer to the plea brings before the court the instrument declared on, as well as the record, and that it is bfore the court for its inspection. It may be as well to remark that the regular mode of bringing the cause of action before the court is by craving oyer; because it is no part of the record.—A copy appended to the declaration does not make he original any part of the record, and the court will only take notice of it where the defendant craves oyer and demurs. If the original had been appended to the declaration, instead of a copy, the point might have been different, as the pleadings are shaped. The authority referred to (4 Ark. R. 196, of Birtrand vs. Boid, strongly recognizes the position here taken. But, presuming the copy of the writing declared on to be accurately given, we have looked into the authorities referred to (1 Mumford, 487, 491, and 4 Mumford, 442,) to see whether they sustained the ground assumed by plaintiff in error. The principle esablished in those cases seems to be that, where the writing con- 42 cludes with the words "Witness my hand," and the obligor signs his name with a scrawl at the end, it is not sufficiently shown he intended to make a seal, or he would have given stronger evidence of his intention; and instruments of the character involved in the principle were ruled, in those decisions, not to be sealed instruments. But in those decisions it is fairly inferrable, had there been sufficint from which to discover an intention on the part of the obligor to make a sealed instrument, the ruling had been different. The intention of the obligor, at the time of making the writing, if ascertainable, is to govern. Now, within the scrawl attached to the name of the obligor, Philip Comerford, the word "seal" is written, plainly and unequivocally indicating the purpose for which the scrawl was attached.

In the case of Dardenne vs. Bennett et al., 4 Ark. R. 456, the court, upon a review of the authorities, expressly rule that the clause "in cujus rei testimonium" is not essential to a deed or bond.

In the case of Birtrand vs. Boid, 4 Ark. R. 196, before cited, the decision was upon an instrument having a scrawl, with the word "seal" written in it, precisely as in this case. The statute upon which its efficacy depended is in these words: "every instrument of writing expressed on the face thereof to be sealed, and to which the person executing the same shall affix a scrawl by way of seal, shall be deemed and adjudged to be sealed." The writing was ruled to be within the provisions of the act, and to be regarded as a sealed instrument.

The statute of Florida is in these words: "A scrawl affixed as a seal to any instrument shall be as effectual as a seal." Thompson's Digest, 348.

This, then, in effect, is a sealed instrument and was so intended by the parties at the time of its execution. It is, then, in contemplation of law, a writing obligatory or specialty—to which the plea of the statute of limitations has repeatedly been held to be had. Indeed, it is not recollected that there is any conflict of authority on this point. No error has been perceived in the judgment of the court below; it must, therefore, be affirmed with costs.

PLAINTIFFS IN ERROR, vs. JOHN G. CAMP, DEFENDANT IN ERROR.

When money is the subject of bailment, or delivery to an agent, paid or unpaid, assumpsit is the proper remedy:—assumpsit in the form of money had and received usually being, in case of money, a substitute alike for trover, trespass, and case: though as a substitute for trover, there need be no previous demand.

The count for money had and received will be supported by evidence of the defendant's receipt of bank notes.

A count for money had and received may be proved by any legal evidence, showing that the defendant has possession of the money of the plaintiff, which in equity and good conscience he ought to pay over.

Assumpsit will frequently lie, where there has been non-feasance, misfeasance, or malfeasance, the plaintiff in such cases waiving the tort.

This cause was heard at the Fall Term of the Circuit Court of the Middle Circuit in the county of Leon, the Hon. THOMAS DOUGLAS presiding. The proceedings in the case in the court below are fully and clearly stated in the opinion delivered by this court:

Brockenbrough, for Plaintiffs in Error:

The declaration contains three special counts, and the money counts.

The plea is bad, because it does not state that he brings into court, or that he has the same identical Florida money, or what sort of Florida money he had, or that he made any effort to sell it, or what was the value at any time whilst he had it, or what was offered for it—but only that he could not sell it for its fair and full value." That was not his contract, but to dispose of to the "best advantage, &c."—which shows that the money was to be sold for the best market price that could be obtained, and this was to be the only test of value. Its intrinsic or full value, perhaps, was unknown to either party, and seems not to have entered into their contemplation.

But it is said the action is not well brought; that it was a gratuitous bailment, and the most that could be made of it would be an*tion on the case* for non-feasance. The authorities do not sustain this. Sufficient consideration for the promise—which is express, not implied—is laid in every court, and is expressed on the face of the note. The receipt of so much Florida money, (decided in this court to be money,) and averred in the declaration to be of par value in specie is surely a sufficient consideration for a promise to remit the amount in specie, or Northern funds. It is admitted in the note and the plea to have been of some value. 423

Defendant's excuse is, he could not get enough for it. If this is not consideration enough for a promise in assumpsit, no action for money loaned, or had and received, or account stated, can be maintained. Opposite counsel seem to misconceive the case of Coggs vs. Bernard, in 2d Lord Raymond, as well as Mr. Smith, in his leading cases, and his American editors.

That case establishes that a mere trust or confidence reposed in a man, without reward, who undertakes to do something for another, either to his goods or money, is sufficient consideration to render him liable on an implied promise to perform it well after he undertakes it, and actually enters upon the trust, by taking possession of the money or chattels. That he may be liable on implied promise, or for breach of trust, or gross negligence, as the case may be.

It decides nothing as to the form of the action—whether it is to be a special action on the case for non-feasance, or misfeasance, or an action of trespass on the case upon promises, (assumpsit,) depends on the circumstances of the case to be conidered, and not on the quetion of liability, which was the only question in Coggs vs. Bernard.

Even when there is no contract whatever in the case, the American editors state (1 Smith, 198,) that "it may be proper to note, that where money is the subject of bailment, or delivery to an agent, paid or unpaid, assumpsit is the proper remedy," and he cites 6 New Hampshire, 537, Groves, et al. vs. Ticknor. And that he is speaking exclusively of cases where there is no contract. See p. 186, paragraph beginning "unpaid agents" Here there is an express contract. Why not folow its own words? Why seek to find what the law would do, if we had none?

As some evidence that I have not misunderstood Mr. Smith, I refer to his later work, 46th Law Library, 59, Smith on Contracts.—The cases which he there cites, along with Coggs vs. Bernard, are cases in assumpsit and cases very similar to the present. And in one of them, a very striking case, Coggs vs. Bernard, is cited by counsel, and the reporter in his note, see Shillibur vs. Glynn, 2 Meeson & Welsby, Exchequer R., 143.

And in the other case, precisely in point to this, and in assumpsit— 424
(see 2 Bingham, 414. Eng. C. Law, 485,)—Chief Justice Best cites with approbation the case of Coggs vs. Bernard, as sustaining him, and never seems to have dreamed that it was the less applicable because that was case, and Whitehead vs. Greetham was assumpsit. Because the principle of liability, and reason of liability, was precisely the same—only in Cogg vs. Bernard, case had to be brought because the liability was for spilling brandy, gratuitously to be carried; and in the other, assumpsit, because it was for failure to secure an investment of certain money deposited with defendant for that purpose, to be gratuitously invested.

The case of Rutgers & others vs. Sweet, 2 Johnson's cases, 92, was assumpsit, upon a receipt very similar to the one here sued upon. It was sustained. The distinction seems to be, between a gratuitous promise to do something in future without entering upon it, or receiving in trust the money or goods with which it is to be accomplished, or about which, the thing promised, is to be performed. In such case, no action lies in case, or assumpsit.

But it is undertaken, and the trust reposed by the delivery of the money or chattels, (whereby the party is prevented from performing it himself, or having another agent,)—in such case, the party neglecting his duty is responsible in assumpsit or in case, according to the nature of his contract, or the subject-matter, or the nature of the loss.

The case of Thorne vs. Deas, 4 Jo., 84, was a case of a gratuitous promise of one partner to another to effect insurance on joint property—nothing was given or advanced, and no trust reposed further than mere confidence in his word. Such a promise raises no liability certainly, whether in assumpsit or case; and that action was not sustained, though brought in case.

But this note was good on the money counts. Especially the account stated, "I agree to pay," imports a consideration. Davis vs. Wilkinson, 10 Adolphus & Ellis, 98. 37 Eng. C. Law, 61.

Douglas & Hogue, for Defendant in Error:

1. The action of assumpsit is not the proper form of action in this case. It should have been case. An unpaid agent undertaking to perform anything, is liable to this form of action only, for damages resulting from the manner of his performance. 1st Smith's Leading Cases, 186, 169. Coggs vs. Bernard, 5 Durn. & East, 143.

2. The defendant in this case was a mere bailee, without reward, 425 and must have been guilty of gross negligence in order to render him liable as a mandatory; and this gross negligence would be the ground of action on the case. Id. & 1 Esq., 74.

3. Unpaid agents are only liable for such injuries to property, as they would be liable for if the property remained in the possession of plaintiff. 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 187.

4. The action of assumpsit can only be maintained, where there is such a conversion as that trover will lie, or where money has been received on deposit; and this because it is a quasi recovery of the thing. Smith's Leading Cases, 188.

Hawkins, Justice, delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of assumpsit brought by Gordon and wife against Camp, the appellee, on the following instrument of writing:—

"Tallahassee, Florida, February 5th, 1842.

"Received from Mrs. Susan E. Fisher three hundred and eighteen dollars in Florida money, which I am to dispose of to the best advantage for specie of northern current funds, and remit the avails to her at Warrington, Virginia, which I expect to do on or before the 1st August next, from Washington city, as I pass through that place for my former residence in Ohio. JOHN G. CAMP."

The declaration contains three counts upon the above agreement as a promissory note, and the usual money counts, among which is one for money had and received and one upon an account stated. To this declaration non assumpsit was pleaded and the following special plea, to wit:—

"And the said John G. Camp, by Douglas & Hogue, his attorneys, comes and defends the wrong and injury when, &c., and says that the said David Gordon and Susan E., his wife, ought not to have or maintain their aforesaid action thereof against him, because he says that at the time and at all times since the aforesaid sum of three hundred and eighteen dollars was placed in his hands for sale, it could not be sold for its fair and full value. And the said John G. Camp further saith that he, the said Camp, hath always, from the fifth day of February, 1842, the time when the said sum of three hundred and eighteen dollars Florida money, was placed in his hands for sale by said plaintiffs, hitherto and at all times been ready to pay over and return to the said plaintiffs the aforesaid sum of three hundred and eighteen dollars originally put into his hands for sale, and 426 that he is still ready to pay to the said plaintiffs the said sum of three hundred and eighteen dollars, and he now brings the same here into court, ready to be paid to the said plaintiffs, if they will accept the same; and this he, the said John G. Camp, is ready to verify.—Wherefore he prays judgment if the said plaintiffs ought to have or maintain their aforesaid action thereof against him, &c. [$318.00 Florida money filed with the plea.]"

To this plea there was a demurrer, which was overruled by the court. From this decision a writ of error was taken and errors assigned, to wit:—

1. The Court erred in overruling plaintiff's demurrer to defendant's plea.
2. The court erred in giving judgment for defendant.
3. The court erred in not giving judgment for plaintiff.

The main question in this case seems to be this: whether, upon the facts, as disclosed by the record, the action of assumpsit can be maintained. That action lies where a party seeks damages for a breach of a promise not under seal, and the promise may be express or implied; for the law always implies a promise to do that which a party is legally liable to perform; and the remedy conferred by this action is of a very large and extensive application.

It is contended here that case and not assumpsit should have been brought by plaintiffs, because an unpaid agent undertaking to perform any thing is only liable to the first action (case) for damages resulting from the manner of his performance, and that there is no contract; that the defendant was a mere bailee without reward, and must have been guilty of gross negligence to render him liable as a mandatory, and then case would have been the remedy. All this is no doubt correct upon the ground that there is no contract, and if in this case there is no contract, express or implied, the action of assumpsit cannot be sustained. Assumpsit will frequently lie, however, where there has been nonfeasance, misfeasance or malfeasance; for the plaintiff may waive the tort and rely on circumstances as forming a breach of promise. 6 East. 335. 3 Lord Ray. 1216. 1 B and C. 418. 1 Saunders Pl. and Ev. 111.

The plaintiff mainly relies upon the count in his declaration for money had and received. Such a count has been likened to a bill in equity, and may, in general, be proven by any legal evidence, shew-427 ing that the defendant has possession of the money of the plaintiff which, in equity and good conscience, he ought to pay over. "It is a liberal action, in which the plaintiff waives all torts, trespass and damages, and claims only the money which the defendant has actually received." 2 Greenleaf's Evidence, 105.

In reply to this it may be urged that money was not, in this case, the subject of the bailment, yet Camp acknowledges the receipt of so much Florida money. What is the precise legal definition of this term, it is unnecessary now for the court to declare, though in the case of Williams vs. Moseley, it is clearly indicated its opinion as to another term substantially resembling it. It is sufficient as to the decision of the case at bar, that the court understands, that that which Camp received was to be treated as money, and the best evidence of it is Camp's own declaration. In such a case, that an action for money had and received is sustainable, seems to admit of no doubt.

Professor Greenleaf, in speaking of such an action, remarks: "In regard to things treated as money, it has been held that this count may be supported by evidence of the defendant's receipt of bank notes, or promissory notes, or credit in account in the books of a third person, or a mortgage assigned to the defendant as collateral security, and afterwards foreclosed and brought in by him, or a note payable in specific articles, or a chattel." 2 Greenleaf's Ev., 106. It is presumed in this case, that Camp received bank notes, though that fact does not appear upon the record.

In the case of Pickens vs. Bank, 13 East., 20, the facts were these—a stakeholder, receiving country bank notes as money, paid them over wrongfully to the original stakeholder, after he had lost the wager. An action for money had and received was brought to recover the money thus paid over, and it was contended the action would not lie, because bank notes were paid, and they were not money. Lord Ellenborough said: "Provincial notes are certainly not money; but if the defendant received them as ten guineas in money, and all parties agreed to receive them as such at the time, he shall not now turn round and say, that they were only paper and not money. As against him, it is so much money received by him."—See also page 130, same work. So in Mason vs. Waite, 17 Mass. R., 560. A. delivered bank notes to a carrier, who paid them to B., for a loss at a faro table—it was urged that, inasmuch as the bail-428 ment consisted of bank notes, assumpsit would not lie, but the court ruled otherwise, C. J. Parker observing: "We cannot see, however, why the action for money had and received will not lie. The notes were paid and received as money; and as to any want of privity, or an implied promise, the law seems to be, that where one has received the money of another, and has not a right conscientiously to retain it, the law implies a promise that he will pay it over." So in Ainslee vs. Wilson, 7 Cowen Rep., 662, it was held, that property paid or received as money will support the action for money paid, or had and received, the same as if money itself had been paid or received. And if money has been misapplied, the law will raise an assumpsit, where it has been received for the use of another. Dumond vs. Carpenter, 3 Johns. R., 183. Again: "if a party gives another that which may readily be turned in money, it may be treated as such in an action for money had and received. Doug. 137. 4 Bing., 178; and where the property delivered to defendants is saleable, the receipt of money may be presumed, particularly after a lapse of time. Ib., 4, T. R., 687. 3 B. & P., 559. 2 Saunders' Pl. & Ev., 672." We refer also to the authorities cited by counsel of appellants, viz: Whitehead vs. Greetham, 2 Bingham, 464. Shilliber, vs. Glynn, et al., 2 Mee. & Welsby. Ex. Rep., 143. 10 Ad. & El., 98. The American annotator upon the case of Coggs vs. Bernard, (1 Smith's Leading Cases, 188,) speaking upon the subject of bailment, after giving his views as to unpaid agents, holds this language: "It may be proper to note, that where money is the subject of bailment, or delivery to any agent, paid or unpaid, assumpsit is the proper remedy; assumpsit in the form of money had and received usually being, in case of money, a substitute alike for trover, trespass, and case; though as a substitute for trover, there need be no previous demand. See Graves et al. vs. Ticknor, 6 New Hampshire, 537. We have looked at that decision—it is lucid and able, and fully sustains the foregoing remarks.

The defendant in the suit pleads a tender, with a profert in curia of three hundred and eighteen dollars of Florida money. The tender admits the existence and validity of the debt or duty, insisting only upon the fact, that there has been an offer to pay or perform it. It admits the contract and facts stated in the declaration, and goes only in bar. 2 Greenleaf on Ev., 562. 2 Saun. on Pl. & Ev., 836-'7. The plea does not state that the tender was made before the commencement of the suit, and is, therefore, insufficient. Ordinarily, 429 the tender should be made at the time the money became due; but if no day of payment is fixed upon, proof of tender before suit brought would be sufficient. 2 Greenleaf, 567. 2 Saunders' Ev., 237. The plea, too, in other respects, is exceptionable, if the tender was intended as one of specific articles, for it does not state that the Florida money tendered is the same that was received; nor does it set forth that Camp endeavored to dispose of it to the best advantage, but merely that it could not be sold for its full and fair value.

In conclusion, we are not to be understood as deciding, that the plaintiff is absolutely entitled to recover the full amount which the receipt of Camp calls for upon its face. The action, as we have seen, is an equitable one, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover such damages as they are entitled to ex æquo et bono, they being dependent upon the value of the bailment entrusted to his charge.

We think, for the reasons herein set forth, the demurrer to the defendant's plea should not have been overruled by the court below, and that the judgment of the court was erroneous. It is, therefore, ordered that the judgment of the court below be reversed, and that the cause be remanded thither, for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

WILLIAM D. MOSELEY, TENANT, &C., APPELLANT. vs. JOHN DOE, EX DEM. HENRY R. EDWARDS, APPELLEE.

The lien of a judgment is not lost by mere delay to sue out execution.

An execution sued out after a year and a day is not void, but voidable only.

The right of the plaintiff to sue out execution after such time can be questioned only by the defendant; it cannot be impeached collaterally.

The lien of a judgment growing out of a matter of record, is constructive notice to all the world.

Real property levied on under a junior judgment and sold, is still subject to the lien of an older judgment; and the Circumstance of not proceeding upon the older, until a subsequent lien has been obtained and carried into execution, will not displace the prior lien.

Appeal from Circuit Court of Jefferson county.

The jury found a special verdict, which is recited at length in the 43 opinion pronounced by the court, and which sets forth the facts of the case. Upon this finding, the court below, Judge BALTZELL presiding, held the law to be for the plaintiff, and gave judgment accordingly—from which judgment, defendant appealed.

S. W. Carmack & James T. Archer, Esquires, for Appellant.

L. A. Thompson, Esquire, for Appellee.

Opinion by Chief Justice DOUGLAS:

This is an action of ejectment, instituted in the circuit Court of Jefferson county, on the demise of Henry R. Edwards, the appellee, against Richard Roe, Wm. S. Hill tenant in possession, to recover the premises in the declaration mentioned. Wm. D. Moseley, the appellant, who, on motion, admitted the defendant, in the place of the said Roe and Hill, and thereupon he (the said Moseley) confessed the lease, entry and ouster in the declaration mentioned, and put in the usual plea of not guilty—upon which issue was joined, and the cause was submitted to a jury upon the evidence, who returned a special verdict, which, amongst other things, set forth: That, on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1839, and before that time, one John D. Edwards, of the county of Jefferson, was seized in his demesne as of fee, of and in the messuages, lands and tenements, with the appurtenances, in the declaration mentioned; that, on the said 4th day of November, A. D. 1839, one William Wilson, by the consideration of the Superior Court of the Middle District of Florida, in and for the county of Jefferson, recovered judgment against said John D. Edwards, for the sum of fourteen hundred and forty-nine dollars and thirty cents for his damages, and the sum of four dollars and forty-eight cents costs—on which judgment a writ of execution was issued in due form of law, on the 8th day of June, 1842—the said judgment not having been revived by scire facias, against the said defendant; that, on the 2d day of November, 1840, one William G. Ponder, by the consideration of the same court, recovered judgment against the said John D. Edwards, for the sum of three thousand two hundred and one dollars and eighteen cents for his damages, and the sum of $4 52-100 for his costs—on which judgment a writ of fi. fa. issued in due form of law; that, on the 23d day of April, 1841, one Harriet T. Wilson, administratrix of Robert H. Wilson, by the con-

Moseley vs. Edwards.—Opinion of Court.

431 sideration of the same court, recovered judgment against the said John D. Edwards, for the sum of thirteen thousand six hundred and thirty-nine dollars, sixty-two cents, for her damages, and the sum of ——— for costs—on which judgment a writ of fieri facias issued in due form of law; that, on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1844, Christopher Hagan and Harriet Hagan, by the consideration of the same court, recovered judgment against the said John D. Edwards, for the sum of fifteen thousand three hundred and forty-three dollars and fifty-seven cents for their damages, and $6 12-100 for their costs—on which judgment a writ of fieri facias issued in due form of law; that, on the last specified judgment, an alias writ of fieri facias issued in due form of law on the 21st day of October, 1846, which was levied on divers property of the said John D. Edwards, including the premises in question; and that, by virtue of said fieri facias, the interest of the said John D. Edwards in the lands levied on was sold by the sheriff, on the first Monday (the 7th day) in December, 1846, by consent of parties; and that at said sale, William D. Moseley, the defendant, purchased all the interest of the said John D. Edwards, in and to the lands and tenaments, &c., including therein the premises in dispute, at and for the price of ten dollars, and received a conveyance therefor in due form of law, executed from Smith Simpkins, Sheriff of Jefferson county; that, William G. Ponder having, on the 11th day of November, 1846, sued out a pluries writ of fieri facias on his judgment, did claim and receive the said sum of ten dollars, the price of said land; that one William Denham having obtained an assignment of the judgment, heretofore specified, of William Wilson, caused an alias writ of fieri facias to be issued thereon, on the sixteenth day of February, A. D. 1847, in due form of law, and placed the same in the hands of the said sheriff of Jefferson county—by virtue of which last mentioned writ of fieri facias, the said sheriff levied upon the following described property, viz: the west ½ of the southwest ¼, Sec. 27, T. 1, R. 3 N. & E.—east ½ of the southeast ¼ of Sec. 29, T. 1, R. 2, N & E.—the northeast ¼ of the northeast ¼ of Sec. 32, T. 1, R. 3, N. & E.—northwest ¼ of the northwest ¼ of Sec. 30, T. 1, R. 3, N. & E.—southeast ¼ of the southwest ¼ of Sec. 28, T. 1, R. 3, N. & E. October 16th, 1847.

The above lands were advertised according to law, and sold on the 6th day of December, being the first Monday of said month, Henry 432 R. Edwards bidding twenty-four dollars; being the highest bidder, they were knocked off to him. That the said Henry R. Edwards, the plaintiffs lessor, being such highest and best bidder at said sale, and being declared the purchaser of said lands, which are the premises in the declaration mentioned, the said premises were in due form of law conveyed to him by deed, duly executed by James R. Tucker, Esquire, Sheriff of said county. And we the jury further find, that, on the 10th day of March, A. D. 1848, the said defendant, William D. Moseley, was in possession of the said premises by his tenant, William S. Hill.

And the jury having submitted to the court the question, whether the said plaintiff or the said defendant was in law entitled to judgment upon the facts presented in said special verdict, the court pronounced judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals to this court. The facts were all fully stated in the special verdict, but as there is no controversy about them, it is deemed unnecessary to recite them more fully.

The only errors assigned are, that the court erred in rendering judgment for the plaintiff, and in not rendering judgment for the defendant. And the only question presented for our consideration is, whether the sale of the lands in question, by virtue of the fieri facias issued upon the junior judgment of the Hagan's, carries the title against the elder judgment rendered in favor of William Wilson.

The question arises under our act of the Legislature, entitled "An act in relation to liens created by judgments," approved February 12, 1834. Duval's Com., 369. Thompson's Digest, 351, 352; the first section of which declares that every judgment at law and decree in equity, which shall be entered and pronounced in any of the courts of this State, shall create a lien, and be binding upon the real estate of the defendant or defendants, as at common law.

The second section declares, "That no judgment at law or decree in equity shall create a lien upon the real estate of the defendant situated in any other county than the one in which the same shall have been rendered or pronounced, until the said judgment or decree shall have been recorded in the county in which the real estate, so sought to be bound, may be situated.

The counsel for the appellant contend, that as a judgment created no lien upon the lands of the defendant at common law, the words as at common law, at the close of the first section of our statute above cited, must refer to the lien given by the statute of West. 2, 13 Ed- 433 ward 1st; and by that statute they insist that the liens dependend upon the right of the plaintiff to sue out an elegit, citing 1 Call Reps., 125. 4 Hen. & Mumford, 51, and 2 Brock. Rep., 254; and so, under our statute, the lien, they argue, depends upon the right of the plaintiff to sue out a fieri facias; that, after the lapse of "a year and a day," the right of the plaintiff to sue out a fieri facias was suspended, until the judgment should have been revived by fieri facias, and the lien was also suspended. Consequently a fieri facias issued upon a junior judgment, and levy upon and sale of the land defeated the lien of the elder judgment, and vested the title in the purchaser. This construction, however, we consider too far fetched. From the peculiar phraseology adopted, it is to be sure somewhat difficult to give those words any meaning. The common law was in force by virtue of the act of Nov. 6th, 1829, "For the adoption of the common and statute laws of England," &c. (Duval's Comp., 357, sec. 1. Thompson's Digest, p 21, No. 2,) when the above cited act was passed. If, therefore, the common law had made judgments a lien upon the lands of the debtor, to have passed an act declaring that judgments should create a lien upon the real estate of the defendant, "as at common law," would have been not only useless but absurd. It is our duty to give those words a sensible construction, if possible; if we cannot, we must reject them altogether. We do not feel authorized to say, that a statute giving a lien "as at common law," means a lien according to a British statute. By the common law, lands and tenements were not subject to be taken in execution at the suit of a common person, except in case of an heir, who had been sued upon a bond of his ancestor, in which he was expressly named. To remedy this obvious defect, came the statute of West, 2, 13 Edward 1st, Ch. 18, which did not in express terms give a lien upon the lands of the debtor, but provided "That when debt is recovered or acknowledged in the King's Court, or damages awarded, it shall be from thenceforth in the election of him, (the plaintiff,) to have a writ that the sheriff fieri faciat of the lands and goods of the debtor, &c., and the one-half of his land, until the debt be levied upon a reasonable price in extent." Peck's Reps., 30. Upon this is founded the writ of elegit, by which all the goods of the debtor are delivered at their approved value into the hands of the creditor, and the one-half of his lands are extended. There is nothing in this statute which indicates the time from which the land shall be bound; but by the 434 construction of the courts, immediately after its enactment and ever since, the judgment has been held to bind the land, and the plaintiff might have execution of the lands which the defendant had at the time of the judgment, although he had aliened them bona fide before execution awarded. When the writ was issued and levied, it had relation back to the date of the judgment and cut out all intermediate incumbrances, and remained a lien until the debt was discharged.—Now, when this lien attached, it was subject to all the incidents of any other lien of a similar character—a mortgage for instance—and "the principle is believed to be universal," (said Ch. J. Marshall, in Rankin & Schatzell vs. Scott, 12 Wheat., 177,) "that a prior lien gives a prior claim, which is entitled to prior satisfaction out of the subject it binds, unless the lien be instrinsically defective, or be displaced by some act of the party holding it, which shall postpone him in a court of law or equity to a subsequent claimant." This is not the provision of a statute, but results from the principles of general justice and equity, and is, therefore, one of the incidents of a lien at common law. The position assumed by the counsel for the appellant is, that, as the judgment of Wm. Wilson was rendered in 1839, and had not been revived by scire facias, he had lost his right to sue out execution upon it, and consequently his lien was gone, sub modo, at least. Our statute, by the natural import of its terms, leaving out the words, "as at common law," makes a judgment at law or decree in equity a lien upon the lands of the debtor, which binds them from its rendition. May it not be that the Legislature anticipated that, even upon this phraseology, the very objection here made might be taken, and, therefore, "ex abundanti cautela," added the wards, "as at common law," in order to ensure for their statute lien the same incidents as the common law gives to other positive liens, from the date of the judgment or decree. We know not what other or better construction we can give them. The learned author of the Digest has left them out as "useless verbiage," or "superfluous matter," (see note at page 352,) and surely they can well be spared. If, however, that be the proper view of the matter, then those words would seem to favor the proposition, that the lien of a judgment is not lost by mere delay to sue out execution. But the position that it is thus lost, we think is not sustained by the authorities. The augument is, that the lien under the statute of West. 2. 13th Edward 1, 435 Chap. 18, depends upon the right to sue out an elegit—ergo the lien under our statute depends upon the right to sue out a fieri facias, and that the holder of the judgment rendered in favor of Wm. Wilson, as above stated, lost his right, by the delay that had occurred in regard to it; but "non sequitur," he had so lost his right that he could not at any time sue out a fieri facias. No one but the defendant in execution could question that right; it cannot be impeached in this collateral manner; it is not void, and it is voidable only at the instance of the party against whom it was issued. Oxley vs. Mizle 2 Murphy, 250. 3 Bacon Abr., New Ed., Title Execution, page 723, letter H, note. McCrea vs. Bartlett, 8 John., 361. Jackson ex dem. Roosevelt vs. Roosevelt, 13 John., 97, 102. In Virginia, there is no statue which in express terms makes a judgment a lien upon the lands of the debtor; as in England, the lien is the consequence of a right to take out an elegit. During the existence of this right, the lien is universally acknowledged. Different opinions (said Ch. J. Marshall, in the case of the United States vs. Morrison et al., 4 Peters' Reps., 136,) seem at different times to have been entertained as to the effect of any suspension of that right. Tucker, Pres., in the case of Watts et al., vs. Kearney and wife, 3 Leigh, 293, said, that, however long the judgment may have been out of date, there is no doubt that if it is susceptible of being revived at all, the lien upon the lands yet in the hands of the debtor would be revived eodem staut.

The case of Ridge vs. Prather, 1 Blackford's (Indiana) Reps., 401 to 405, is this: Prather obtained judgment against Gilwick in 1816, and had execution and fieri facias thereon; the sheriff returned the execution executed by a replevin bond the same year.—Gilwick afterwards died. Upon scire facias issued in 1823, against the heirs and terretenants of Gilwick & Silly, the replevin surety, the sheriff inter alios, returned Ridge terretenant of land that was Gilwick's at the time of the judgment. Ridge came in, and pleaded that he was a bona fide purchaser for Gilwick without notice, after the expiration of a year and a day from the time of the judgment on the replevin bond, and before the issuing of the scire facias.
436 Upon demurrer to this plea, there was judgment for Prather, the plaintiff, in the Circuit Court, and this judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court, after a full discussion and a thorough examination of the principles upon which it is founded. The statute of Indiana makes judgments a binding lien upon the lands of the debtor, and is derived from Pennsylvania, (ibid., 402,) whose statute on this subject is similiar to our own. Carkhuff vs. Anderson, 3 Binney's Reps., p. 4, was as follows: "In 1799, Hollenbach obtained judgment against Craig; in 1801, Craig sold and conveyed his land to Anderson; in 1802 Hollenbach revived his judgment by scire facias, and Clarkhuff purchased the premises at sheriff's sale. In ejectment against Anderson, it was held that Hollenbach's judgment was a lien on the land, and Clarkhuff recovered." In Green & others vs. Allen, Wash. C. C. Reps., 280, the court held, "That the lien of a judgment which bound real estate was not lost, if, after testaum fieri facias had been levied and returned, the plaintiff in the writ ordered further proceedings to be stayed." In Campbell, use, &c., vs. Spencer et al., 4 Ala., 552, cited by the counsel for the appellant, the court, after stating the case, say: "From this statement, it appears a levy and sale was made under these execution sufficient for their satisfaction. and in a contest with junior judgment creditors who have acquired a lien on other property, it must be regarded as a satisfaction. To hold otherwise, would be to permit the sheriff virtually to destroy the lien created by the law in favor of the judgment of the plaintiff in error, and to prefer those judgments younger than his, which were capriciously discharged by him out of the money belonging to Marks and the Branch Bank at Mobile. It was their duty to attend to the application of the money obtained by the sale under their executions, and by neglecting to do so, they will be remitted to their claim against the sheriff, and will not be permitted to interfere with the lien of a junior judgment creditor subsequently obtained." It appears, therefore, that this was a contest between rival executions for the proceeds of the sale, and in such a contest, the court said, (page 553,) "if the lien is not lost in some of the modes here pointed out, the date of the respective judgments will determine the priority of right." It is true that, in this case, the court said that a bona fide purchaser under a fieri facias upon a junior judgment, would be protected, citing Den. vs. Hill, 1 Haywood, 72, where the court says: "Were it not so, dormant judgments might be revived a long time afterwards, and the innocent vendee evicted, without the possibility of 436 ever regarding the purchase money," and that, in such a case, the lien of the elder judgments would be lost by the laches of the plaintiff.—But as to this it may be remarked, that this was not the question before the Alabama Court; the lien there had been lost by a levy and sale of sufficient property to pay the judgment, and neglect of the parties to see to the application of the money; and, besides, neither of those States have a statute like ours. Their statutes only subject lands to the payment of judgments, and places them as regards this question upon no better ground than an elegit. Indeed, in the case of Den. vs. Hill, 1 Hay, 81, it is said, "ever since the year 1732, the writ of fieri facias has issued in North Carolina against lands and tenements, as well as goods and chattels; the act of George II. declaring that they should be subject to the same proceedings and process and be held in the same manner as personal estate." This writ stands upon the same footing that it did before the 29th, Charles II.; therefore, the property of the debtor is bound from the test of the writ, citing 2 Bac. 352. Salk. 322, and 8 Coke, 71. The case of Scribe vs. Deane et al., 1 Brock., 166, was decided in Virginia, where the lien is created by the statute authorizing an elegit. Bliss vs. Bull, in 9 John. Rep., 132, relates to personal property only, and the court say: "There being no evidence of an actual levy by the sheriff on the goods and chattels of A., the sale to B. was valid, and not barred by the execption." We do not perceive its bearing upon the case under consideration. In the case of Porter's lessee vs. Cocke, Peck's R., 30, the lien of the elder judgment was postponed, because an injunction had been obtained, and after its dissolution, the plaintiff agreed with the defendant, in consideration of a partial payment of the judgment, to stay the execution six months. In the meantime. in execution on a junior judgment came to the hands of the sheriff, under which he sold, and the sale was held to be valid. This case is also clearly distinguishable from the one before us.

These are all the cases cited in the brief of the appellant's counsel, and they do not seem to us to sustain the proposition assumed. In Forsyth vs. Marbury, decided by Judge Law, and reported by R. M. Charlton, 325, 326, it is said that "the act of 1799 bound all the property of the defendant, from the signing of the first judgment."—"It is not apprehended," said that very able and learned judge, "that the statute of Geo. II., chap. 7, touches the question of lien; it only enabled the land to be sold absolutely as personal property, 4 but the execution had relation back so as to bind from the judgment. It is not an absolute right in the property itself which the creditor obtains by his judgment, either in England or in Georgia; the legal title is not transferred from the debtor to the creditor. He has, however, a special interest, which, although indefinite in extent, may be rendered definite by a levy; an equitable interest which is perfected by the sale, the sheriff's deed completing the transfer of the property itself, and conveying the legal title. The Master of the Rolls in Brace vs. Dutchess of Marlborough, 2 P. Williams 49, says, "a judgment creditor has no right in the land—he has neither a jus in re. nor ad rem; all that he has is a lien upon the land." The Supreme Court of the United States in Conrad vs. Atlantic Insurance Co., 1 Peters' Reps., 443, say: "it is not understood that a general lien by a judgment constitutes per se a property or right in the land itself. It only confers a right to levy on the same, to the exclusion of other adverse interests, subsequent to the judgment; and when the levy is actually made on the same, the title of the creditor for this purpose relates back to the time of the judgment, so as to cut out intermediate incumbrances. Thus, while the creditor acquires no absolute property in the estate of his debtor, he has an interest which is capable of being defined, and which cannot be defeated save by some act of the party himself, by which it shall be lost or displaced. By pursuing the means pointed out to him by law, he is capable of converting his general lien into a specific title, which relating back to the date of his judgment, must prevail over all subsequently acquired adverse interests and rights; and thus this lien affords complete security against subsequent purchasers and incumbrances. Before this is done, the debtor having the legal title, it is true may sell and incumber the property; but whoever takes it must hold it subject to the lien, which lien growing out of matter of record, is constructive notice to all the world. A purchaser can acquire no other rights than those which were vested in the seller, in whose shoes he stands.—So, if the property be levied on by a junior judgment, it is still subject to the lien of the elder judgment. In the language of Chief Justice Marshall, the circumstance of not proceding upon the elder judgment, until a subsequent lien has been obtained and carried into execution, will not displace the prior lien. Rankin et al., vs. Scott, 12 Wheat., 179. 6 Peters' Cond. Reps., 506. Take (said the Chief Justice) the common case of mortgages—it has never been supposed that a subsequent mortgagee could, by obtaining and executing a decree for the sale of the mortgage property, obtain precedence over a prior mortgage, in which all the requisites of the law had been observed. If such a decree should be made, without preserving the rights of the prior mortgagee, the property would remain subject to those rights in the hands of the purchaser. The implied lien created by the first judgment retains the preference over a lien created by a second judgment, so long as an elegit can issue on the first. A statutory lien is as binding as a mortgage, and has the same capacity to hold the land, so long as the statute preserves its force. The cases cited of execution against personal property, we do not thing apply. In those cases, the lien is not created by the judgment, or by matter of record.

In Andrews v. Doe ex Dem. Wilkes, 6 Howard's Mississippi Rep., 554 to 568, Chief Justice Sharkey, delivering the opinion of the Court, said: "The question is whether a prior sale, under a junior judgment, destroys the lien of the elder judgment. It is freely conceded by counsel (says the Chief Justice) that, as a general rule, it does not; but that this case forms an exception, inasmuch as the liens accrued under different jurisdiction—[one of the judgments having been obtained in a court of that State and the other in the District Court of the United States.] But as the question is fairly before the court for the first time, it is proper that it should be judicially settled," and, after citing the act of the Legislature of Mississippi of 1824, which declares "That in all cases the property of the defendant shall be bound and liable to any judgment that may be entered up,, from the time of entering such judgment, proceeds as follows: "This is emphatically a lien on all property in favor of a plaintiff. A lien is a right given by law to have a debt satisfied out of a particular thing. It may originate by contract or by operation of law and, in either case, the effect is the same—the property being bound and liable to satisfy the judgment, is as much a lien as though it had been created by act of the parties. The judgment is not only a lien, but it is a lien of record, which is notice to every one. The instance of a mortgage lien is a familiar one. There can be no difference in principle between a mortgage and a statutory lien. The one is as binding as the other." And in Ridge v. Prather, above cited, it was expressly held that the lien is not limited to a year and a day. Love vs. Harper et al., 4 Humphrey, 116, is to the same effect. In Overton v. Perkins, Mar. & Yerg. Rep., 367, it was held that "An execution issued and levied on land more than a year after the rendition of the judgment is voidable, but not void;" and in Simmons & Whyte v. Wood's lessee, 6 Yerg. Reps., 518 to 522, Carton, Chief Justice, delivered the opinion of the court. "The first objection," he said, "is that an execution issued more than a year and a day after the judgment was rendered, is void, and a Sheriffs' sale by virtue thereof communicates no title to the purchaser. This position cannot be sustained by the rules of the common law. Whyte's judgment was rendered after the sale to Wood and cannot challenge it, because the sale was made after a year and a day"—citing Overton v. Perkins and also 8 John. Rep., 362, and 13 John., 557 and authorities there cited, which, he says, show the true rule. The case cited from 8 John. is Jackson ex dem. McCrea v. Bartlett, in which it was expressly ruled that, in an action of ejectment against a purchaser of land under a sheriff's sale, the regularity of the execution cannot be questioned—page 365, citing Levintz, 403. 3 Caines Cases, 37 and Shirley v. Wright. 1 Salk., 273. That from 13 Johns., 97, 102, is Jackson ex dem. Roosevelt v. Delaney and Russell, in which it was held "That the objection that the sale took place long after the return day, and that the execution had not been issued until after a year and a day after judgment, cannot affect the sale." In Butler v. Haynes, 3 New Hamp. 22, it was held by Richardson, Chief Justice, that "where an execution issues after the death of him against whom it runs, it is not a nullity, nor can its validity be called in question collaterally."

In Shotwell v. Murray, 1 John. Chancery Reps., 512, the judgments under which the lands were sold, were both in favor of the same person. The plaintiff had the first sale made under his younger judgment, and then had the same lands levied on, in the hands of the purchaser, and resold under the elder judgment. The chancellor decided that the purchaser under the younger judgment held the land, subject to a re-sale under the elder judgment.

Since the statute of West 2, 13 Edward I., it has been considered that when a man has judgments for debt, or is conusee of a statute, and the debtor before execution aliens by fine, and five years pass, yet the plaintiff may still have execution. 3 Bacon's Abr., new edition, title Execution, page 725. These authorities, we think, clearly show that the judgment of the court below upon the special verdict was right.

It has been urged that this case comes within the spirit, if not the letter, of the statute of frauds; that the failure of the plaintiff in the elder judgment to sue out execution tended to hinder and delay creditors, and was therefore, as to them, a fraud in law. But we do not perceive the force of the argument. Junior judgment creditors were not prevented by it from proceeding; they might, at any time, pursue their remedies against the property of a debtor. It would have been sold, to be sure, subject to the lien of the elder judgment—so much as it was worth more, it is to be presumed, could have been realized from it. The plaintiff in the elder judgment had a right, in any event, to be paid out of it, unless he voluntarily relinquished his claim or it was displaced by some act of his or "the party holding it," and the judgment, being a debt of record, was notice of that right to all the world. Upon what reasonable ground could junior incumbrances be permitted to disturb it? Upon what principle could such a lien be divested in favor of one who knew of its existence? He can have no superior right to urge—not even an equity to set up against it. He purchases with knowledge of the prior lien, and it is supposed that he gives what an encumbered property is worth; and, in this case especially, there is surely nothing to induce a belief that the purchase was not thus made, as we are shewn by the record that ten dollars was the whole amount paid as the purchase money for several tracts of land.

The judgment of the Court below, is therefore affirmed.

Per curiam.

R. B. & D. W. Post and David C. Wilson, Appellants, vs. William S. Carpenter, et al.

This Court having appellate jurisdiction only, to be exercised in cases brought up by appeal or writ of error from the several circuit courts, the decision of a judge sitting in vacation, is not such a decision as an appeal lies from.

The Appellants, Post and Wilson, sued out writs of attachment against property belonging to William S. Carpenter, an absconding debtor. Other creditors also commenced suit by attachment against the said Carpenter, but the writs sued out by Appellants were first levied. The attachments of Appellants and the other creditors were levied on sundry bales of cotton at St. Marks, in the county of Wakulla, which cotton was, by order of the Judge of the Middle Circuit, sold, and the proceeds paid into the registry of the Court, to abide the final judgment to be rendered in said suits.

At the Fall term of the Circuit Court held in and for the county of Wakulla, 1848, judgments were entered up in favor of the several plaintiffs in attachment, and the proceeds of the sales of Cotton not being sufficient to pay off and discharge the debts due to all the attaching creditors, the counsel for Appellants moved the court to grant an order directing the proper officer to appropriate the said proceeds to the payment of the debts for which attachments had been first levied; or to direct payment according to priority of levy.

This motion was adjourned to be heard at a subsequent day, in Leon county, by agreement of counsel: and afterwards the motion, having been heard and argued before the Hon. Thomas Baltzell, Judge of the Middle Circuit, was overruled. From which decision the said Post and Wilson, claiming to be entitled to the moneys by reason of priority in the levy of their attachments, appealed.

The counsel for the respective parties interested agreed upon a statement of facts for the purpose of procuring a decision upon the question involved in the motion.

But the only question entertained or considered by this Court was that of jurisdiction.

A. E. Maxwell and Douglas & Hogue for Appellants.

Chief Justice Douglas delivered the opinion of the Court:

In this case, as appears by a statement of facts presented in this Court, a motion was made at the Fall Term of the Circuit Court holden in and for Wakulla county, in the year 1848, for the distribution of certain moneys, the proceeds of property of the one William S. Carpenter, which had been sold by order of the Judge of said court, after it had been levied upon by the sheriff of said county by virtue of sundry writs of attachment, at the suit of different parties, against said William S. Carpenter; in which suits judgments had been respectively rendered in favor of the plaintiff therein; which 443 motion, by consent of parties, was adjourned to be heard in Leon County.

The case comes before us on the following statement, which is appended to the statement of facts above mentioned, viz:

"And the motion aforesaid, having been argued before the Judge aforesaid and considered by him, was refused and overruled, and all the parties decided to be entitled to share the said moneys pro rata. From which an appeal is taken by the said R. B. & D. W. Post and David C. Wilson."

To which statement is annexed an agreement in the following words:—

"It is agreed by and between the undersigned attorneys in the said suits of attachment that this motion be sumitted to the Supreme Court, upon the foregoing statement of facts, and that he decision of said court thereupon shall be as binding as if brought up upon a more formal record. January 15, 1849." Which agreement is signed by the attorneys of the respective plaintiffs in attachment, but is not signed by William S. Carpenter, the defendant in the said several suits of attachment, or by his attorney.

Under these circumstances we are asked to take jurisdiction of and adjudicate this case. But, after the most mature deliberation, we think that we are not warranted in so doing. That an attorney, in an action at law, has a general power to refer his client's cause to arbitration and, by entering into a reference, to bind his client, we entertain no doubt. This principle is sustained by numerous authorities. See Watson on Arbitration and Awards, pages 49 and 50. 8 Law Lib., and cases there cited. But we are not prepared to admit that they, or even the parties themselves, can by such an agreement make this court the arbitrator; and it is very evident that, if we hear this cause, we hear it in that character. The Judgment, if any was really entered in this case, appears from the statement itself to have been given in vacation, and there is nothing in that statement to show that there was any agreement that it might be entered nunc pro tunc, or, indeed, that any judgment has been entered in this case upon the records of the Wakulla Circuit Court.—It was, to be sure alleged at the bar that it was understood and agreed by the attorneys of the respective parties, that it should be so entered. This, however, is not sufficient; but if such an agreement had been entered into in writing and filed by them in the proper 444 court, it may be very doubtful whether that, of itself, would have authorized an appeal from such judgment to have been taken nunc pro tunc. We are inclined to the opinion that it would not, and that, if appeal could have been taken at all upon such a judgment, a special agreement would have been necessary to have authorized it. But this question, not being now before us, we do not decide it—the time to do that will be when the question arises.

This court has appellate jurisdiction only, and that is to be exercised in cases brought up by appeal or writ of error from the several Circuit Courts—see Thompson's Digest, pages 50 and 51. No. 1 and No. 5. The judge, sitting in vacation, is not, for this purpose and in contemplation of these provisions, a Circuit Court, and no appeal lies, therefore, to this court, in such a case, from such a decision; and we are informed by the Judge who acted in this matter, that he would not have done so had he not understood that no appeal was intended; and, if we rightly comprehend his views, the decision that he made was, according to his understanding of it, rather an extra-judicial one. The only statute in this State which provides for appeals in cases at law, [and the common law afforded no such remedy,] may be found in Thompson's Digest, page 446, No. 1, and in Duval's Comp., page 108, sec. 1; and it declares that "If a party, in either of the Circuit Courts of this State, shall feel aggrieved by a final judgment, sentence or decree made or pronounced by any or either of said courts, it shall and may be lawful for such party, during the session of the court at which such judgment, sentence or decree is rendered or pronounced, or within ten days thereafter, to obtain, in court, if the appeal be made in term time, or in the clerk's office, if it be in vacation, his, her or their appeal to the Supreme Court of this State." No such appeal was thus taken or obtained in this case, and no record of the Circuit Court is brought up. Consequently, this Court has no jurisdiction in it, and the case must be dismissed.

ISAIAH D. HART, APPELLANT, vs. ORLOFF M. DORMAN, APPELLEE. 445

When partial payments are made, the rule, with respect to interest, is to apply the payment in the first place to the discharge of the interest due at the time of payment. If the payment exceeds the interest, the surplus must be applied to the discharge of the principal, and interest is then to be computed on the balance of the principal remaining due.

When the payments are less than the interest, the surplus of interest unpaid is not to be considered as principal; but interest continues on the former principal, until the payment taken together exceed the interest due; and then the surplus of interest is to be applied to the reduction of principal, and interest again to be computed on the balance.

There is nothing in the statute of this State which makes this mode of calculating interest and applying partial payments improper—nor is there anything peculiar in that statute, or distinguishing it from the statutes of other States, where the rule is recognized.

Appeal from Duval Circuit C...

The plaintiff, Dorman, brought an action of assumpsit to the Spring Term, 1848, of the Circuit Court for the County of Duval, against Hart, the defendant below. The suit was founded on a promissory note, on which partial payments had been made, and the interest was calculated according to the rule laid down in the opinion of the court, and the payments applied according to that rule.

At the Fall Term, 1848, of said court, Judge HAWKINS, presiding, plaintiff moved the court for a judgment by default in this cause; and it was ordered that said motion be granted, and that the clerk assess the damages—which having been done in accordance with the rule before referred to, judgment was entered for the plaintiff for the sum of two hundred and nineteen dollars and thirty-six cents.

From this judgment, the defendant feeling himself aggrieved, appealed to this court.

J. W. Bryant, for Appellant, contended,

1. That, under our statute, which provides that "no person or persons shall, upon any contract whatever, take, directly or indirectly, for the loan of any money, &c.," "a higher rate than eight per centum," "when no rate of interest is expressed," (Duval Comp., p. 78,) any computation which gives more than that rate, involves compound interest, and, therefore, any judgment rendered upon such computation, is illegal.

2. That several payments having been made within the term of 446 one year, interest being computed to the time of such payment, and the amount of payment being deducted, left in each instance a new principal, composed in part of interest, which had accrued within the year; thereby interest was computed upon interest, within the term of one year.

The proposition that paying interest only, will finally pay the principal, is based upon the supposition, that the party to whom the interest is paid, permits the sum to be continually idle—for, if invested, of course it produces returns.

Thompson, for Appellees, contended,

That there was no error in the mode of calculating the amount of damages due for principal and interest in this case, and referred to the following authorities: Meredith vs. Banks, 1 Halstead R., 408. Connecticut v. Jackson, 1 John. Ch. R., 13-'17. Smith v. Shaw. adm., 2 Wash. C. C. R., 167.' 17 Mass. R., 417. 1 Pick., 194. 3 Cowen, 86, n. 1 A. K. Marshal, 584. 2 Hayne, 17. Fonblanque on equity, 654, n., and other authorities there cited.

Chief Justice DOUGLAS delivered the following opinion:

This suit is founded upon a promissory note, upon which several payments were made after it fell due, leaving, however, a balance unpaid, for which a judgment was rendered against the defendant—from which he appealed to this court.

No errors have been assigned, and the only one alleged by the counsel for the appellant in the argument of the case, was as to the calculation of interest, and the application of the partial payments. How that was done is not stated in the record; but we understand, from the course of the argument that the payments were applied in the first place to the interest, and it appears from the record that they all exceeded it, unless it was one of nineteen dollars and eighty-two cents, by bill rendered. But it was insisted by the attorney for the appellant, that the interest should have been calculated upon the principal of an account stated, according to mercantile usage, and it is said in a note to Fonb. Equity, vols. in one, Ed. 1831, page 664, (side 440,) that "it is usual amongst merchants in stating their accounts, to let the principal continue upon interest, and to compute the interest upon the payments as they are successively made;" but the annotator adds: "It is the debtor who gains, and the creditor who loses by this mode—for it is susceptible of mathematical demonstration, that a debt will be wholly extinguished in the course of a few years, (and the time will be longer or shorter, according to the rate of interest,) by the payments of interest, without paying a cent of principal; and Chancellor Kent makes the same remark, in the case of Stoughton vs. Lynch, 2 John. Chy. Reps., 214; and in Wasson vs. Gould, 3 Blackford Reps., 21, the court held that this mode is not correct—that it subjects the creditor to a loss which he ought not to bear, citing Stoughton vs. Lynch. In the case of the State of Connecticut vs. Jackson, 1 John. Chy. Reps., 17, Chancellor Kent held the rule for casting interest, when partial payments have been made, to be, to apply the payments in the first place to the discharge of the interest then due. If the payment exceeds the interst, the surplus goes toward discharging the principal; and the subsequent interest is to be computed on the balance of the principal remaining due. If the payment be less than the interest, the surplus of interest must not be taken to augment the principal; but interest continues on the former principal, until the period when the payments, taken together, exceed the interest due; and then the surplus is to be applied towards discharging the principal, and interest is to be computed on the balance of principal as aforesaid;" and this rule is sustained by Penrose vs. Hart, 1 Dall., 378. Lightfoot vs. Price, 4 Hen. & Mumford, 431. Wasson vs. Gould, 3 Blackford, 21. Smith vs. administrators of Shaw, 2 Wash. C. C. Reps., 167 to 169. Williams and others vs. Houghtailing and Bevier, 3 Cowen Reps., 87, note A.—Fonblanque Eq., page 654, note above cited. Meredith vs. Banks, 1 Halstead's Reps., 408 & 409, note. Story vs. Livingston, 13 Peter's Reps., 871. Edes vs. Goodridge, 4 Mass. Reps., 103; and the United States vs. McLemoire, 4 Howard's S. C. Reps., 288. And this rule is (we think) more entirely free from objection than any other that has been adopted.

The interest was calculated, and the payments were applied, as we understand, according to this rule, in the case now under consideration; and we do not perceive how it gives compound interest. It is believed that there is nothing peculiar in the provision of our statute relating to interest, as the counsel for the appellant seemed to suppose; nothing which would make this mode of calculation of interest, and applying partial payments under it, give usurious interst; nothing which would not be equally usurious interest under the statutes of at least twenty-six other States of this Union, which have been looked into and examined, including the States, the decisions of whose courts we have just now cited, and in one of which, it will be observed, the rule itself was laid down, and that, too, by one of her ablest jurists; and we have not been able to find, nor have we been referred to, a decided case, or any elementary work, in which the mercantile mode above stated is sustained; and in Meredith vs. Banks, 1 Halstead's Reps., 408, it is expressly repudiated, as well as in Wasson vs. Gould, 3 Blackford Reps., 21, above cited. The judgment of the court below is, therefore, in all things affirmed.

BAZIL G. O'BRYAN, APPELLANT, vs. WILLIAM M. REED, APPELLEE.

When, by a separate agreement, any submission is intended to be made a rule of court, an agreement to that effect in writing must be signed by the parties, and filed in the office of the clerk of the court of which said submission is to be made a rule. An agreement signed by one of the parties is not sufficient.

When after an award is made, the parties agree to open it, and refer the matters in difference between them back to the arbitrators, the agreement so to do will be a fatal objection to a motion asking that the award be made a rule of court, and that judgment be entered theron and execution issue.—In such case, there is no award to be enforced.

Where the record shows admissions by the party seeking to enforce the award, that matters had been submitted to the arbitrators which were not adjudicated by them, and that others were adjudicated which they omitted to state in their award, the award, it would seem, should not be enforced, in the face of such acknowledgements.

If an agreement to open an award is signed by the attorney of one of the parties, though he had no authority, yet, if the party for whom he assumed to act subsequently ratifies the act, it is valid.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of Hamilton County.

The record in this case shows the following state of facts: The parties on the 13th of April, 1847, mutually executed bonds, and agreed to submit all matters in controversy between them to arbitra- 449 tors, to be indifferently chosen by them, which was done.

On the 23d of April of same year, the arbitrators, so chosen, made an award—by which among other things, they awarded to O'Bryan, the appellant, the sum of four hundred and seven dollars and ninety-seven cents.

At the foot of the bond of submission, signed by Reed the appellee, there is an agreement also signed by him, but not by appellant, to the effect that the award be made a judgment of the Circuit Court of Hamilton county.

Subsequently, the parties agreed to open the award, and to submit to the arbitrators all matters which they had failed to adjudicate, and all such as they had adjudicated, but had not set forth in their award. No other award was ever made by the arbitrators.

At the spring term, 1848, of the Circiut Court held in and for the County of Hamilton, the appellant, by his attorneys, moved that the bond of submission and award be made a rule of court, as stipulated and provided for in said bond, and that judgment be entered thereon and execution issue according to law. This motion being heard at the fall term of said court, the Hon. THOMAS BALTZELL presiding, was overruled.

From this decision the defendant prayed an appeal, which was granted.

Randall, for Appellant:

The record in this case sets forth the rule which was applied for and refused, and the refusal of which error is precidicated.

The stipulation that the award be made a rule of court, also appears of record.

The award was made and signed, 23d April, 1847, but no where does it appear when it was published—by delivery of a copy or other notice.

On its face and its terms it is final and complete, as respects the matters in controversy. It declares and decides, in the outset, that Reed is indebted to O'Bryan, in a certain sum absolutely due, viz: the sum of $407 97-100.

It then directs and awards certain acts to be done and omitted by plaintiff, O'Bryan, which we prove by his own affidavit, and by that of Purviance, one of the arbitrators, that he (O'Bryan) fully complied with, doing what was prescribed to him, and omitting to do 450 what was forbidden him in the award.

It is fully in proof, also, that defendant Reed, accepted at his hands performance of the acts enjoined upon O'Bryan, such as the return of the draft or order on Blood; that Reed also received the benefit of the withdrawal or dismissal of the suit then pending against him; that he held on to the joint chattels reserved to him by the award, and the debts or claims due to the partners mutually for lumber.

Thereis no evidence that defendant, Reed, has done one act, either to comply with the terms of the award, or to set it aside by course of law, further than by opposing the granting of this rule.

No motion or ruling was made or attempted in court to carry out the provisions of the bond of submission, or to enforce or set aside the award, until the rule entered by O'Bryan in February, 1848.

The cause of this delay, as appears by the proofs, was the effort made by the parties (which failed through Reed's opposition) to settle their dispute amicably, on the principles of the award, and without invoking the aid of the court; but we deny that O'Bryan ever consented or designed to give up or release the award made.

The proposal (for it in effect was no more) to open the award, to make it "more in form"—not being legally executed by Reed, but by the act of his attorney in signing his name to it being disavowed, and found fault—was no more than a mere inchoate, unexecuted project—not binding on either, and left the original award unimpaired and in full force.

Moreover, it will be seen that such projected new submission did not profess to do more than to make the original award more formal, and to extend to O'Bryan a longer time to return the order on Blood, or to indemnify Reed for his non-return—a matter rendered altogether useless and superfluous by O'Bryan's actual return of said order, as proved by Purviance. That proposed submission also provided, "that the award be entered on the docket of the court."

No new valid submission, then having been made—no new award allowed to be made by defendant—the old award, the only one in the cause, stood good, until set aside, on motion and proofs of its illegality or insufficiency, by one or other of the parties.

In the court below it was objected, that the application for the rule was too late—that it should have been made at a prior term of court, 451 the term next after the date of the award, viz: at the fall term, 1847.

To this objection we have a two-fold answer. One, a denial of the fact on which it is founded; and next, as to the law applicable to the fact assumed.

1st. We answer, the objection assumes (from the absence of proof) that the award was made when it bears date. This by no means follows: for in legal contemplation, until the parties are duly notified by delivery of a copy, if the submission so provide, or by publication, is of no award. 2nd Archbold's Prac., 1251, (note.) Watson Arb. & Aw., p. 131, last. Edn. p. 81, old edition. 2d Archbold's Prac., 1230.

Here, too, it appears in the proofs, that the award was retained or held back, by mutual consent and for further negotiations, which, however, ultimately led to nothing.

But, before proceeding to the other branch of the enquiry, viz: the law applicable to the fact, it may be convenient to dispose of another objection, which was, "that the submission should have been made a rule of court, prior to the award being made." This we respectfully deny to be the law in England, or in Florida. In England, under the statute 9 and 10th William III., sec. 15, (which corresponds substantially with our act of the Legislature on the same subject,) the submission and award may both be made a rule of court at the same time. Watson Arb. & Aw., p. 14, top. 27 & 8 margin, and cases cited. For the statute 9 & 10 Wm. III., sec. 15, see p. 13 & 14, Watson's old edition—p. 46, new edition.

The language of Watson is, "that where there is consent of parties to this effect, the statute has been construed largely," &c.; and "thus a consent in the arbitration bond to make the award a rule of court instead of the submission, will, it seems, warrant the interposition of the court under the act."

Let the court now compare the terms of the act of Florida, (p. 399 of Thompson's Digest,) with the statutes of 9 & 10 Wm. IIId., and it will be seen that they alike say, "That the submission shall be made a rule of court," &c. Yet such terms justify the parties, when they consent, to make the award, as well as the submission, a rule of court; and for the veryobvious reason, that the award in such a case becomes part of the submission, if not the very submission itself.

452 And now recurring to the first objection, that our rule was not entered in time, and waiving the answer, that "non constat," when in legal contemplation the award was made, we answer as to the law.

2d. By denying that there is any thing in our statute, which imposes the duty upon the party claiming the benefit of the award, and seeking its enforcement, to have it entered a rule of court, at the term next ensuing the making thereof.

On the contrary, we hold, that the only provision of the statute, viz: the 4th section, limiting the time of filing a rule, contemplates and embraces the proceeding on the part of him who seeks to set it aside, and not of him who claims its benefit, and seeks to sustain it. See 4th sect., act Nov. 17, 1828, Thomp. D., 400. Duv. 236. Here it is manifest, that the time prescribed is by way of limitation, but it applies alone to the party who moves to set it aside.

If it be objected, "that the party last referred to could not make such motion before the submission and award were filed," we answer—that it is perfectly competent for either party to make such preliminary motion to enter the rule, with a view to the final action of the court, either to set it aside, or to establish it as the judgment of the court. The submission and award belong equally to both parties, and their rights are reciprocal.

It is laid down in Watson, (new ed., p. 265,) that the entering the submission a rule of court, is an essential preliminary to any motion touching the award. And in 2d Arch. Pr., p. 1253, it is laid down as the first practical proceeding to set aside an award.

Thus, then, Reed, who now objects to this award and seeks to set it aside, or rather to treat it as a nullity, should himself have made the preliminary motion or rule, to enter the submission, &c. to secure redress, if the award were liable to be impeached.

An award made under a submission by deed, stipulating that the same be made a rule, and become the judgment of a court of record, (as is the case before the court,) is a grave and solemn act and creates liabilities on both sides, which may not be lightly avoided, or escaped by inaction and neglect.

The statute of 9 & 10 Wm. III., and the Florida statute on the same subject, and in effect and substance the same, (the last being no doubt substantially copied from the first,) both limit the time to make motions to set aside awards; and by reference to Watson, (new ed., p. 269, old ed, p. 156,) and to 2d Arch. Pr., p. 1251, (London ed.,) it will be seen that the utmost rigor is insisted on as to 453 time, and scarcely an excuse allowed for delay, when the object is to defeat these salutary domestic judgments.

And now, as to the construction of the Florida act, where in the absence of decisions under that act, we must resort to analogous reasoning. By the 4th sec. of the Florida statute, (p. 401 of Thomp. Dig.,) the motion to set aside the award must be made at the term ensuing—that is, (it is conceived,) at the term next after the rule is entered, or at the same term, if ten days' notice of such motion can be given. But let it be borne in mind, that, under the doctrine and directions cited above, from Watson and Archbold, the defendant himself might have entered the rule of court, as his own pleasure and convenience, whereon to ground a motion to set aside the award. But relying as he did upon our taking the initative, and moving the rule, that section would have given him the whole of the spring term to make such motion.

Next comes the 6th sec., (Thomp. D., 401,) which provides that "if no motion be made to set aside any award, &c.. it may be entered of record at the ensuing term of said court." "Ensuing term of said court?"—ensuing what?

Why, evidently, ensuing that term wherein the other party had time to the end thereof (the court not holding ten days) "to move to set it aside." This is certainly the most reasonable principle of construction, and one which assimilates this proceeding to all others, where time is given to a party to object, on "rules nisi," or other proceedings.

No such rule can be made absolute—no interloctuory or other order or judgment be confirmed, until such time shall have elapsed.—The motion to confirm or make absolute is always postponed, until the time allowed to vacate or set aside shall have expired.

The language of the section is, "If no motion be made to set aside any award made as aforesaid, it may be entered of record at the ensuing term of said court, during the term thereof."

According to every rule of grammatical construction, the term "ensuing" must of necessity refer to the next and only antecedent, viz: "The motion to set aside the award," which, by the 4th section, must be made at the first "term ensuing the filing of the same."

Reason and grammatical construction, and uniform decisions under a similiar law, concur in this interpretation.

Suppose the counsel of Reed had moved at the spring term, 1848, 454 after entering on the order book the rule moved by plaintiff, (and nothing we have seen prevented him from anticipating the action of plaintiff,) and had moved then "to set aside the award."

"Es debito justiciae," or "ex gratia"—as a matter of legal right, or by indulgence of the court, (the term consisting of less than ten days,) that whole term would have been allowed him wherein to make such motion.

So, if plaintiff had, at the fall term, 1847, (the first term ensuing the making of the award, taking its date, and not its publication, as the test of when made,) then entered his motion to make the award a rule of court, he could not have had his rule made absolute, for the same reason, until the spring term, 1848, when he did apply for it.

But that motion being made first at the spring term, 1848, of necessity the rule or order to set up and establish must have been postponed until the next, or ensuing term, viz: the fall term, 1848.

The court will see that defendant has altogether failed at any time to move in the matter. He has availed himself of all the privileges and advantages of the award, (as our proofs exhibit,) he has thereby (we contend) waived all legal right of making said motion, or of impeaching the award, on any grounds, but of legal defects apparent on the face of the proceedings.

And now, on general principles, we would ask, what reason can apply for coercing a party seeking to obtain an award to this extreme diligence, in limiting him to a short day, wherein to enter his rule?

It is not usually the policy of the law nor needful, to oblige the creditor or claimant to use summary or stringent methods to obtain the benefit of his claim. His own interest and selfish feelings, in such case, usually require restraint, rather than stimulants to activity.

Our proofs further show and assign a satisfactory reason for the short delay; and not a suggestion has been made that defendant was injured thereby. Delay is what the debtor seeks as beneficial, what the creditor avoids as injurious.

The policy of England and of this country both concur in sustaining awards, the judgments of those cheap "domestic forums."—No stronger evidence of this is required, than the laws passed to encourage them, and the liberal and enlarged principles of construction applied to them universally.

The award and submission here are both in writing and under seal, and their evidence of a certain, durable character. Had they been by "parol," there might be reason for urgency in setting them up.

And yet awards may be made by "parol," if the terms of the submission do not forbid it ;and it seems the courts can enforce the execution of parol awards by attachment. Watson on Arb. & Aw., p. 307, 81-'131.

So also the submission may be by "parol." Same p. 6. But it is conceded that neither in England, nor under our law, could such be made a rule of court.

But, again, we ask the court to regard the terms of this 6th section? They are—"it (i. e. the award) may be entered of "record at the ensuing term of said court."

The term, "may be," is directory and permissive, not imperative or restrictive. The permission is for the advantage of the party seeking it. The statute states the nearest, but not the latest time for its exercise.

The legislature could not contemplate, that a party seeking to recover his debt would himself cause needless delay, nor would they be likely to deem any limitation of time in such case necessary.

Lastly, it appears that this time or delay was agreed to in this case as a mutual favor; and, further, that while the defendant has received all the benefit of the provisions of the award in his favor, plaintiff, by this very arbitrament and award, has parted with every thing, and received nothing.

W. P. Duval, for Appellee:

I. In this case no bill of exceptions is filed. Such facts only can becomes a part of the record and be brought before this court as are contained in a bill of exceptions. The exceptions must be taken and signed at the trial of a cause, unless further time for making them up be given by the Judge. 2 Tidd's Prac., 910, 911. 9 Wheat., 651. 5 Cond. U. S. R. 4 Peters, 102. 5 Id. 248. 4 How. 4, 198.

Therefore, the affidavit of B. G. O'Bryan and H. E. Purviance, the notice to Reed by O'Bryan, on page 2nd of the record, and the statement of facts by the clerk, on page 14, except that the motion was argued and disposed of, cannot be noticed by this court. Besides, such testimony is illegal in a proceeding in arbitration. The 456 court can have before it only the submission bond or agreement, the award and the entires by the clerk of the proceedings on the record; except where motion is made to set aside an award, when the statute (Duval, 236, sec. 5,) allows affidavits to be received.

II. The Appellant is not entitled to his motion that the award be made a rule of court, because,

1 .There is no "award" on which the court can act. There is a writing, purporting to be a bond, by Reed, to submit to an arbitration, 13th April, 1847. An award was made, in pursuance thereof, signed 23d April. An agreement was then entered into between the parties, (endorsed on the award,) that the award should be opened, omissions inserted, various other material alterations made and, in fact, a different and new award made by the arbitrators. No such new award appears on the record. By the Appellant's own agrement, then, there is no award that can be made a rule of court.

But the appellant alleges that this agreement is void, because it is proved that Reed disavowed the authority of his attorney to sign the agreement. The evidence of this disavowal, he says, is in the affidavits. It has already been shown that the affidavits had no place in the record. Moreover, they show only that the affiant understood from Peden that Reed denied his authority. But Peden, as attorney at law, could submit the case to arbitration. 7 Cranch, 436. 4 Cond., 560. Buckland v. Conway, 16 Mass., 396. Talbor v. McGee, 4 Munroe Ky. R., 377. Evans v. Thompson, 5 East., 189.—3 East., 466.

2. If the agreement between O'Bryan and Reed be void and we take only the bond of Reed and the award in pursuance of it, there can be no rule entered.

There must be mutuality in a submission to arbibtration—a mutual bond or agreement. 2 Arch. Prac., 323.—The statute, (Duval, 236, sec. 2,) requires that the agreement be signed by the parties. They must both consent. There is no evidence of such mutuality of consent on the record. But one bond is filed, and that signed by Reed alone. If the consent of one only is sufficient, what would be the consequences? The one making it is liable on his bond in case he do not perform the award, and is liable if he choose to revoke his submission before award made and rule of court entered. 2 Arch. Prac. 324. But there is no bond or agreement to hold the one not consenting to the performance of the award. Should the award be that he should pay money, judgment could not be entered against 457 him. He has entered into no agreement that execution might issue against him . It can be issued only where he has made the consent in writing, and the rule is entered in pursuance of it. If the award be that the party signing the consent do something else than the payment of money, and he do not perform, he is considered in contempt of court and will be put in jail. Duval, 236. But he not signing his clear of any such consequences. The court has no hold on him. The record shows that he has not submitted to its authority. Such a one-sided proceeding would be contrary to the statute and to every principle of law.

3. This award can never be entered of record. The statute, Duval, 236, directs that it be entered at the ensuing term of court. It is attempted to be enforced the second term after it was made.—Where a party pursues a mode allowed by the statute he must comply precisely with the course it points out.

4. An award should be so plainly expressed that there would be no uncertainty as to the manner in which it is to be executed. Schuyler vs. Van Derbeer, 2 Caines, 235. See also 9 Johns., 43.

A part of the award is that "the order given O'Bryan by Reed, on Blood, (amount, one hundred and sixty-seven dollars and eighteen cents,) be returned to Reed within thirty days, or charged to O'Bryan and deducted from the above award." It is not certain, though probable, that the intention of the arbitrators was that $167 18 be deducted from $407 97. Other things respecting money are awarded after the $407 97, before this order on Blood is reached. There is a more material uncertainty. Shall O'Bryan return the order, or shall he have the option of having it charged to him by Reed. See Barnes, 166. Or is it to be returned to Reed within thirty days, and if not, then to be deducted from the award. This is a matter of speculation.

5. The award should have been final, which it is not. In Pedley v. Goddard, 7 Term R., 73, the defendant was to pay plaintiff a sum of money within twenty-one days, (which was after the time limited for making the award,) unless defendant should exonerate plaintiff, by affidavit, from certain payments and receipts. The award was held not to be final, and void. In this case the award on the order to Blood is also in the alternative and should to be performed within thirty days, which was after the time limited for making the award.

There is nothing certain or final as to "the order on Stewart."— 458 Who is to have the order? Shall Reed? Probably. Has O'Bryan got it in his possession, and is he to deliver it to Reed? Suppose he has it; there is no award that he deliver it to Reed.

The award is, in respect to other matters, uncertain, defective and not final, and therefore void.

The agreement endorsed on the award shows that it was otherwise defective and incomplete. The admission of O'Bryan, to this effect, is equal to an affidavit to set aside the award, or an admission of mistake by the arbitrators.

6. Where there is no cause in court, the award, as to costs, depends entirely upon the terms of submission. If the submission gives the arbitrator no authority as to costs, he cannot award them.—Arch. Practice, 228. In this case no such authority was given.

Randall in reply:

In answer to the first point taken by counsel for appellee, it will be sufficient to say that there was no occasion whatever for a bill of exceptions. The ruling of the court appealed from was a motion in writing, founded on specialties and sustained by affidavits, with a view to a statutory remedy. Thomp. D., 399.

By reference to English works touching the enforcing of the performance of awards, (2 Arch. Prac., 1255,) it will be seen that affidavits are required from parties seeking the enforcement. And this answers the assertion on the other side that affidavits are only admissible on the part of him seeking to set aside the award.

The terms of the 5th section of the Florida statute, (Thomp. Dig., 400,) repudiate this motion.

To the second point taken by counsel for appellee, the argument already made is deemed a sufficient reply. So, also, with regard to the third and fourth objections.

As to the fifth court need only turn to the case referred to under this head, in 7 Term R., to see that there is not the least similarity in the cases. Every thing that was directed to be done by O'Bryan has been done. If the directions of the award have, in all respects, been complied with by him, and Reed has had the benefit of the compliance, it is final.

Opinion by Chief Justice DOUGLAS:

This case comes up by appeal from a decision of the Circuit Court for Hamilton county, made at the last Fall term, overruling a motion which had been entered upon the order book of said court; and a bond of submission and award, filed 17th day of February, 1848.—This motion was at the spring term of that year continued until the said fall term, and is in the following words, to wit: "Ex parte.—Basil G. O'Bryan, in a matter of arbibtration between Basil and William M. Reed, Middle Circuit of Florida, Hamilton Circuit Court. Motion that the said bond of submission and award be made a rule of court, as stipulated and provided for in said bond of submission, and that judgment be entered thereon and execution issue according to law."

O'Bryan vs. Reed.—Opinion of Court.

The first section of our statute, entitled an act concerning arbitration and awards, (Duval's Comp., 255, Thompson's Dig., page 399,) provides for submitting matters of difference, &c. to arbitration, and declares that the parties to such admission "may stipulate and agree either in the bond, &c. of submission, or by a separate agreement, that said submission and arbitration shall be made a rule of any court in this State;" and the 2d section enacts, "That when any submission is intended to be made a rule of court as aforesaid, an agreement to that effect in writing, signed by the parties, shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the court of which said submission is to be made a rule, and the clerk shall enter said rule."

The motion was made by the appellant, and it appears by the record of the proceedings in the cause, including certain affidavits filed by the appellant in the court below, (but which the appellee by his counsel insists are not a part of the record, because they were not brought into it by a bill of exceptions,) that, on the 13th day of April, 1847, the parties to this proceeding, under bond mutually executed by them, agreed to submit all matters in controversy between them to arbitration—that arbitrators were mutually chosen by them, to whom those matters were submitted, and that said arbitrators, on the 23d day of April, 1837, made an award

At the foot of the submission bond of the appellee, the only one in the record, is the following, viz: "And it is further agreed that said award be made a judgment of the Circuit Court of Hamilton county, and said State"—which agreement is signed by (Wm. M. Reed) the appellee.

Whether such an agreement was appended to the bond by O'Bryan or not, the record does not show; and there is no authority to enter 460 such a rule, unless the agreement to that effect in writing, signed by the parties, be filed; at least such is the express provision of the statute ,from which we should not be inclined to depart, without some good cause shown, (if at all.) Here no cause is shown—it does not appear that there is any such agreement signed by the parties; or if, upon the equity of the statute, separate agreements signed by the parties were sufficient, and we were at liberty to presume that O'Bryan had signed one at the foot of his bond; it is not shown that any effort was made to have it filed in court. If, therefore, such an agreement was signed by O'Bryan, it cannot effect the case; but besides this, although the motion to make the submission and award a rule and judgment of the court, is alleged to have been made pursuant to that agreement, and substantially in accordance with it, yet we find by reference to the record, that, after the award was made and published, an agreement was entered into by and between the parties, that it should be opened and the matters referred to the same arbitrators, to make a new award; and that it was thus referred back, and one of the arbitrators, (Mr. Purviance,) whose affidavit was taken and filed by the appellant in the court below, in support of said motion, states that he did, at the instance of the said O'Bryan and Peden, acting as attorney for Reed, make out the draft of another award, but the said draft was never executed or signed by the arbitrators.

It has been objected on behalf of the appellant, that there is no evidence to show that said Peden had any authority from the appellee to make the said agreement to open the said award, and that the appellee disaffirmed the agreement, and denied his authority to make it; but in looking into the affidavit of Mr. Purviance, before mentioned, which contains all that is said in the record of any such disaffirmance and denial of authority, we find that he states as follows, viz: After stating that the arbitrators under the bond of submission mutually executed between them ,said O'Bryan and Reed, dated the 13th April, 1847, made an award, which was designed to be a final award at the time, goes on to say, "That subsequently the parties met at the house of the affiant, for the purpose of further negotiating touching said award, with a view to explain away obscurities in it, (if any such existed,) and to extend the time for O'Bryan to return the order on Blood, or make indemnity for the same." "That, at such meeting, Reed was represented by James A. Peden. Esq., his attorney, who made and signed an agreement touching the award, 46 which affiant afterwards understood from Peden that Reed disaffirmed, and denied his (Penden's) authority in the premises." Now the latter clause, "which affiant afterwards understood from Peden," &c., is all that the record discloses of the disaffirmance and denial of Peden's authority by Reed; and that, it will be observed, is hearsay testimony only, and is opposed by the statement of Purviance himself who says Reed was represented by James A. Peden, Esq., his attorney, and by the action of Reed in relation to this matter, who, when this motion came on to be argued in the court below, objected to any judgment on the award, and assigned amongst other reasons this :"because by the terms of the agreement atached to the award the same was opened, and another was to be made, thereby sustaining this statement of Mr. Purviance, and recognizing and affirming the acts of James A. Peden, Esq., as his attorney in the premises; and now, in this court, he again recognizes and re-affirms it, by objecting to a reversal of the judgment rendered by the court below in this case, upon the same ground. It is a familiar principle, that "the acts of one having no authority will be made valid by the ratification of the person for whom he assumed to act." Lent v. Padleford, 10 Mass. By this agreement, the award was opened, and, therefore, there is now no award to be enforced, and this of itself is a fatal objection to so much of the motion as asked to have "the award made a rule of court, and that judgment be entered thereon and execution issue," and saves us the necessity of enquiring whether this would have been the proper mode of enforcing such an award, of looking into the other objections against it which have been presented for our consideration.

There is one matter, however, in relation to this award, which we deem it proper for us to notice, which is, that, by the agreement to open it, th parties agreed "that the arbitrators insert all matters which they have omitted, in the purview contained, and which they have adjudicated, but omitted to set forth." This agreement, it is to be observed, is signed by the appellant, and if it were not valid as an 46 agreement to open the award, for lack of authority in Peden to make it, still it would seem to be a sufficient acknowledgment by the appellant that matters had been submitted to the arbitrators, which were not adjudicated by them, and that others were adjudicated, which they omitted to state in their award, and with such omisisons before us acknowledged by one of the parties, we should hesitate much before we should make an order to enforce the award against the other: for that an award does not embrace all matters submitted to the arbitrator, is one of the very reasons assigned in the books for setting it aside. Watson on Arbitration and Award, 159, 8 Law Lib. Whether the affidavits referred to are properly a part of the record or not, is of no importance to this case, as our decision would have been the same, had they not been in it. We looked into them to as certain if they really contained any legal and substantial proof of the alleged disaffirmance and denial of Peden's authority by Wm. Reed, the appellee. Had they done so, we might have left ourselves constrained to examine that question. Finding, however, that they contain no such proof, and that the hearsay evidence on the subject is more than neutralized by the positive statement of the same witness, and what is of more importance, the authority of Mr. Peden having been fully recognized and affirmed by the appellee, and no agreement, such as the statute prescribes, to make the submission a rule of court, having been filed; we can perceive no error in the judgment of the court below.

If such an agreement had been filed, or if it had been clearly shown that an agreement to make the submission or award a rule of Hamilton Circuit Court had been appended to the bond of Mr. O'Bryan, the appellant, and that he was unable to file it from the fault of the appellee, or his refusal to permit him to do so, or at least without any fault on his own part, we are not prepared to say but that the motion ought (under such circumstances) to have been so far sustained, as to have permitted the rule to be entered, to stand until a new award should be made. There seems to have been no time limited in the agreement to open the award, within which the new one was to be made; as no such agreement was filed, and no such proof was shown, it is unnecessary for us now to decide that question. For reasons stated, the judgment is affirmed.

Bradford, Adm'r et al. vs. Marvin and Martin.—Statement of Case.

RICHARD H. BRADFORD, ADMINISTRATOR, ET AL., APPELLANTS, vs. WILLIAM MARVIN & NOAH M. MARTIN, APPELLEES.

The right of the vendor to an equitable lien upon the lands sold is a right that exists, but may be waived, if the vendor takes a collateral security, binding others as well as the vendee.

The taking of separate or independent security, if it is not pre se a waiver of the vendor's lien, is at least prima facie evidence of such waiver; and the onus is upon the vendor, to show that it ought to have that effect.

Where the vendor simply takes the note or bond of the vendee, and makes a conveyance, he retains a specific lien upon the land, subject, however, to be defeated by the intervention of creditors or purchasers without notice.

Where the vendor has parted with the title, the surety has no right to claim to be substituted to the rights of the creditor, unless he has paid the money—and even then, he has no greater rights than the creditor himself had.

The surety may compel a sale of the lands to save himself harmless, where the title has been retained by the vendor.

Marvin and Martin, in the year 1844, filed their bill of complaint in the late Superior Court of St. John's county, against Mary Eliza Read, Teresa Bellamy Read and Richard H. Bradford, administrator of the estate of Leigh Read, setting forth and showing that, on the 12th day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, the said Marvin was seized and possessed of three thousand five hundred acres of land, being a part and portion of an undivided tract of four thousand acres, ceded by the Spanish Government to one Don Francisco Roman Sanchez, and described in said cession as being situate ten miles to the westward of the Alachua road, leading to St. Mary's and bounded on the north by the Sante Fee river, and on the other sides by vacant lands, and since surveyed under the authority of the United States, and lies in township six and seven south, range eighteen, and is known upon the plat of said survey as the claim of Francis R. Sanchez, and which said premises are situate in the county of Alachua, in the Eastern District of Florida aforesaid; and was also at the same time aforesaid seized and possessed of an undivided estate and interest of, fifteen hundred acres, being part and parcel of another tract of land, containing two thousand acres, ceded by the Spanish Government to one Don Jose Simeon San-464 chez, and described in said cession as being situate on the Santa Fee river, and bounded on the west by lands of Don Francisco Roman Sanchez, and other sides by said river, and which has since been surveyed under the authority of the United States, and lies in township six and seven south, range eighteen, in the county of Alachua, and is known upon the plat of said survey as the claim of Jose S. Sanchez and others. And that the said Marvin being so seized and possessed as aforesaid, did, on the day aforesaid, bargain, sell and convey to one Leigh Read, of the county of Leon, all of his estate and interest in the said two tracts of land, for the consideration of five thousand dollars, to be paid at five years, with annual interest, and did receive at the time of said sale and conveyance the promissory note of said Read, and of Noah M. Martin, as his surety, for the said sum of five thousand dollars, payable five years after date, with interest annually.

That one year's interest on said note or purchase money was paid by the said Read at the time it became due, and that no part or portion of the principal of the said note or purchase money, or of the interest thereon, except as above stated, was ever paid by the said Read in his lifetime, or by his representative since his death, or by any other person, and that the same is still due and owing.

That Noah M. Martin was induced to become the surety of the said Read, for the payment of the said purchase money, in the full reliance and expectation that the premises purchased by him would always be worth the price agreed to be given, and that the proceeds of a sale of them would always in equity and good conscience be held and considered by the said Read, and by the law of the land, as a sacred fund, for the payment of the said purchase money, in preference to any other debt or claim against the said Read.

Since the sale and conveyance aforesaid to the said Read, and the giving of the said note, to wit: Sometime about the year eighteen hundred and forty, the said Read died seized of the said premises and intestate, leaving heirs surviving, his widow Mary Eliza Read, and an infant daughter named Teresa Bellamy Read, his only heir at law, both of Leon County, in the Territory aforesaid; and that one Richard H. Bradford, upon the death of said Read, was duly appointed the administrator, and is now the administrator of the estate of the said Read.

That the said purchase money has sometime since become due, and he has frequently applied to said administrator in a friendly man- 465
ner, and requested him to pay and discharge the principal and interest thereof, but that the said administrator refuses so to do, and has informed your complainant that the estate of the said Read is insolvent, and that he has not assets in his hands to pay the said purchase money.

That in equity and in good conscience the said lands ought to be held and considered in the hands of the said administrator, and in the hands of the said Teresa Bellamy Read, as a fund for the payment of the said purchase money, in preference to any other claims against the estate of the said Read; and praying that the premises aforesaid may be decreed to be sold, and out of the moneys arising from the sale thereof, he, the said Marvin, may be paid the amount which may then be due him, as and for the purchase money aforesaid.

In 1846, this cause having been transferred to the Circuit Court of St. Johns county, Richard H. Bradford filed his answer, insisting that there was no equity shown in the bill; admitting the sale and conveyance, and the execution of the promissory note, signed by Read and Martin, and averring that the estate of Read was hopelessly insolvent. That judgments for large amounts had been recovered against him as administrator, and that said judgments had priority over the claim of Marvin, the complainant; that he had no assets except the lands mentioned in complainant's bill, and some other property of small value; that the widow claimed dower in the lands, and that her claim was to be preferred to others. A separate answer was also filed by the widow; and the infant heir answered the bill by her guardian appointed for the purpose.

In June, 1847, a final decree was made in the cause, by the Hon THOMAS DOUGLAS, Judge, as follows:

"This cause coming on to be heard this day, and the said parties complainant being represented before this court, by Messrs. Forward and Fairbanks, their Solicitors, and the said defendants being represented by S. L. Burritt, Esq., their Solicitor, and the bill, answer and evidence in this cause having been read, and argument thereof had, as well on the part of the said complainants as on the part of the said defendants, and the cause having been submitted to this court for its decree and determination, and this court having maturely considered the same, doth order, adjudge and decree, that the lands described in and set forth in the bill of complaint, and 466 whereof conveyance was made to said Leigh Read, deceased, by said William Marvin, on the 12th day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, are and hereby declared to be subject to the lien of the said complainants for the purchase money thereof; and that the said lands are and shall be deemed to be held by the defendants, subject to such lien, and as a trust fund, out of which the note given by the said Leigh Read, deceased, and Noah M. Martin, for the purchase money, shall be first paid, in preference to any other debts or claims against the estate of the said Leigh Read, deceased.

"And, it is, therefore, further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that unless the said Richard H. Bradford, administrator of Leigh Read, as aforesaid, shall or do within sixty days from this date, pay or cause to be paid unto the said complainant, or his solicitor or solicitors, the amount due upon said purchase money which hath been reported, upon reference of the same to the clerk of this court, as special master, to be the sum of five thousand, nine hundred and eighty-five dollars and eighty-three cents, with interest from the date hereof until paid; that the said premises mentioned and described in the bill of complainant shall be sold by or under the direction of the sheriff of the county of Alachua, by virtue of this decree, in the same manner and under the same notice and advertisement, as required by law in case of sales of real estate upon judgments and execution at law, and that the said sheriff execute a deed of said premises, and put the purchaser or purchasers in possession thereof; and the proceeds of such sale shall be applied first to the payment of the taxed costs and expenses of this suit, and then to the satisfaction of the purchase money and interest aforesaid; and the balance, if any, shall be paid to the said R. H. Bradford, as administrator of Leigh Read, deceased."

From which decree, defendants appealed to this court.

Branch and Burritt for Appellants:

The doctrine that the vendor has a lien upon the land sold for the purchase money is derived from the civil law. Although it seems to settled and acquiesced in, in England and many of the States of this Union, its introduction was resisted in America until a comparatively recent period. Its policy may be well doubted, and in some States, as in Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania and North Carolina, Bradford, Adm'r et al. vs. Marvin and Martin.—Argument of Counsel.

467 the doctrine has either been rejected altogether, or exploded after trial.

The decision of this court will determine whether it is to be adopted in this State and form a part of its laws. It is a new question in this State; and this court, being in no way hampered by former decisions, is at liberty to decide as its wisdom shall deem best for the welfare of the State. It being no part of the common law, there is no obligation to adopt it, unless its own merits are such as to recommend it.

The spirit of our laws is decidedly against all secret trusts, liens and incumbrances. Hence our registration laws, which require all conveyances, incumbrances, trusts and liens on land to be recorded, so that the world may have notice of them. These provisions of the law are to enable purchasers and others to act understandingly, and prevent a person in possession of land from obtaining credit on what does not really belong to him. The doctrine that the vendor has an implied lien on the land is in direct opposition to these wise and wholesome provisions. It allows a vendor to have a mortgage, (as it were,) secret, and the existence of which can only be known to the vendor and vendee. It raises a secret or implied trust in favor of the vendor, which lies dormant and has no tangibility, until called into existence by a court of chancery. Such a doctrine not only, in many instances, works great injury, but is calculated to promote and produce litigation. The vendee being in possession and having an absolute deed, may sell to a third party whose utmost caution could not detect the secret lien existing upon it; and thus he would buy a law suit even if he did not lose the land.

It also enables the vendee to obtain a false credit by hiding from the eye of the world the encumbrance on his estate.

If the vendor wishes to retain a lien on the land sold, our statute has pointed out the manner in which it may be done. How far it is competent for this court to evade that statute by allowing it to be done in another and a different manner, it is not necessary in this case to inquire.

In the case before the court it is not necessary to discuss whether this doctrine of an implied lien of the vendor should be recognized or discarded; for the facts and circumstances of it are such as to take it out of the principle, admitting it to exist.

Admitting, then, that the vendor has a lien on the land sold for the 468 purchase money, all the authorities agree that this lien can be waived by the acts of the vendor.

Appellants contend that he has waived it:

1. By taking the bond or promissory note of the vendee.

The court will find that the only questions which have been discussed or mooted in the courts of England are, first, whether the lien existed at all, and, second, whether the taking of a separate security, as the bond or note of the vendee, without security, was not a waiver. It will find, also, that whilst it has been decided that a lien existed, the question whether taking a bond or note without security is a waiver is still open and undecided. The following cases, decided in England and America, take the ground that the taking of a separate security, as the note of the vendee, without security, will be a waiver.

The case of Winston v. Anson, in 1st Simons & Stuart, cited below, is the latest in England, and of the highest authority. Winston v. Anson, 1 Simons & Stuart R., 434. Tarwel v. Heelis, Amb. R., 734. Nairne v. Prowse, 6 Vesey R., 752. Wragg v. Comptroller General, 2 Dess. S. C. R., 509. Womble v. Battle, 4 Iredell E. R., 182. Kauflett v. Bowen, 7 Serg. & Raw. R., 64. Semple v. Burt, Ibidem. 6 Conn. R., 464. 17 Conn. R., 583.

2. Appellants contend: That Marvin, the vendor, by taking the negotiable promissory note of Read, with Martin as security thereon, and payable at the expiration of five years, waived the lien which he might have had on the land.

All the authorities agree that taking the promissory note of the vendee, with a third party as security, is a waiver of the lien. There is not an authority to the contrary. 4 Kent's Comm., 151 and 152. Fish v. Howland, 1 Paige R., 20. Gilman v. Brown, 1 Mason C. C. R., 191. Brown et al v. Gilman, 4 Wheat R., 255. 4 Cond. 3. Appellants contend: That the court erred in giving the lien of Marvin, if he had any, a preference over the judgment creditors of Read.

It appears from the bill and answer that the estate of Read is insolvent, and the answer expressly sets forth that there was a large number of judgments against the estate of Read. Bayley v. Green- 46 leaf, 7 Wheat. R., 46. 5 Cond. R., 229.

The statute requires all conveyances, mortgages and transfers of any interest in real estate to be recorded, to be good against creditors. Thompson's Digest, 180.

4. The appellants contend: That the court below erred in not allowing the claim of Mary Eliza Read, widow of Leigh Read, to dower in said lands.

The claim to dower vested in the widow, immediately upon the execution of the deed to Leigh Read, her husband. It became a legal claim, and cannot be postponed to the claim of the vendor, which is merely equitable.

The statute points out the only mode in which her claim to dower can be divested. Thompson's Digest, 179.

Forward and Marvin, for Appellees:

The bill states that the complainant (Marvin) in 1839 sold a tract of land in Alachua county to Leigh Read for $5,000, payable in five years, and took Reed's note, with the other complainant (Martin) as surety on the note for the purchase money. Reed afterwards died, having paid no part of the purchase money, and the heir and administrator refusing to pay for the land, this bill is filed to subject the land to the payment of the purchase money. The principal facts are admitted in the answers.

The complainant's counsel contends—

1st. That the vendor of real estate has in equity a lien upon the land for the purchase money, as against the vendee and his heir and representative.

This lien is created by law, and is an actual interest or right in the land, which cannot be lost or impaired but by agreement. 2 Story's Commentaries on Equity, 462-'3, 475. 15 Vesey Jur., 329. (Sumner's edition.) 1 Schoales & Lefroy, 132. 6 Vesey Jur., 759, 760. 1 Johnson's Chancey, 308. 9 Cowen, 316.

2d. The taking of Martin as surety upon the note does not by itself extinguish the lien or waive it. The lien, which is a vested right, can be extinguished, lost or waived, only by the agreement of the vendor, which agreement is not to be implied or presumed, but proved as a fact. The inquiry is, as to the fact of an agreement on the part of the vendor to waive his lien. If there is no agreement then there is no waiver. The vendee, relying upon the waiver, must 47 prove the agreement to waive. 2 Story's Equity, 469. 1 Schoale & Lefroy, 132

The taking of Martin as surety is only evidence, testimony tending to prove another fact, the agreement to waive, and is not sufficient ALONE and without other circumstances, to establish the fact that the vendor agreed to waive the lien. 2 Story's Equity, 469. 15 Vesey, 329, great case. 3 Russell, 488, in 3 Cond. Eng. Chancery, 495. 1 Schoales & Lefroy, 132. 1 Brown's Chancery, 372, note A., to the case of Blackburn v. Gregson, (Perkins' American edition.)— 2 Ves. & Bea., 306. 9 Cowen, 316. The case of Gilman v. Brown, in 1 Mason, 212, is new and unprecedented. It is the opinion of an able judge, but unsupported by previous authorities, and was uncalled for by the facts of the case.

3d. The surety (Martin) is entitled to have the land sold. Stump v. Rogers, 1 Ohio Reports, 225. Green v. Crocket, 1 Dev., and Batt. Eq., 390. Arnold v. Hicks, 3 Iredell Eq., 17. 1 Randolph, 53. 1 Deveraux, 151. 2 Bland's Chancery, 199, note C.

SHLAO

HAWKINS, Justice, delivered the following opinion:

The questions arising in this case for the decision of the court are these: 1st. Can a vendor enforce a specific lien in equity against a vendee for the land sold, the vendor giving the vendee an absolute deed in fee simple, and, in return therfor, taking the promissory note of the purchaser, with a third person thereon as security?

2d. Can the surety, without having paid the purchase money, be entitled to have the lands (so sold) set apart as a specific fund for the payment of the note?

We have given the subject the consideration due to its importance, and more especially as it is the first case that has arisen in our courts involving a solution of the above propositions.

The right of the vendor to an equitable lien upon the property sold, seems to have derived its source from the civil law, and constituted what was termed a tacit hypothecation, or secret mortgage. It has been much discussed in the courts of England and in this country, and the doctrine exists and is fully sustained in England and in most of the States of the Union; but difficulties have arisen out of the question, what shall constitute a waiver of the implied lien? This, indeed, is the very question before the court.

During the argument, all the British cases pro and con, both before the Revolution and since, having a bearing upon the question, were cited and commented upon with great ability, and it seems they cannot be very easily reconciled with each other. Judge Story, however, remarks, in Gilman v. Brown, that "on a careful examination of all the authorities, he does not find a single case in which it has been held, if the vendor takes a collateral security, binding others as well as the vendee—as for instance a bond or note with a surety or an endorser, or a collateral security by way of pledge or mortgage—that ,under such circumstances, a lien exists on the land itself." If such be the case, the American authorities are not contra but ultra merely those of England.

Without going into detail as to the British authorities, it will be sufficient as to them to quote the neat and precise summary of Chancellor Kent. He remarks: "It has been a question much discussed as to the facts and circumstances which would amount to the taking of security from the vendee, so as to destroy the existence of the lien. In several cases it is held, that, taking a bond from the vendee for the purchase money, or the unpaid part of it, affected the vendor's equity, as being evidence that it was waived; but the weight of authority and the better opinion is, that, taking a bond, note, or covenant from the vendee for the payment of the money, is not of itself an act of waiver of the lien, for such instruments are only the ordinary evidence of the debt. Taking a note, bill, or bond, with distinct security, or taking the distinct security by itself, either in the shape of real or personal property, from the vendee, or taking the responsibility of a third person, is evidence that the seller did not repose upon the lien, but upon independent security; and it discharges the lien. Taking the deposit of stock is also a waiver of the lien, and, notwithstanding the decision of the Master of the Rolls, in Grant v. Mills, holding that a bill of exchange, drawn by the vendee, and accepted by him and his partner, did not waive the lien, the sounder doctrine and the higher authority is, that, taking the responsibility of a third person for the purchase money, is taking security, and extinguishes the lien." 4th Kent's Com., 152, 153.

The text of Chancellor Kent is fully sustained by the American authorities. Indeed, so far as we have been able to extend our re-472 searches, there appears a uniform current of decisions going to establish the doctrine, that the taking of independent or collateral security is a waiver of the lien.

In Virginia, it has been decided directly; Judge Pendleton observing, that, "If he (vendor) hath taken a security, or the vendee hath sold to a third person without notice, the lien is lost." Cole v. Scott, 2 Wash. Reps., 141. So, too, in the case of Wilson v. Graham's Ex'rs., 5 Mumford, 297, 299. 2 Tucker's Notes, 454.

The doctrine of lien and this principle of waiver certainly exists in several other states, viz: Tennessee, Ohio, Kentucky, Alabama, Georgia, Indiana, Mississippi, New York, and probably others beside. See Eskridge v. McClure & Walker, (Haywood & Whyte Justices,) 2 Yerger Rep., 84. Williams v. Roberts, 5 Hammond R., 35. Cox v. Fenwick, 3 Bibb., 183. Hardin Rep., 48. 3 Alabama (N. S.,) 502. 3 Kelly's Georgia Rep., 345. 1 Blackford, 249, 416, Evans v. Goodlet. Lagon et. al., v. Badallet and others. Clower v. Rawlings, 9 Smedes & Marshall, 128, and Fish v. Howland, et al., 1 Paige Ch. R., 20, where the British authorities are all reviewed, and the subject ably discussed by Chancellor Walworth.

Judge Story, a portion of whose opinion we have already quoted, (Gilman v. Brown, 1 Mason, 191,) has given the sanction of his name—a name carrying with it the greatest possible respect and veneration—to this principle of waiver, by the taking of collateral security. The case of Gilman v. Brown was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the doctrine of Judge Story, as to this waiver received confirmation from that court, Chief Justice Marshall delivering its opinion. He remarks: "The notes, too for which the vendors stipulated, are to be endorsed by persons approved by themselves. This is a collateral security, on which they relied, and which discharges any implied lien on the land itself for the purchase money. We think this, on principles of English law, a clear case of exemption from lien." Brown v. Gilman, 4 Wheat, 455. We have already seen that Chancellor Kent adopts an adverse principle to that of Lord Eldon, as to waiver of the lien, and coincides with the Supreme Court and Judge Story.

With such an array of opinions and decisions pronounced by judges, eminent for all that is great and illustrious in jurisprudence, a court can feel no diffidence, difficulty, or solicitude, as to arriving at a proper conclusion.

We are not prepared, however, to go as far as some decisions, 473 which declare, that the taking separate or independent security is, per se, or ex proprio vigore, a waiver of the lien of the vendor upon the land sold; but we adopt the maxim of in medias res as most conducive to justice, and say this, that where a separate or independent security is taken by the vendor, other than the personal security of the vendee, it is prima facie evidence of a waiver of the equitable or implied lien upon the land sold, and the onus is upon the vendor to prove that it ought not to have that effect.

To enable vendors and purchasers to understand their respective rights, it is certainly well that some explicit and general rule, one easily understood and as easily followed, should be declared; thereby obviating in numerous instances the necessity of a resort to a Court of Chancery by parties, to have their several rights subjected to the construction of that court, upon the varying and peculiar circumstances of each particular case.

We may here be permitted to remark, that such a rule seems based upon sound policy. It is very true, that when an individual parts with his land, he should receive the purchase money—that is sheer justice; and as long as he indicates by his act—for instance, the simply taking the bond or note of the purchaser—that he relies upon the land itself as a means of payment, the law says, he shall retain a specific lien upon the property sold, subject, of course, to have it defeated by the intervention of creditors or purchasers without notice. But when he carves out an independent security for himself, in exchange for the land sold—when he creates for himself a distinct and separate fund to which he can look for payment—when he gives an absolute deed for the land, thereby rendering it subject to other claims and the contingency of sale, it does appear that the vendor has no right to complain. The evil, if any, is easily averted by ordinary care, either by taking a mortgage, which on being recorded is notice to all the world, thereby carrying out the policy of our registration laws, and in many cases preventing third persons from giving credits to the vendee, on the faith and security of the very land sold; or by retaining the title, simply giving a bond for a conveyance, upon the payment of the purchase money. These modes are familiar to every one, and generally are pursued in those every day transactions when real property is bought and sold. If the mode and manner of payment are all that are intended by the taking of a 474 note, with an endorser upon it, it would seem they would be sufficiently indicated without invoking the liability of a third person, who frequently would feel that his contract was something more than mere form; and certainly the simple note or bond of the purchasers would be quite sufficient to set forth the amount, place and time of payment.

It is said, too, that because a party takes one security, it is not a sequitur that he relinquishes another. Very true, but then let him fashion his contract accordingly, and thereby rebut the inference and presumption raised by the law; unless he do so, in the words of Judge Story, "the rule may properly apply, that expressum facit cessare tacitum, and where the party has carried out his own security, the law will not create another in aid." This was manifestly the opinion of Sir William Grant in a recent case, where he asks, "If the security be totally distinct and independent, will it not then become a case of substitution for the lien, instead of a credit given because of the lien?"

An argument upon the plea of the justice of the case was strongly pressed and urged upon the court. Such an appeal must, at all times, commend itself most favorably to the consideration of a tribunal, whose duty it is to mete out even-handed justice to the parties litigant before it. But the court cannot enforce a legal or equitable right, where it is clearly waived; and more especially where the rights of third persons are concerned, as the record in this case clearly shows. The administrator of the estate of Reed possesses the character of a trustee for all interested or having claims against it, and he states that there are heavy judgments. Though that fact has exercised no influence upon our decision, yet it affords an argument by way of response to the plea of justice, so strenuously contended for; for where there is equity, there must be equality. Arguments, too, upon the hardship of a case are, Chancellor Kent says, "the quicksands of the law," and if allowed to prevail, would soon choke up and destroy all established precedents.

As to the second proposition, we are not aware that the surety, Martin, can successfully invoke the aid of a court of equity to set apart the land sold by Marvin, as a specific fund for the payment of the purchase money, where the vendor has not retained the title, but parted with it absolutely, and where also the surety has not paid the money or any part of it.

475 Courts of equity hold sureties, entitled upon payment of the debt due by the principal to the creditor, to have the full benefit of all the collateral securities, both of a legal and equitable nature, which the creditor has taken as an additional pledge for his debt. 1 Story's Com., 477. So the surety, who has paid the debt of the principal, is entitled to stand in the place of the cerditor, as to all the securities for the debt held or acquired by the creditor, and to have the same benefits from them as the creditor. Pr. & Sur., 252. Bing on Surety, 352.

The surety, if he has apprehension of loss or injury from the delay of the creditor to enforce the debt against the principal debtor, may file his bill, quia timet, to compel the debtor to discharge the debt, provided the surety's obligation to pay has become absolute. So he may compel the creditor to sue the principal, and collect the debt due from him in discharge of the surety. 2 Story Eq., 144.

Martin, in this case, does not seek to be substituted to the rights of Marvin, upon the plea of having paid the money, but asks that the land be held primarily liable. But suppose he had paid the money, could he, upon the principal of subrogation, have any greater rights than the creditor, Marvin, himself? If Marvin had retained the title in himself, questions involving the specific execution of agreements, and others might have arisen; but these are not now before the court.

There were several cases cited by counsel for the appellees, which they contended would authorize a sale of the land to save the surety, Martin, harmless. They were cases where either the money was paid by the surety, or where the title was retained by the vendor, and turned virtually upon the principle of substitution and subrogation.—We have given them a careful perusal, and do not regard them as at all analogous to the case at bar.

With these views, we are of opinion that the decree of the court below was erroneous, and should be set aside. It is, therefore, ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the decree rendered in the court below be set aside, vacated and annulled.

Justice LANCASTER dissented.

476 THOMAS J. HOLTEN, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, v. THE STATE.

The affidavit made before a justice of the peace, charging the commission of a criminal offence, the writ issued by the justice, and the mittimus directed to the sheriff, form no part of the record in a criminal case, and ought not to be inserted in it.

A copy of the charge of the court to the jury, admitting it to be a full and true copy, cannot rightfully be sent to the jury in a criminal case after their retirement. The charge of the court is part and parcel of the trial of the cause, the whole of which the constitution requires to be public.

The sending the charge of the judge to the jury after their retirement, is tantamount to re-charging the jury at their room, in the absence of the prisoner and his counsel—and to which, if done in their presence, they would have had the right of excepting, or of moving additional instructions, and excepting to a refusal to grant them.

If a charge is such a case can be sent at all, it should be the original, and not a copy.

During the whole of the trial of a capital case, the prisoner has a right to be, and must be, present. This is a settled and well-established principle of criminal law; and this principle is violated by sending the charge of the court to the jury, if such a step is taken in the absence of the prisoner.

The prisoner in a capital case must be personally present during the whole of the trial, and at every step taken in the cause. He has the right to discuss questions both of law and fact—and if, in any stage of the trial, any proceeding is had by which he has been deprived of such right, it is the denial of a right which the constitution guarantees to him. At very stage of the proceedings, he must have an opportunity of coming into court, and being heard. If any other course is pursued and he is convicted, it cannot be said to be "by due course of law"

Even in a civil case, no communication whatever ought to take place between the judge and the jury, after the cause has been committed to them and they have been charged by the court, unless in open court, in presence, if practicable, of the counsel in the cause. This principle applies with greater force in a criminal and especially in a capital case.

An indictment ought to be certain to every intent—but the abbrevation or character & for "and" is not such an obscurity or ambiguity as will render the indict ment bad

The right of the court to order the record to be amended after verdict and judgment, so as to show the words "a true bill," which words were not entered by the clerk, when the Grand Jury presented the bill of indictment, is not clear, and may well be doubted.

A court at which an indictment is found, must be held at the time prescribed by law and by the proper judge; and the record must show that a Grand Jury was impanneled and sworn, and it must set forth their names, and the time and place, when and where the indictment was found—and if at an adjourned term, when the original term commenced. 477

Where the record shows that the Grand Jury presented a bill of indictment—The State v. A. B. Felony, "a true bill"—it cannot be held to be the finding of a true bill for murder. And the fact that an indictment for murder is spread out in extenso on the record, does not cure the defect—for the record also shows that the grand jury did not find a true bill for murder, but only for felony.

Manslaughter is a felony, and where a bill of indictment for murder is found "a true bill," but endorsed "felony—a true bill"—non constat, but that the Grand Jury could not agree upon a finding for murder, and so found for felony, which might mean manslaughter, or any other felony.

If, in a capital case, the prisoner must be present at every stage of the trial, for the purpose of discussing questions both of law and fact, quaere, must he not also be present in the Supreme Court, where matters of law touching his case, are brought up to be discussed, settled and adjudicated?

At a Circuit Court, held in and for the county of Jefferson, Middle Circuit of Florida, on the 29th day of November, 1848, the Grand Jury came into court, and presented the following bill of indictment, viz:

"The jurors of the State of Florida, in and for the body of the county of Jefferson, upon their oath present—That Thomas J. Holton, late of the county of Jefferson aforesaid, in the circuit and State aforesaid, laborer, not having the fear of God before his eyes, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, on the first day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, with force of arms, in the county aforesaid, in and upon one John F. Stafford, in the peace of God and said State of Florida then and there being, feloniously, wilfully and of his malice aforethought, did make an assault; and that the said Thomas J. Holton, with a certain wooden stick of no value, which he, the said Thomas J. Holton, then and there in both his hands had and held, the said John F. Stafford, in and upon the head of him, the said John F. Stafford, then and there feloniously, wilfully and of his malice aforethought did strike, and beat, and wound, giving to the said John F. Stafford, then and there with the wooden stick aforesaid, in and upon the head of him, the said John F. Stafford, one mortal wound of the length or three inches, and of the depth of one inch, of which said mortal wound the said John F. Stafford, from the said first day 477 of August, in the year aforesaid, until the fifth day of the same month of August, in the year aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, did languish, and languishing did live—on which said fifth day of August, in the year aforesaid, the said John F. Stafford, at the county aforesaid, of the said mortal wound died. And so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say, that the said Thomas J. Holton the said John F. Stafford, in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully and of his malice aforethought, did kill and murder, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the State of Florida."

This indictment was endorsed, "State of Florida v. Thomas J. Holton. Indictment for a felony. Found Nov. Term, 1848. A true bill. Allen R. McCall, Foreman."

On the first day of December, at the same term of the court, the said Thomas J. Holton was led to the bar, arraigned and pleaded not guilty to the foregoing indictment. And thereupon came a jury, who having heard the evidence and arguments of counsel, retired to consider of their verdict. And on the second day of December the jury elected, tried and sworn in this cause came into court, and rendered the following verdict: "That the said Thomas J. Holton is guilty of murder, in manner and form as in the indictment against him is alleged," and concluded by recommending the prisoner to mercy.

Whereupon the prisoner, by his counsel, moved the court in arrest of judgment and for a new trial, on the grounds hereinafter stated—which two motions were, by agreement, argued and considered together.

The bill of exceptions shows, that after the argument of counsel and before the jury retired, the counsel for the prisoner moved the court to charge the jury as follows: "But if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the prisoner did not think the blow was likely to produce death, then that the jury should acquit the prisoner"—which was refused by the court, and to that refusal the prisoner, by his counsel, excepted.

The court gave the following charge: "If the jury believe that the deceased came to his death by a blow from defendant, stricken with a stick upon the head, and that such blow was likely to produce death, and that this blow was given not in self defence, nor in the 479 belief that defendant was in imminent danger of bodily harm, and without adequate provocation, the defendant is guilty of murder. If you shall be of opinion, that some new injury or violence, subsequent to the blow stricken by defendant, was made by another, so as to enlarge the wound or create a new one, and that this caused, of itself, the death, then you will find the defendant not guilty." Defendant's counsel moved to add the words, "or accident," to this last charge, which was done.

It also appears from the record, that after the jury had retired, the judge gave instructions to the sheriff, that if the jury did not agree in one hour to adjourn the court until the next morning. Between 11 and 12 o'clock at night the jury sent to the judge by a bailiff for his charge. The clerk was directed to make out a copy—which was done, and the foregoing charge, not sealed or certified, with the exception of the words "or accident," was sent to them, without the consent of the prisoner or his counsel.

Upon the argument of the motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, this proceeding was shown for cause.

The counsel for the prisoner also showed in the second place—That the indictment contained abbreviations for the word "and" in divers places, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided. And a third cause shown was, that it did not appear by the record that "a true bill" had been found, the only entry on the record touching said case and the action of the Grand Jury, being the following: "The Grand Jury came into court and presented the following bill of indictment, to wit: "State of Florida v. Thomas J. Holton, felony." But the court overruled the said motions, both for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, and proceeded to pass sentence upon the prisoner.

The record also shows, that after the motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment was overruled, the defendant by his counsel prayed the court to sign and seal his bill of exceptions, which was done. And it was thereupon further ordered, that the writ of error asked for in this cause, when issued, shall operate as a supersedeas; and there being an omission to state that the Grand Jury presented the indictment in this case "a true bill," it was further ordered that the same be done nunc pro tunc.

The judge who tried this cause filed, in compliance with the statute, the following reasons for overruling the motion made in behalf of the prisoner, viz:

480 The principal ground is the sending to the jury the charge of the Court, in the absence of defendant's counsel. In this I see no cause of objection. It is not pretended that any addition was made to the charge, as pronounced by the court in the presence of the prisoner, his counsel and the jury. The charge was matter of record under the statute and might have been delivered by the judge with the other papers to the jury on their retirement. But complaint is made of the omission of the clerk to add the word accident to the second instruction. I cannot perceive that this alters its character, and it is more correct, in point of law, without it. If, indeed, I were satisfied that this omission had injured or caused a prejudice to the prisoner, I would, without hesitancy, grant the new trial; but on further consideration, I am satisfied that there was no evidence in the case making it necessary or proper, or entitling the prisoner to the benefit of it. There is not a word from any witness as to any further injury after the blow by the prisoner, either from any other person, or by accident. The witness who went home with the deceased says he took his head in his lap, and was not even questioned as to further injury, and no other witness was introduced to prove such injury.—The main reliance of the counsel of the defendant was upon such a defence, and in deference to their position, and in favor of life, thinking, by possibility, I might be mistaken, this charge was given. If a new trial were had, I would not, on the testimony in the case, feel justified to give the charge to another jury. I, therefore, do not see the propriety of ranting the trial because of this omission. I consider the verdict, too, of the jury as negativing the defence.

The charge of murder I consider as sufficient, without regarding the abbreviations.

Nor do I regard the objection available, as to the omission of the clerk to enter the bill returned as a true bill. By statute, the foreman is directed to endorse the bill "a true bill," which has been done in this case. This is the true evidence of its having been so found. If there is an omission by the clerk to notice it on the record, the court, on discovering that fact, will have the record amended so as to state the truth, just as the entry, "a true bill," on which a party had been arraigned, when in fact there was not a true bill, would be corrected, to acquit him. Seeing no reason, from an attentive consideration of the facts of the case, to doubt the correctness of the finding of the jury, and not perceiving any in the objections raised, the motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment is 481 overruled.

The following are the errors assigned in this case, by the counsel for the plaintiff in error:

1. It was fatal errors to the proceedings to send the instructions of the court to the jury—especially to send a copy, and that not a full and perfect copy.

2. The indictment is bad, because it contains abbreviations and contractions in various parts, such as & for "and."

3. It did not appear of record, that the Grand Jury had ever found a true bill; and though the court ordered the record to be altered, it could not be done.

4. The court erred in refusing the instruction asked as an amendment to those granted.

Brockenbrough for plaintiff in error:

The caption of the indictment states that it was found at "November Term, 1848," whereas no such Term is known to our law—but the "Fall Term," which occurs in October; and, if it were an adjourned Term, that should have been shown. But this and other minor objections are passed to consider the three following, assigned as errors:

1. That it did not appear by the record when judgment was given that any "true bill" had been found.

2. That the indictment contained abbreviations and contractions, such as "&" for "and," contrary to the statute—and. rejecting these abbreviations, the indictment would be vague, insensible, repugnant and without the necessary averments to constitute a good indictment for murder.

3. That after the jury retired a paper was sent to them without consent of prisoner or his counsel, during a recess of the court, which purported to be the instructions of the court, but which were not either the original instructions as given, or a certified copy, or a true copy, but left out an essential and important word, which might affect the whole case, and which was added by the court, at the instance of prisoner's counsel.

I.—Under first head, when motion was made in arrest and judgment was given, the only entry v. Holton was this: "The Grand Jury presented the following: The State v. Thomas J. Holton, felony."

Our constitution declares, "That no person shall be put to answer 482 any criminal charge, but by presentment, indictment, or impeachment." Thomp. Dig., 3.

Our statutes prescribes, "That all indictments shall be signed by the prosecuting attorney, and endorsed on the back by the foreman of the Grand Jury, when so found, 'a true bill,' and when not found, 'not a true bill,' and signed by him." Thomp. Dig., 522.

This much is necessary to make the paper formal, of lawful form. But it is still in fieri, it is not yet a lawful accusation. A deed is formal, when signed and sealed in the presence of two witnesses—but is yet not a deed till delivered, and in some instances and respects till recorded. And a will is formal, with three witnesses by our law, who sign in presence of testator—but it is still no will, till he is dead—and must be admitted to probate, to complete it as evidence.

So, all prescribed above may be done, and yet a party never be indicted, because the jury may change their minds at any time, till the indictment is delivered by the foreman to the clerk in open court. in presence of the Grand Jury. It is that delivering which makes the accusation—that is the presentment..

No one can dispute these propositions: 1. No man can be legally convicted till he is legally accused. 2. He can be legally accused of murder only by indictment. 3. He cannot be indicted, except by a decision of twelve Grand Jurors against him. 4. That decision can only be known to the court, and the prisoner, and the world, by the RECORD, showing their assent to that fact in open court, when called expressly for that purpose.

If there is any other mode of showing the assent of twelve, it is not to be found in the books. The invariable practice has been to call them, and to record their presentment—"a true bill," or "not a true bill,"—no other evidence can be shown to have ever been resorted to, but that record, in any case. In making up the rolls in England, where the case has been removed for trial in any of the various modes there practiced, if there has been any error or omission is transcribing, it is to this original record of fact, which no where else exists, to which they resort to amend all the rest. There is no case in which they have altered this, or amended, or added to it. When the Grand Jury have given their bill and been discharged, the record then made must forever stand, because there is nothing extant to amend or alter by. The body which established the fact, has vanished forever. It can no more be altered by a court, than a constitution or law, after the adjournment of a Legislature, can be altered by the Executive—or a judgment of a court altered by a Grand Jury. It is the judgment of the Grand Jury—a co-ordinate branch of the court—to be entered by the clerk, in presence of the judge. It is a thing which the judge cannot control, except to see that it is properly recorded at the time, in presence of the Grand Jury. He cannot, even in presence of the Grand Jury, alter their decision, or add to it, or require them to alter, or add to it. He is obliged to ask their consent, if they are content that the court may alter matters of form, not altering matters of substance; and if they consent, he may then alter matters of form in their presence, but not after they have retired. All this ceremony must be very idle, if he can afterwards enter a verdict, where he finds none. The record is said to be in the breast of the judge until the end of the term, and until that time, he may alter, and amend, and change—but what?—Surely only his own decensions and opinions, and the accidental misprisons of his clerk. The record of other people's decisions, opinions and verdicts, are not in the breast of the judge—they never are there. The verdicts are in the breast of the juries, till they are recorded, and they are upon the record, and no where else. The record of a verdict is as conclusive and irrevocable to the jury, as the end of the term to the judge. It is more so. There are some matters he may amend or alter afterwards, the jury never can. If the jury who give the decision cannot alter or amend the record then made of it, how can the judge, in whose breast it never was, and consequently who can never know, except by the record, what they intended?

The verdicts are acts independent of the court. They constitute a basis, on which the court is then to begin to act. It is the absence of this of which we complain. We oppose a judgment, because the basis is wanting—and the judgment is given, and then the basis created by an amendment.

Until the bill is brought in "a true bill" by twelve grand jurors there is no accusation—nothing on which the court can arraign—to which the prisoner can plead—no fact alleged to which a petit jury can say "guilty—for which the court adjudge death." Until it appears on the record, no one knows that it is brought in De nom. apparentibus et non existentibus est eadem lex.

In this case, the Grand Jury have returned into court only one 484 bill—"The State v. Holton, felony." Must we presume it "murder," in preference to any other "felony"—must we presume it "a true bill," in preference to 'not a true bill'—or must we rely upon the frail memory of man after judgment of death, by which to amend the record.

Record evidence is necessary, else why amend the record? And yet a record from memory is no record. The amendment condemns itself. The bandage shows the wound, but cannot heal it. As the record shows on its face nothing of the finding a true bill, the presumption of innocence arises, that none was found. This presumption outweighs all human memory—nothing but a record can strangle it.

The signature of the foreman on the back of the indictment is only a form, making the "bill"an "indictment." It does not prove the concurrence of twelve, or the return to court, any more than does the Solicitor's signature to the body of the indictment. It proves only for one—we claim proof for twelve. To give this, it must be presented in open court, with the assent of twelve. No court would receive a bill and record it as a true bill, if only eleven grand jurors answered when called. Formerly the names of those who presented a bill had to be set out at length. The foreman may sign by mistake (as has been done) one bill for another—in anticipation, or after a hasty agreement, afterwards reversed by the jury, and he forget to erase, or to add the word "not"—by mistake of law, ((in which a majority of the jury may partake,) as by deeming a majority of the Grand Jury (though less than twelve) enough to find a bill, as in Low's case. 4 Greenleaf, 439.

But if the signature was evidence of the concurrence of twelve, which is impossible, it still would not show the further fact, that the locus penitentiæ had passed, that the act was consummated, that the bill was presented in open court. It may have come in by accident, or mistake, or fraud.

The signature of the foreman is no evidence at all of anything, until the bill is presented in court. It is the presentment in court, that makes the signature of the foreman of any importance, and then only as the completion of a form. It is the record which only makes the signature evidence of a perfect indictment—then it cannot make a record. Until the record shows the fact, that the bill has been returned "a true bill," the court does not judicially know of this signature of the foreman, or in fact that there is an indictment. And if it 485 was handed to him during the term, and he could find no record, he could not notice it. He could not ask the clerk or the bystanders, if such a bill had been brought in. He could not rely upon their memories, though they might be unanimous—not because it would not be true, but because he would not have a record. How, then, can he rely upon his own memory? And if he puts his own memory upon the record, it can be no better than that of all the rest—it cannot supply the place of that which was indispensable

We thus see that the record is the substance, (showing that twelve agree and present before the world a solemn fact, affecting often life, and liberty, and always reputation,) and the signature of the foreman is only the form to complete the instrument of accusation; and suppose the form was defective, and there was no signature on the back, though written a true bill and recorded a true bill, we could not amend even the form by the substance, which showed twelve had concurred and had presented in open court—how much worse is it, then, to amend the substance by the form? In the former case, too, the record would be conclusive, that the bill was found and presented by twelve; but in the latter case, the signature proves nothing but the completion of the form.

[Here Judge Lancaster asked if the indictment is properly endorsed—and if so, when it was so endorsed? Brockenbrough—"It is properly endorsed. But when does not appear, because we have not the record of its return into open court, and the impossibility of answering by the record when a man was indicted, sustains our argument. It proves the endorsement to be nothing, until the finding is recorded. An indictment need not show when it was found, because the record shows when it was found. So decided, 2 Virginia cases, p. 3.]

To support these views, see what is inserted in making up the record. 1 Chitty's Crim. L., 719.

See the ceremonies pursued in bringing in a bill. 1 Chitty, 324. The same are found in 3 Robinson's Practice, as pursued in Virginia. The same has been the Florida practice. No book lays down any different practice any where. These ceremonies, when considered as essential, and the record conclusive, become vitally important to life, liberty and reputation, and carry out in practice the protection afforded by our Constitution and Bills of Right; but become a mere senseless mummery, if they may be dispensed with entirely, or the 486 results equally recorded without the presence of the Grand Jury.

On removing the cause, or copying the record, these ceremonies become an important part of the caption, without which the record is not admissible in evidence. 1 Chitty, 326. They are important, because they prove the fact, and show that there is such a record; and although the caption may be amended, it is because it is a copy, and the record we require must exist to amend it by. In 1 Chitty, 326, is the form of a caption, concluding "it is presented," and formerly it was indispensable that this should be in the present tense, but now it is not thought to be absolutely necessary. This could not have been important, except to show that the record was made at the time it was presented, and if it even seemed to have been made afterwards, it was error.

But it is said this record can be amended, and has been amended 2 Hawkins Pl. C., 336—'7, sec. 96, 97. This admits the conclusiveness of the prior argument, and that it is indispensable to the judgment. This admission invalidates the judgment, unless the capacity to amend it is established. Of this, the burden is upon the State.

What is an amendment? t must be an improvement, by change or addition of that which exists, but is imperfect. You cannot amend a non-entity

We say there is no true bill presented. We examine the record, and show there is none. Can you call it amendment, to insert a true bill was presented?

You order it nunc pro tunc—that is, you order it now for then, because it should have been done then. But it is too late to do it now because it is after judgment. And before judgment, you must have had a record of a true bill, or you could give no valid judgment.—But you had no record—we moved in arrest, because there was no record—for that we moved in arrest.

You had no record of a legal accusation—you give judgment, and then make the record now for then. We say your judgment stands void by your own amendment, because it shows you have only now, which was indispensable then.

Besides, it is a thing you cannot make now. There was but one branch of the court which could make it at any time, and that has dispersed. You do now what ought to have been done then. But it is Holton vs. the State.—Argument of Counsel.

487 precisely the evidence of that fact which is wanting—ought it to have been done then? We know not, unless we had the record to prove there were twelve present assenting. We can listen to no man's memory. The only evidence we can have that it ought to have been done, is the record that it was done. Wherever you can amend, you must have something to amend by. Here there is nothing—there was nothing—there never will be any thing. It was a fact which appears no where else, in no other manner—of which no other evidence exists, or was ever meant to exist, anywhere but the record made then. A fact which only existed at that moment. Before that time it was inchoate, afterwards irrevocable and unalterable. It was no one's duty to note it any where else, or preserve it, or keep a record, minute, or memorandum of it. If any one did so, it was unofficial—no record—merely memory, parol.

See 1 Chitty, 721-'2. "And no court can make any alteration, when once the judgment is solemnly entered upon the record." And strange would judgment records read, if, after sentence of death is solemnly passed, and the prisoner is remanded to the place whence he came, to depart thence only to the grave—after the prisoner is gone, if then only verdicts were to be enterd for the first time upon the record. By whatever name we call it, the record still shows judgment of death without a true bill—and the insertion of a true bill afterwards, when the prisoner was gone, the Grand Jury dispersed.

It even appears that the acts of the court must be described in the present, not the past tense—that the record must show that the prisoner was present, when sentence of death was passed. 1 Chitty, 751. And this because the statutes of amendments do not apply to criminal proceedings. This matter of the present tense, though frivolous it may seem, shows that the record must walk pari passu with the actual proceedings, and must tell of things done as they are done at the time, and not by any subsequent alterations and amendments—and if these niceties are important, what shall we say of the whole foundation of the action being brought in at the end, or the cellar and its massive walls, intended to sustain, placed on the top of the building?

At page 752, [753,] 1 Chitty, we learn that "no alteration can be made in the finding of the jury of matters of substance, whether it be the decision of the grand or the petit inquest."

488 "The judge may amend his own judgment, &c."—"mere ministerial acts may be amended at any time"—"any matter not of record may be amended by the record," &c.

So 1 Chitty, 644, [645,] "But it seems to be the better opinion, that though a verdict cannot be amended in matter of fact, yet the court may amend a mere error in form even in capital cases, when there are any minutes or notes by which it can be amended." This must mean whilst the jury is present, even as to form. But surely it is a matter of fact—"a true bill," or "not a true bill." It is not only matter of fact, but it is all—it is the whole verdict—it is all the jury has to say. All the rest is only the recital of the clerk of what occurs in the court—not of any conclusion to which the jury come, or any thing which occurred in the jury room. The clerk says, "This day the Grand Jury came into court, and presented the following bills: State v. C. D., larceny, State v. Holton, murder."

This tells nothing of what the jury think; it merely shows they came with certain papers. If he says no more, the presumption of innocence is, that they ignored both. If he says "A true bill," then the jury speaks, and it is all they say. If "not a true bill," it is equally all they say. To insert either of these is to make the whole without a memorandum. If we must insert either in their absence, we must insert by legal presumption—"not a true bill"

But in this case the amendment, if made and good in all other respects, does not go far enough. It makes it "felony, a true bill"—but not "MURDER, a true bill," which is what is wanted and indispensable. The bill found might have been the highest felony. The amendment may be perfectly correct, and still non constat that a bill for murder was ever found by that Grand Jury. And this shows the danger of amendments. If the court could amend by adding the verdict, could it not also amend by altering the description? Might it not have erased felony, and inserted murder, from memory? And if so suppose two bills—the one felony, for stealing, a true bill—the other felony, for murder, not a true bill—might not the court alter and transpose these, by the same power of amendment? Where is the limit? Suppose the Judge's memory was one way, and every other person's the other, which shall prevail? But if amendment is legal, can it be made when the prisoner is in the condemned cell?—has he not a right to be heard by counsel, to introduce evidence upon the new fact to be introduced upon the record?—has he no right to except to the opinion of the court? Can he not claim to have the fact 489 tried regularly?—can the court alter of its own mere motion, when the solicitor does not ask it for the State—when he says in open court it is sufficient as it is, and the court concurs in this, and passes judgment, can it afterwards in private order the change?

II.—As to abreviations in the indictment. The statute is peremptory—it shall not be in Latin, it shall be in English, and there shall not be abreviations. It will not, therefore, answer to say, "&" is a short way of writing the latin "et," because all abbreviations are a short way of writing something else. And if it is Latin, it violates the other part of the statute, which requires it to be in English. See both these rules in 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 174, 175, 176.

It is no answer to say the indictment may be read without them.—Because being in violation of the statute, it is void, and cannot be read at all. But this indictment, without the "ands" written "&," would be insensible in many places, and is not sufficient in some vital parts.

Thus it not only reads, "in the Circuit State aforesaid, "in upon his head" "did strike, beat," and the like, but says he did it with a stick which he "then there had held"—that this, before that time, whereas he must have held it at the time. Besides it does not say, if we leave out the "&," that he killed Stafford or that he murdered him, but that he "did kill murder," which is either nonsense, or an averment that he killed a man named "murder," and certainly no averment that he killed or murdered Stafford.

III.—As to the instruction sent the jury. This requires no argument; neither the court, nor the parties, nor any other person can send a thing to the jury, nor hold any communication except in open court. No one can speak to them out of court except the bailiff, and he only to ask them if they have agreed. Our law makes the instructions a record—they are required to be written. A copy of it is not evidence for any purpose, except made out in the regular way—a mutilated copy cannot be. The statute which requires them to be written does not authorize them to be sent to the jury, though they might be, perhaps, with the prisoner's consent, in open court. But to send a loose, imperfect copy out of court, by an order which does not appear of record, must be inadmissible. And who can tell what effect they had? It is presumed they were thought of some importance, or the law would not record them, the judge would not give them, and the jury must have thought them of some importance, or they would not have sent for them. After receiving them and pon- 490 dering upon them, they agreed upon a verdict, which they did not agree upon before, though they had heard the same short charges, impressively and deliberately read to them more than once—who shall them say it had no effect? When that charge was delivered in court, prisoner's counsel asked the addition of a word—a word which introduced a whole chapter of possible accidents to the consideration of the mind. The prisoner and his counsel must have thought it important; the court must have thought it of some import, as at least giving a chance of life—or to say the least, that is was not unreasonable or unlawful to give it. The jury wanted the charge, it was said—no doubt truly—but the application should have been made in open court, and recorded when granted, if granted—for the bailiff may have been mistaken. But if they did want the charge, they wanted it as given—the court must have ordered it as given. It was sent without one of its words—who shall say that the jury did not doubt about that very word?—and that the paper sent them without it, may not have solved the doubts?—or if it was some thing else, who knows what chain of thought that word might have awakened in the minds of the jury? The court states that the branch of the subject was much relied upon by counsel—a branch which made impression enough on their minds to enforce with zeal, might by that word have raised at least a doubt in a jury's mind, when he was there pondering over the charge written in fixed unvarying form before him—when the evidence was sinking into a dream, and the argument only a confused and cloudy reminiscence.

Hogue, for the State?

The first error assigned in this case is, that it was not proper to send the written charge of the court to the jury. The law requires that the charge shall be reduced to writing and filed in the case.—If the charge sent to the jury contains nothing more that the written charge filed in the case, it would seem that it is not such error, because there is nothing in such a proceeding which "gives reason to suspect the purity of the verdict," and nothing which "affects the impartiality of the trial." Any irregularity committed in the course of a criminal proceeding must be, in order to vitiate the verdict, of such a character as to have the effect of destroying the purity of the verdict and the impartiality of the trial, or at least of affording ground to 491 suspect one or the other. Davis Crim. Law, 467. See also 12 Pick., page 519. Though the act complained of is unusual or "contrary to the ordinary forms," it is not necessarily such an irregularity as to affect the impartiality of the jury. 12 Pick., 519, 510. See on the subject of instructions, 7 Wheeler Am. Com. Law, 122.

But it is objected, in this case, that the copy sent was not a true copy—that the words "or accident" were left out. These words were not material and in fact, were not necessary in the original. The record shows that there was no evidence which would have required the Judge to insert the omitted words in the charge which he gave to the jury before their retirement. Unless it can be supposed that the omission of these words brought the jury to a different conclusion from what they would have arrived at, had those words been in the copy, it cannot be error. The impartiality of the trial would not be affected by the omission. If the omission would not have such an effect or tendency, then the verdict will be supported upon the principles before laid down, as to irregularities.

The second error assigned is—that the indictment contains abbreviations. The only abbreviation complained of is that & is written for and. It would seem, upon principle and reason, that such an objection as this would not be sufficient to vitiate a verdict, upon motion for a new trial or in arrest of judgment. At most, it is a mere formal objection, which ought to have been taken advantage of before pleading.

"An indictment," as defined by Lord Hale, "is nothing else but a plain, brief and certain narrative," &c., "in which, in favor of human life, great strictness has at all times been required, to that degree, as to become the disease and reproach of the law." 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 193. 3 Bac. Abridg., Indictment, letter G. "There is no rule that other words should be employed than such as are in ordinary use, or that a different sense should be put upon them than what they bear in ordinary acceptation."—Ibidem. Tried by this rule, it cannot be pretended that the abbreviation & can be used in any other sense than and. It is in such use as to be a full word of itself, and can scarcely be regarded as an abbreviation. It is as much and as often written as the other, and no meaning can be attached to it repugnant to the sense or context of the indictment. If, then, it is free from ambiguity, on what ground can it be objected to on motion for a new trial or in arrest." No case, it is believed, can be found, in which such an 492 objection was sustained. If the sense be clear, nice objections ought not to be regarded. 2 East., 259. The statute against abbreviations was only intended to prevent such as rendered the indictment obscure or ambiguous. This cannot be argued of the abbreviation complained of here.

The third error assigned is—that it does not appear by the record that the Grand Jury had ever found a true bill.

The indictment itself has the indorsement "a true bill," but this fact was not instantly recorded by the clerk. This is the objection. The formalities and solemnities required, so far as the books show, are simply these: the Grand Jury come into court and publicly present the indictment. If it is returned a true bill, it is so indorsed and signed by the foreman. "The indictment is then said to be found, and the party stands indicted." 4 Black. Com., 306. 4 Com. Dig. 645.

Now the Grand Jury Jury is the accusing body. Does the court try the party upon their accusation, thus formally and solemnly presented, or upon the record made of the fact by the clerk? Clearly upon the accusation of the Grand Jury. The only case in which I have seen it required that there should be a record of the fact, is the case of Cawood, 2 Va. Ca. And yet the judge who pronounced the opinion in that case, mentions no other forms or solemnities requisite to the complete accusation of the party, than those above laid down. It is true, he says the Grand Jury deliver the indictment to the lcerk, "who records the fact."

In the case of Cawood the record did not show that the Grand Jury had ever presented any indictment whatever against him. In this respect, it differs from the case before this court. The record here shows that the accusing body came into court and presented an indictment against Holton for felony; but the record did not show the words "a true bill," though that indorsement was on the indictment itself. In other words, the clerk failed only to record the words "a true bill."

Now, if that formality was necessary, though I can find it no where so laid down, except in Cawood's case, the next question is—could the court direct the clerk to place those words on his record book, in addition to the entry he had already made in the case? It seems to me it is, at most, an omission of the clerk which can be rectified at any time. The record of the fact of the finding "a true bill" is not one of those solemnities deemed necessary to constitute a complete 493 accusation by the accusing body.

This question involves the whole doctrine of the power of courts over their records, during the term. This doctrine is briefly set forth in 3d Vol. Dane's Abridg., 510, to which I refer the court. I remark that, in the case before the court, it does appear by the record that the Jury had presented a bill in open court against the prisoner. All that the court did was to make that record say "a true bill." In Cawood's case, nothing whatever appeared on the record, yet I apprehend that in that case the court below might have ordered it to appear, so as to make the record conform to the indictment; and such appears to have been the opinion of the General Court of Virginia, in that case.

But another question still remains. The prisoner was tried for murder; both the indorsement and the record read "Felony—a true bill;" is this sufficient?

"The common law of England in relation to crimes and misdemeanors, except so far as the same relates to the modes and degrees of punishment, shall be, and the same is hereby, adopted and declared to be in full force in this State." Thomp. Digest, 489.

"Any person convicted of the crime of murder shall be punished with death." Same, 490.

"Felony comprises every species of crime which occasioned, at common law, the forfeiture of lands and goods." This most frequently happens in those crimes which are punished with death."—4 Black. Com., 94.

In this country there is no such consequence as forfeiture of property. The only attribute remaining to distinguish a statutory felony from any other offence is the punishment of death—though it is competent to the Legislature to make any offence a felony without annexing such punishment; but if that punishment is annexed, it is necessarily a felony.

"All statutory crimes to which capital punishment is annexed are, by reason of such punishment, felonies." 3d Robinson's Prac., 39. Now the common law declares that murder is a crime. The statute of this State also declares it. It is, therefore, a statutory offence.—The statute annexes the punishment of death. It is, therefore, a felony. If it be a felony, the indorsement of an indictment for murder with the words "a felony" would not vitiate the indictment.

In this case the prisoner was indicted for murder which, by the in- 49
dorsement on the indictment and by the record, was styled "a felony." The body of the indictment shows for what particular crime the party was indicted. He was led to the bar and arraigned for murder, and pleaded not guilty. The only record, then, to which it is at all necessary to look, shows that the prisoner, Holton, was indicted and tried for the crime of murder; and certainly, the mere indorsement of the words "felony," which is no part of the accusation, should not vitiate the indictment and the verdict of the jury.

On the contrary, upon the reason and principle, the very reverse is to my mind perfectly clear. The indorsement of the particular kind of offence or grade of crime is made by the prosecuting attorney. The Grand Jury has nothing to do with it. All that they endorse is "a true bill," signed by the foreman. The foreman does not sign the particular offence, but affixes his signature only to the words "a true bill" or "not found," as the case may be. Suppose no crime was indorsed at all, and the Grand Jury found "a true bill," would it not be sufficient? Would not the Grand Jury, in such a case, have complied with every form and every solemnity required, in the language of the authorities, to make "the accusation complete?"

But it is perfectly clear to my mind that the word "felony," embracing as it does the crime for which Holton was indicted, was a good indorsement, if, indeed, any indorsement of crime was requisite. It is a generic term, and the body of the indictment points out, declares and makes known, as the action of the Grand Jury, the species of crime of which they accuse the party in any particular case.

The action of a Grand Jury, in finding a bill of indictment and indorsing it "a felony," if, indeed, they do indorse it, merely assigns the particular crime charged to the general class to which it belongs. If this is error in law, then the Grand Jury have erred in this case, supposing they made the indorsement in question, although they have not erred in logic.

The counsel for the plaintiff in error lays down four propositions which, he says, no one will dispute: 1. That no man can be legally convicted until he is legally accused. 2. He can be legally accused of murder only by indictment. 3. He can be indicted only by a decision of twelve against him. 4. That decision can only be known by the record.

It is not necessary, nor will it be attempted, to deny these propositions. The record in this case shows that the prisoner was legally accused. How is the decision of twelve of the Grand Jury against a party to be made known, but by the forms prescribed by law?—The indorsement of the indictment "a true bill," signed by the foreman, is the only evidence which the law requires of the assent of twelve. "The signature of the foreman of the Grand Jury to an indictment, certifying it to be a true bill, legally imports that it was found by twelve or more grand jurors." Such was the sensible decision of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in the case of Turns v. Commonwealth, 6 Metcalf, 225.

Holton vs. the State.—Opinion of Court.

But it is said there is no record of this fact. I answer that there is. The record shows that it was amended. This, the counsel contends, is an acknowledgement of the error. Suppose it is; the court has power to correct any error during the term. This power is clearly settled, and cannot be denied.

But it is said the amendment cannot be made after the discharge of the accusing body. Their assent to the amendment, it is said, is absolutely necessary. Strange doctrine, this? When the Grand Jury have come into court and presented a bill of indictment "a true bill," and have been discharged, the indictment so found no longer belongs to them. It is placed, when found, among the files of the court, and from the court's own files the amendment is made and not from any papers in possession of the Grand Jury, or from the recollection of the members of the Grand Jury, or the memory of other persons.

Every form of law—every requisite in a criminal proceeding has been complied with in this case. There has been no irregularity affecting the impartiality of the trial. Not a step has been taken that does not clearly show the correctness of the proceedings, the fairness of the trial and the justice of the verdict. There is no reason, therefore, why a new trial should be awarded.

Opinion by Chief Justice DOUGLAS:

This case was brought up by writ of error from the Circuit Court of Jefferson county.

The record commences with a caption in the following words, to wit: "Pleas at the Court House in the town of Monticello, Jefferson county, in the State of Florida, on the first day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, before the Circuit Court of law of the county aforesaid."

And after setting out an affidavit said to have been made before a justice of the peace, the issuing of a writ by the same justice, and a mittimus to the sheriff of said county, with the following endorsement by the said sheriff, viz: By virtue of the within, I have received and committed to jail the said Thomas J. Holton"—none of which ought to have been inserted in said record, as they form no part of it—the record proceeds as follows:

"And on another day, to wit: on the twenty-ninth day of November, in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, and at the October adjourned term of the Circuit Court for Jefferson county, the following entry was made among the records of said court, to wit: "The Grand Jury came into court, and presented the following bill of indictment, to wit: The State of Florida v. Thomas J. Holton, felony. A true bill—together with other Criminal cases.

The following is a copy of said bill of indictment, with the endorsement thereon, to wit: "State of Florida. In the Circuit Court for the Middle Circuit of the State of Florida, for Jefferson county, at November term, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight. Jefferson county, ss." Setting out the indictment, which is in the usual form, charging Thomas J. Holton with having murdered one John F. Stafford, with the following endorsement: "State of Florida v. Thomas J. Holton. Indictment for a felony.—Found Nov. term, 1848. A true bill, Allen R. McCall, Foreman." On the first day of December, 1848, as appears by the record, the prisoner, Thomas J. Holton, was arraigned, and pleaded not guilty to the said indictment, and the case was submitted to a jury, who, by their verdict, found the prisoner "Guilty of Murder"—upon which verdict, judgment was pronounced, and the prisoner sentenced to execution; which sentence is succeeded by the following entry: "and thereupon the said Thomas J. Holton is remanded to jail;" after which, the following order was made by the court, to wit: "The State of Florida v. Thomas J. Holton, murder, a true bill. In this case, after the rendering of the verdict by the jury, the defendant by his counsel moved the court for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, which motion was overruled." Whereupon, the said defendant by his counsel prayed the court to sign and seal his bill of exceptions. "It is therefore ordered that the writ of error asked for in this cause, when issued, shall act as a supersedeas; and there being an omission to state that the Grand Jury presented the indictment in this case 'a true bill,' it is, therefore, ordered that the same be done 'nunc pro tunc.'"

It further appears, by a bill of exceptions, which constitutes a part of the record in this case, that between 11 and 12 o'clock at night, the jury had sent to the judge by their bailiff for his charge, and that the clerk had, on a message from the judge, made out the following paper as a copy of the said charge, to wit: "If the jurors believe that the deceased came to his death by a blow from defendant, stricken with a stick upon the head, and that such blow was given not in self defence, nor in the belief that defendant was in imminent danger of bodily harm, and without adequate provocation, the defendant is guilty of murder." "If the jury shall be of opinion that some new injury or violence, subsequent to the blow stricken by defendant, was made by another, so as to enlarge the wound, or create a new one, and that this caused of itself the death, then you will find the defendant not guilty." To the close of this last charge, the words "add accident," were attached in the hand writing of the judge, but were omitted in the copy sent by the clerk to the jury—and said charge, omitting the said word accident, and not sealed or certified, and without consent of prisoner or his counsel, was sent to the jury.

It appears, by another portion of the record, which, by-the-bye, is very irregularly made out, that this word accident was, on motion of the prisoner's counsel, added in the last clause of the charge, immediately after the word "another," so as to make it read, "made by another, or by accident, so as to enlarge," &c.

It also appears that the prisoner by his counsel moved the court to add to his first instruction the words—"But if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the prisoner did not believe at the time he inflicted the blow, that it was with a weapon likely to inflict death, then that the jury might acquit the prisoner;" which was refused by the court, and to that refusal, the prisoner by his counsel excepted. The foregoing contains all of the record properly applicable to the question presented in this case.

The important and delicate trust which we are called upon to exercise, in reviewing cases of the description of the one now presented for our consideration, strongly admonishes us of the caution and prudence with which any such examination ought to be attended. Every step in the conduct of a trial of this nature imposes upon the court very great responsibility, and requires its fullest deliberation. All the light which can be derived from authority, or from argument and discussion, is deserving of the most serious attention.—With these views of the character of the duties evolved upon us in this case, we approach the errors assigned; and the first is, that "it was a fatal error to the proceedings to send the instructions of the court to the jury—especially to send a copy, and that not a full and perfect copy"

This assignment is based upon the fact stated in the record, "that between twelve and one o'clock at night, the jury had sent to the judge by their bailiff for his charge, and that the clerk had, on a message from the judge, made out a paper containing the following, which he sent to the jury, viz: "If the jury shall be of opinion that some new injury or violence, subsequent to the blow stricken by the defendant, was made by another, so as to enlarge the wound, or cause a new one, and that this caused of itself the death, then you will find the defendant not guilty."

It further appears, that when this charge was given to the jury, counsel for the prisoner moved the court to add the word accident, so as to make the charge read, "made by another, or by accident," &c., which was done; and that the judge added the words (by an asterisk) in his own handwriting, at the foot of the written charge; but that the clerk, in the paper that he made and sent to the jury, left these words out.

The first question presented for our consideration, upon this statement of facts, is, whether this paper, admitting it to have been a full and true copy, could rightfully have been sent (as this was sent) to the jury? And after the most mature deliberation, and the most full consideration of the question, we are of opinion that it could not.—The Constitution of this State, chap. 1, sec. 2, No. 10, Thompson's Digest, page 2, amongst other things, provides, "That in all criminal prosecutions, by indictment or presentment, the accused shall have a speedy public trial, by an impartial jury of the county or district where the offence was committed;" and No. 15, page 3, "No person shall be put to answer any criminal charge, but by presentment, indictment, or impeachment." The charge of the court to the jury is the evidence to them of the law which they should apply to the facts, and is part and parcel of the trial of the cause, the whole of which should be public. The statute approved January 4, 1848, sec. 8, Pamph. Laws, p. 10, requires, "That charges made by judges to juries in criminal cases shall be reduced to writing, and filed in the case;" and because this is so, it has been urged by the Attorney General, that "If the charge sent to the jury contains nothing more than the written charge filed in the case, it would seem that it is not error, because there is nothing in such a proceeding which gives reason to suspect the purity of the verdict, and nothing which affects the impartiality of the trial;" and Davis' Cr. L., 467, and 12 Pick. Rep., 510, 519, were cited to sustain this proposition. In the case in 12 Pick., the constable who attended the jury furnished them some refreshments, without an order of the court, but they were such as the court deemed reasonable, and without deciding whether the facts disclosd an irregularity or not, it refused to grant a new trial for that cause. Davis says: "The present inclination of the courts appears to be, rather to relax than to increase the strictness of the law on this subject, in so far as the object to be attained, which is the guarding against the exercise of any improper influence over the jury, will allow; and, therefore, where there is nothing in the transaction which gives reason to suspect the purity of the verdict, to sustain it, notwithstanding any trivial irregularity, not affecting the impartiality of the trial." In the case of Guykowski v. The People, 1 Scamm., 479, also cited by the Attorney General, the court held the following language: "Where there is every reason to believe, from an inspection of the proceedings, that the intrinsic merits of the case have been fairly ascertained and determined, the adjudication of the inferior tribunal should not be disturbed, unless it satisfactorily appear that some settled and well established principle of criminal law, or rule of proceeding, has been clearly violated." While the justice of the rule here asserted is admitted, and an adherence to its principles conceded, it is of equal importance that the rights of the accused should be protected and preserved, and the essential forms of law prescribed for the mode of conducting the ascertainment of his guilt, should be carefully observed and followed. A departure from them could not fail to produce difficulties and doubts. A recognition of a departure in one case, might lead to the adoption of another; and finally, those barriers, which are guarantees for the regular and impartial conducting of criminal cases, might be frittered away, and possibly eventuate in gross in justice. It is much easier to require the observance of the mandates of the law, than to determine in what cases they may be safely dispensed with. It is, therefore, more proper and more consonant to reason and justice to require a substantial adherence, than to suffer innovations upon the known and positive rules prescribed by law for the regular conducting of causes. The justice of these grounds is as clear and apparent, as those which are founded on principles of humanity, by which the administration of criminal law has been marked, and which declare that the accused stands on all his rights, and waives nothing which is irregular, and more especially so, where life is in the question." Testing this case by these principles, we enquire whether a positive rule, prescribed by the Constitution, which is the paramount law of the State, would not be violated, by thus sending the charge to the jury? It would be nothing less or more than re-charging the jury at their room, in the absence of the prisoner and his counsel, as had been once publicly done in their presence, in open court. We are not prepared to say, what effect this might have upon the jury in determining their verdict; but certain it is, that if the charge, instead of being sent to the jury, had been re-read to them by the judge in open court, in presence of the prisoner and his counsel, they would have had the right (and might have exercised it) of moving for additional instructions, and if their motion was overruled, of excepting to the opinion of the court, or of excepting as to those already given, if they had not done so before; upon which exceptions, the prisoner might have based a writ of error. Of the benefit of all this a prisoner might be, and of all but the last he actually was, deprived in this case, by the course that was adopted. But if a doubt could be entertained upon this point, we think there can be none whatever that if a charge, in such a case and under such circumstances, may be sent by the judge to the jury, it should be the original one, and not a copy.

But there was another very important, settled and well established principle of criminal law violated, we think, by this proceeding; which is, that during the trial of a capital case, (the whole trial,) the prisoner has a right to be, and must be, present—no step can be taken by the court in the trial of the cause in his absence. This results from the humanity of the law, and the tender regard it has for human life; which forbids that any proceedings shall take place in the trial of such a cause, unless the prisoner charged is present in court, to make his objections to any and every step that may be taken in it, which he may deem illegal, and to do whatever else he may or can legally and properly do in his own defence. Suppose that after the testimony has been taken the prisoner escapes, or becomes sick, and is unable to be brought into court, can the jury render a verdict? Suppose he escapes or is taken sick, and is thus disabled, after the verdict has been received, can judgment be rendered? If he were to escape or become sick, and unable to remain in court while the testimony is being taken, or the charge is being given, would the cause proceed?

In the case of the State v. Hughes, 2 Alabama Reps., 103, 104, Collier, Ch. Justice, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The 10th sec. of the 1st art. of the constitution declares, that "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused has a right to be heard by himself and counsel," &c.; again—"and in all prosecutions, by indictment or information, a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the county or district in which the offence shall have been committed—he shall not be compelled to give evidence against himself, nor shall he be deprived of life, liberty or property, but by due course of law." The constitutional provision guarantees to the accused the right, not only to discuss questions of law and fact, which may arise preparatory to or pending the trial before the jury, or other proceedings in the cause. That he may avail himself of this privilege, the opportunity must be afforded him of coming into court and being heard, before he is foreclosed of any legal exception. If a different course is pursued, and a sentence pronounced ag inst him, extending to life, liberty or property, he cannot be said to have been "convicted by due course of law." Our constitution, sec. 2, No. 8, is essentially the same in principle, as that of Alabama above cited.

In Sperry's case, 7 Leigh Reps., 623, (2 supp. to the United States Digest, page 154, No. 242,) the record showed that on the 29th of September, 1837, the accused was led to the bar, in custody of the keeper of the jail, and was then arraigned and pleaded, and on motion of the prisoner, the cause was continued until the first day of the next term, and thereupon he was remanded to the jail. Afterwards, at a court held the 27th day of April, 1838, it was entered upon the record, that on that day "came, as well as the attorney for the commonwealth, as the prisoner by his attorney, and thereupon came a jury," &c. The jury, not agreeing upon their verdict on that day, were adjourned over until the next. Nothing being stated on the record, from which it could necessarily be inferred that the prisoner was personally present on the 27th April, the General Court decided that the verdict, which was found on the following day, should be set aside, and a venire de novo awarded. In the case of the Commonwealth v. Parker, 2 Pickering, 550, which was an indictment for murder, after the jury had been impanelled, and the circumstances of the case stated to them, the counsel for the prisoner moved that the jury should view the place where the assault was alleged to have been made. Parker, Ch. Justice, asked the counsel if they knew of an instance of a view being granted in a case like this, saying that it seemed to violate the principle, but the proceedings should be in the presence of the accused. 3d Robinson's Practice, 178. 1 Chitty's Crim. Law, 636, and 4 Black. Comm., 317, and the State v. Battle, 7 Alabama Reps., 259, are also authorities which tend to sustain this view of the matter. In the case last cited the court held, that, when a prisoner will not appear in court to hear the verdict which the jury announce themselves ready to render, the court may order a mistrial. This was a charge of an assault with an intent to kill, and the prisoner had fled when the jury came in—and if the court would not proceed in such a case in the absence of the prisoner, surely it should not in a capital case.

In Sergeant v. Roberts, et al., 1 Pick. Reps., 338, cited by the counsel for the prisoner, there was a motion for a new trial, and one of the grounds on which it rested, was a written communication from the judge to the jury, after the court was adjourned, in answer to a note from their foreman, stating the improbability of their agreeing upon a verdict. In regard to this, Parker, Ch. Justice, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "As it is impossible, we think, to complain of the substance of the communication, the only question is, whether any communication at all is proper; and if it was not, the party against whom the verdict was, is entitled to a new trial. And we are all of opinion, after considering the question maturely, that no communication whatever ought to take place between the judge and the jury, after the cause has been committed to them by the charge of the judge, unless in open court, and where practicable, in presence of the counsel in the cause." This is a civil case, and the principle asserted in it applies with far greater force in a criminal, and especially in a capital case. It is true, that in Shepley a. White, 6 New Hamp. Reps., 172, which was somewhat similar in principle, a new trial was refused. The judge who delivered the opinion in the case, after commenting upon the cases of Thayer v. Van Vleet, 5 John. Reps., 111, and Brown v. Crane, 10 Johnson, 239, concludes as follows: "The principle to be deduced from these cases seems to be a sound one. If the jury, after an adjournment, put a question respecting the facts of the case to the court, it will be irregular to state the evidence relating to it; but if they desire instruction upon a mere question of law, that may be answered. It should undoubtedly be answered in such a way that the parties may have an opportunity to have it corrected, if there is error in the answer; and in this way, all the rights of both parties are secured as effectually as if the answer was given in open court." This also was a civil case, and we doubt exceedingly whether the learned court who decided it, would have sustained such a proceeding in a capital case. The last paragraph of its opinion shows very clearly that it ought not to be applied in such a case, because if the verdict is for the prisoner, it is conclusive; and the error (if such error produced it) could not be corrected; and it is the duty of the court to hold the scales of justice even between the prisoner and the State.

The second error assigned is that "The indictment is bad, because it contains abbreviations and contractions in various parts, such as the "&" for "and." & is not a letter, but a character which represents the word and, and nothing else—it would be better to use the word itself. This character, however, although it may have been discarded by some classical writers and others who are very nice and particular in regard to their style of writing, has generally obtained, been long in common use, is as well understood as the word "and" itself, and is not therefore obscure, ambiguous or likely to deceive or mislead; and it is only such as are ambiguous or obscure that render an indictment bad. An indictment ought to be certain to every intent and without any intendment to the contrary. 1 Chity's Cr. L., 306. Cro. Eliz., 490. Cro. Jac., 20. But this strictness does not so far prevail as to render an indictment invalid in consequence of the omission of a letter which does not change the word into another of different signification, as undertood for understood, and receiv'd for received. 1 Leach Cr. Ca., 134, 145. And if the sense be clear, nice objections ought not to be regarded. 1 Chitty's 504 Cr. L., 172. 2 East., 259, 260. We therefore think that this objection is not sustained.

The third error assigned is that "There did not appear of record that the Grand Jury had ever found "a true bill," and though the court has ordered the record to be altered, it could not be done"

The record, as we have seen, commences as follows, to wit:—"Pleas at the Court House in the town of Monticello, Jefferson County, in the State of Florida, on the first Monday of December, in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, before the Circuit Court of law for the county aforesaid," saying nothing of its being an adjourned term. And the next entry, (after setting out an affidavit, warrant and commitment, &c., which are no part of the record,) is as follows: "And at another day, to wit, on the 29th day of November, in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, at the October adjourned term of the Circuit Court of Jefferson County, the following entry was made among the records of the court, to wit: The Grand Jury came into court and presented the following bill of indictment, to wit: The State of Florida v. Thomas J. Holton, Felony, a true bill." This is all that the record contains respecting the finding of the Grand Jury in this case; and by another part of it we are informed that the words "a true bill" were not in the record until after the verdict was found and judgment rendered thereon, when the court ordered that it be inserted "nunc pro tunc," and the right of the court to make this order, at that stage of the proceedings, is denied by the counsel for the prisoner, and may well be doubted. But from the view that we have taken of this case, we do not deem it necessary now to decide that question, as we have come to the conclusion, after a due examination of the record and the most mature deliberation, that there is no proper showing by the record that any bill of indictment for murder was ever found by a Grand Jury against the prisoner, and that the first error assigned is well sustained. The clerk has, after the entry of the finding above mentioned, spread in extenso upon the record a paper purporting to be an indictment against the prisoner for murder, which, he says, is a copy of the said bill of indictment, with the endorsements thereon; and, at the foot of it, he says "Endorsed, State of Florida, v. Thomas J. Holton, Felony, found at November term, 1848." Now an indictment found at November term, 1848, is not an indictment found (as stated in a former part of the record,) at the October adjourned term, 1848. The clerk states further that this indictment was endorsed 505
"Allen R. McCall, Foreman," but there is nothing in the record to show that Allen R. McCall was foreman of a Grand Jury at either the October adjourned term, 1848, or at the November term, 1848, if any such term was holden. There was not, however, any statute authorizing such a term to be held, and it is presumed that none such was holden; and if the bill was in fact found a true bill at the October adjourned term, the record should have shown when the original session commenced, but it does not. Chitty, 1 Cr. L., 331, says: "If an indictment is taken at an adjourned session, it must be shown when the original sessions commenced, as well as when the bill was preferred, in order to show that it is within the time prescribed by the statute." And see The King v. Fisher, 2 Strange, 865; 3 Bac. Abr., title Indictment, page 94, letter K. The caption of an indictment is a formal statement of the proceedings, describing the court before whom the indictment was found, the time and place where it was found and the jurors by whom it was found, and these particulars it must set forth with sufficient certainty. 1 Chitty's Cr. L. 326.—5 Bac. Abr., title Indictment, 93. This record does not show the name of the judge who held the court, unless we can infer it from finding the name of a judge signed to a bill of exceptions, after the trial was over; nor does it set forth the names of the Grand Jurors who found the alleged indictment, or even show that one was empanelled at either of the terms of the court mentioned. It is possible that these two last mentioned defects might have been amended, if the proper steps had been taken in time, but that would have availed nothing; for, if we could presume that the court was holden at the time prescribed by law, and by the proper Judge, and that a Grand Jury was duly empanelled and sworn, and that Allen R. McCall was foreman of it, when the record states that the Grand Jury found "a true bill" against Thomas J. Holton for felony, we think that we are not warranted in saying that they agreed upon finding and did find a "true bill for murder." The fact that a paper called an indictment for murder is spread out in extenso on the record does not cure the defect, which is, that, by the record it also appears that the Grand Jury did not find a true bill for murder, but only for felony.—It has been suggested that the word "felony" might be rejected as surplusage; but it would read that the Grand Jury came into court and presented an indictment against Thomas J. Holton "a true bill" without showing for what; which would not help the mat- 506
ter. Felony is a generic term, which includes all capital crimes.—4 Blackstone's Comm., 63. Davis' Cr. L., 62. In Cawood's case, 2 Virg. Cases, 541, the record showed that the Grand Jury were regularly empanelled and sworn, that they found many bills of indictment and made several presentments, and then, having nothing further to present, were discharged. In the record of the proceedings of the Grand Jury there was no entry of any bill being found against the prisoner; the paper, however, which was copied into the record as the indictment, had on the endorsement "a true bill," and this endorsement was signed by the person who was foreman of the Grand Jury at the term at which the prisoner was arraigned. It was stated in the proceedings had upon the trial, the prisoner "who stands indicted for murder, was led to the bar and thereof arraigned, and pleaded not guilty to the indictment." Held, that the prisoner did not appear by the record to have been indicted; that the failure to record the finding of the Grand Jury could not be supplied by recording the paper purporting to be an indictment,, nor the endorsement thereon, and that the subsequent plea of "not guilty," pleaded by the prisoner, did not cure the defect of the record. The Grand Jury cannot find one part of the same charge to be true and another false; they must either maintain or reject the whole, and therefore if they endorse a bill or indictment for murder "billa vera se defendendo," or "billa vera," for manslaughter and not for murder, the whole will be invalid and may be quashed on motion. 1 Chitty's Cr. L., 322, and authorities there cited in note (e). 2 Hale, 162.—So we think of a finding for felony on a bill of indictment for murder. Felony comprises every species of crime which occasioned, at common law, the forfeiture of lands and goods. This most frequently happens in those crimes which are punished with death. 4 Black. Comm., page 94.

The second section of the act relating to crimes and misdemeanors, (Duval's Comp., 113,) declares that any person convicted of murder, rape or arson shall be punished with death. Here, then, there are three felonies enumerated in the very section which provides for the punishment of murder. Manslaughter, too, is a felony at common law and is so regarded throughout this State. In all trials for that offence the prisoner has always been allowed his twenty peremptory challenges, under the 14th section of the act of Novem-

507 ber 19th, 1828, for the apprehension of criminals, &c., which says: "In all cases of felony the accused shall have a right of peremptory challenge of twenty." Upon an indictment for murder the jury may acquit of the malice aforethought and murder, and find guilty of manslaughter. 1 Chitty's Cr. L., 638, and authorities there cited in note. Non constat but the Grand Jury could not agree upon a finding for murder and so found for felony in this case.

The fourth and only remaining error assigned is that "The court erred in refusing instructions asked as an amendment to those granted."

The instruction asked and refused was as follows: "But if the jury believe from the evidence that the prisoner did not think the blow was likely to produce death, then that the jury should acquit the prisoner;" and we think that the court did right in refusing it.—Had it clearly appeared that he so thought, or had a right so to think from the size of the stick used, still he would not have been entitled to an acquittal—it would only have reduced the offence to manslaughter. This assignment, therefore, is overruled. But, for the reasons above stated, upon the first and third errors assigned, we are of opinion that the judgment of the Circuit Court of Jefferson County should be reversed, a supersedeas to the sentence of death awarded, that the indictment be quashed and that the prisoner be held to answer to a new bill of indictment to be preferred against him, and that the cause be remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

*Per curiam.

Note.—The Reporter understands that Justice Hawkins did not assent to all the views taken by the court in the foregoing opinion. No expression of dissent was heard from him, however, and it is believed he concurred in the judgment pronounced by the court.

508 Michael Ferrall, Thomas M. Crowell and Lewis Hale, Plaintiffs in Error, vs. Richard H. Bradford and Edward Bradford, Defendants in Error.

A judgment without satisfaction, recovered against one of two or more joint debtors, is a bar to an action against the others. If the parties enter into a joint obligation, it is certainly to be understood they are to be sued jointly and not severally.

If, upon such an obligation, separate suits are brought against the joint obligors, the non-joinder of all the obligors who are in full life, and who have not been discharged by the operation of a bankrupt or insolvent law, and who are of full age, may be pleaded in abatement.

Where a suit has been brought against several joint obligors and the attorney of the plaintiff is induced, by the false and fraudulent representations of one of the defendants, to dismiss the suit as to him and another, and take his judgment against the third joint obligor, the party making such representations cannot be permitted, in a subsequent suit on the same joint obligation, to avail himself of the plea of a former recovery. Nor will the fact that such representations were made by one only of the defendants make any difference—the fraud enuring to the benefit of his co-defendant, against whom also, as well as himself, the first suit was dismissed.

A demurrer of defendants to plaintiffs' replication, averring that the proceedings in the original suit were dismissed as to them, owing to certain false and fraudulent representations made by one of them to plaintiffs' attorney, whereby he was imposed upon, circumvented, and his judgment not fairly exercised, admits the fraud so set forth in the replication.

The mode or manner in which fraud is effected is not a matter of much consequence; —it is the effect produced to which the court must look, in order to see if the result is a consequence of the fraud complained of.

Where fraud is admitted or proved, relief can be obtained in a court of law, as well as in a court of equity; and when the defence of fraud exists at law, the party should avail of it there.

Error to Leon Circuit Court..

The plaintiffs in error brought an action of debt against the defendants at the Spring term, 1846, of the Circuit Court of the county of Leon, upon a bond made by defendants, jointly, for the payment of the sum of thirteen hundred dollars. To this bond there was a condition which is recited in the opinion delivered by the court.

Richard H. Crowell, one of the defendants was not served with process. The other defendants, the Bradfords, pleaded that they were jointly, and not jointly and severally, bound, with one Richard 509
H Crowell and that, in the year 1843, the plaintiffs impleaded the said Crowell, in the Superior Court of the County of Leon, severally in an action of debt for and in respect of the very same identical cause of action, and recovered judgment against him, in said court, for the very same identical debt in the declaration mentioned.

To this plea plaintiffs replied: That J. B. Brown, Esq., the attorney for plaintiffs in the suit mentioned in defendant's plea, took judgment against Richard H. Crowell alone, in consequence of false and fraudulent representations made to him by Richard H. Bradford, one of the defendants—that the said attorney was imposed upon, circumvented, and his judgment not fairly exercised, and was induced to dismiss proceedings, as to the Bradfords, in consequence of the aforesaid representations.

The defendants demurred, alleging the insufficiency in law of this replication.

At the Spring term, 1848, the Circuit Court of the County of Leon, Hon. Thomas Baltzell presiding, the matters of law arising upon defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's replication being argued, it was adjudged that the matters therein contained are insufficient in law to maintain the action; and therefore the demurrer was sustained.

Douglas, for plaintiffs in error:

The plaintiffs' counsel contend that the judgment heretofore rendered in this case against Crowell does not bar the plaintiffs' right to recover against the defendants in error:

1. Because the whole of a joint contract is not merged in a judgment against one of the joint contractors. Vide Shehee v. Mandaville and Jamieson, 2 Cond. Rep. Sup. Ct. U. S., 362. Drake v. Mitchell, 3 East., 257. Brown v. Wooten, Croke James, 73.—Coke's Abr. Rep., 183. 1 Harr. Dig., 22. 2 Greenleaf's Rep., 191 1 Comyn's Dig. (L. 4,) title Action, 234. Bryant v. Withers, 2 M. & Selw., 123. 2 B. & Adolph., 892. 7 J. J. Marshal, 416. Godson v. Smith, 2 Moore, 157.

2. Because the joint obligation is not extinguished by a judgment against one of the joint obligors. See the above cited authorities.

3. The recovery of judgment against one, is no release to the others. The recovery of judgment negatives the idea of a release.— 510
The authorities cited prove this position.

4. Nothing short of full payment by one of several joint debtors, or a release under seal, can operate to discharge the other debtors from the contract. Walker v. McCulloch, 4 Greenleaf, 421. Ruggles v. Patten, 8 Mass., 480. 14 John. Rep., 404. Dennett v. Chick et al., 2 Greenleaf, 191.

5. Judgment and execution without satisfaction is no bar to a recovery against the co-obligors, otherwise in torts. 1 Johns. Rep., 291. 3 Mol., 87. 1 Ch. Plead. 33, and note G. 2 Hen. & Mun., 358. Blumfield's case, Coke's Abr. Rep., 169. 2 Shower, 494.—3 East., 257. Walters v. Smith, 2 B. & Adolph., 892. Bailey v. Rogers, 1 Greenleaf, 186. 2 Black., 947. Reese v. Abbott, Cowp., 832. 2 Bailey, 411.

Should the court differ with me on these points, still we hold the replication is good and a sufficient answer to the plea. Fraud vitiates all proceedings, and those who are parties to it may not shield themselves under the effect of their own acts. If the attorney was induced to take a sole judgment against Crowell, one of the joint obligors, by the false and fraudulent representations of his co-obligors, or either of them, or by their simple misrepresentations, then the co-obligors, who have pleaded the judgment, cannot take advantage of their own wrong. Vide Simms v. Slacum, 1 Cond. Rep. S. C. U. S., 539. Borden v. Fitch, 15 Johns. Rep., 121. Fermer's case, Coke's Ab. Rep. 60. 1 Cain's Rep., 461. Sinclair v. Fraser, 1 Doug. 5 and note. Dutchess of Kingston's case, 1 John. Rep., 424. 1 Stark. on Evidence, 233. Winchell v. Stiles, 15 Mass., 230. 19 Johns. Rep., 164. Holker v. Parker, 2 Cond. Rep. S. C., 560.—7 Cranch., 453.

Branch, for defendants in error:

The first question in this case is—whether the plea of a former recovery by plaintiffs against Crowell, one of the joint obligors, is a bar to this action?

The bond is joint, and not joint and several; and plaintiffs have heretofore, in another and separate action, recovered judgment against Crowell. This suit is against the Bradfords and likewise against Crowell.

511 No principle of pleading is better recognized than that, on a joint obligation or contract, all the parties must be sued jointly. This rule is so inflexible that all must be sued, even though one has become a bankrupt. Chitty on Pl., 47, 48.

So, also, if a party bring a joint action on a joint and several bond, and one of the parties dies after judgment, he will lose his remedy against the assets of the deceased. Chitty on Pl., 49, 50.

To allow a party to sue the obligors of a joint obligation separately or in separate actions, would destroy the universally admitted distinction between joint and joint and several bonds or contracts.—It would virtually make joint instruments joint and several.

In this case, plaintiffs, having sued the principal and obtained judgment against him, must be presumed to have discharged the other obligors, who were only sureties. Crowell, having made no objection by plea or otherwise, the plaintiffs had a right to discharge the Bradfords and sue Crowell alone, as they have done. They cannot, after having elected to treat the bond as the separate bond of Crowell and under that election obtained judgment against him, now elect to treat it as the joint obligation of all the parties, and make the Bradfords liable in a new suit against all. They must abide their election.

The right of personal action against the Bradfords having been once suspended or relinquished, is gone forever, and cannot be restored by any act on their part.

Again: By obtaining judgment against Crowell, the bond or cause of action became merged in the judgment. It ceased to a debt of specialty and became one of record. Having thus become a debt of a higher nature, the bond ceased to be the subject of future action.

Again: Should this action be maintainable, then two judgments will be in existence at once against Crowell for the same debt, which clearly cannot be. Nor can the Bradfords alone be sued to avoid this difficulty; for if they were, they could show that Crowell was jointly liable with them, and indeed the variance between the allegata and probata would be fatal.

It has, acordingly, been repeatedly decided by the highest courts in this country and England, that a judgment against one on a joint contract and in a separate action is a bar to an action against the other contractor. Chitty on Pl., 53 and note. Ward v. Johnson, 13 Mass. R., 148. Robertson v. Smith. 18 Johns. R., 459. King

2. The replication to the second plea of former recovery, alleging that this recovery had been obtained by the fraud of the Bradfords, was bad, and the demurrer thereto was properly sustained.

The plaintiffs, being parties to the judgment, could not aver that it was fraudulent. A party to a judgment cannot impeach it collaterally. Until reversed, a judgment is in force; and being a record, no averment can be made againset its validity. Chitty on Pl., 521.—2 Black. Comm., 22. Moses v. McFarland, 2 Burr. HAWKINS, Justice, delivered the opinion of the court:

For the better understanding of the case at bar, the second plea of the defendants, Bradford's, is set forth at length. "And for further plea, the defendants, Edward Bradford and Richard H. Bradford, by their attorneys, J. & L. Branch, crave oyer of the said writing obligatory, and it is read to them, &c.; they also crave oyer of the condition of the said writing obligatory, and it is also read to them, in these words: 'The condition of the above obligation is such, that whereas the aforesaid Lewis Hale, Michael Ferrell and Thomas M. Crowell, are bound as bail for the said R. H. Crowell, for his appearance at the next Superior Court, to be holden in the county of Halifax, in the State of North Carolina, in a certain suit, wherein the heirs of William Crowell, deceased, are plaintiffs, and the said Crowell is defendant. Now, if the said R. H. Crowell shall appear at the said court, to be held in October next, and surrender himself in discharge of his bail, or if he shall pay the amount which may be recovered against him, then this obligation shall be null and void.'

Witness our hands and seals, this 11th May, 1841.

R. H. CROWELL, [SEAL.]
EDWARD BRADFORD, [SEAL.]
RICHARD H. BRADFORD, [SEAL.]"

"Which being read and heard, the said defendants, Edward Brad- 513 ford and Richard H. Bradford, say—they became bound to the said plaintiffs by the writing obligatory in the declaration mentioned, jointly with the defendant, Richard H. Crowell, and not severally; and that the said plaintiffs, notwithstanding the said writing obligatory was the joint obligation of the said Richard H. Crowell and the said Edward Bradford, and Richard H. Bradford, heretofore, to wit: at the Spring term of the Superior Court of the Middle District of Florida, sitting for the county of Leon, in the year eighteen hundred and forty-three, impleaded the defendant, Richard H. Crowell, one of the joint obligors of said writing obligatory, severally, in a certain action of debt, for detaining and not paying the very same identical debt, and for and in respect of the very same identical causes of action in the said declaration mentioned, and that such proceedings were thereupon had in the said court in that plea; that afterwards, to wit: on the twenty-fifth day of April, Anno Domini, eighteen hundred and forty-three, the said plaintiffs, by the consideration and judgment of the said court, recovered in the said plea against the said Richard H. Crowell, the sum of thirteen hundred dollars, and one hundred and ninety-four dollars and seventy cents, and their costs about their said suit in that behalf expended; whereof the said Richard H. Crowell was convicted, as by the records and proceedings thereof still remaining in the said court more fully and at large appears; which said judgment still remains in full force and effect, not in the least reversed or made void. And this the said defendants, Edward Bradford and Richard H. Bradford, are ready to verify; wherefore they pray judgment, if the said plaintiffs ought to have or maintain their aforesaid action thereof against them, &c."

To this plea, the following amended replication was filed. "And the said plaintiffs, Lewis Hale, Michael Ferrall and Thomas M. Crowell, by their attorneys, as to the said plea of the said defendants, Richard H. Bradford and Edward Bradford, by them secondly above pleaded, say—that they, the said plaintiffs, by reason of any thing by the said defendants in that plea alleged, ought not to be barred from having and maintaining their aforesaid action thereof against them, the said defendants, because, they say, that, at the time of the taking of the said judgment. in said plea mentioned, against Richard H. Crowell alone, Joseph B. Brown, the attorney of record, who conducted, prosecuted and managed the suit in which said judgment was taken for plaintiffs, was imposed upon, circumvented and his 514 judgment not fairly exercised, and said attorney was induced to dismiss the proceedings as to the said defendants, Richard H. Bradford and Edward Bradford, and to take a judgment against Richard H. Crowell alone in said plea mentioned, in consequence of the false and fraudulent representations of the defendant, Richard H. Bradford, one of the said defendants, and this they, the said plaintiffs, are ready to verify; wherefore they pray judgment and their damages, by reason of the non-payment of their debt, to be adjudged to them, &c., &c."

By the defendants a demurrer was put into this replication, and was sustained by the court.

The plaintiffs in error have assigned the following causes of error:

1. The court below erred in sustaining the plea of former recovery, pleaded in the second plea of the defendants.

2. The court erred in sustaining the demurrer to plaintiffs' replication to said plea of former recovery.

3. The court erred in not giving judgment for plaintiffs on the defendants' demurrer to plaintiffs' replication to said plea of former recovery.

4. The court erred in deciding the defendant's plea of former recovery against the said Richard H. Crowell a bar to plaintiffs' action.

Two questions raised by the pleadings and by this assignment of errors, present themselves for the consideration of the court.

First. Where there is a joint obligation given by three persons and judgment is taken only against one, whether that judgment can be pleaded in bar to a subsequent suit upon the same cause of action, by the other parties to the instrument?

Second. If this plea of judgment recovered is a good bar to the subsequent suit, the next inquiry is, how far its effect can be counteracted and avoided by the false and fraudulent representations of the party setting up this bar; and owing to which judgment in the original suit was taken against Richard H. Crowell alone, without joining the Bradfords, his co-defendants?

We will discuss them in their order; and as to the first point, we are clearly of opinion, that a judgment, without satisfaction, recovered against one of two or more joint debtors, is a bar to an action 515 against the others. We are aware that there have been conflicting decisions upon the question; but we must decide it upon what we deem principle, and upon the authority of decisions entitled to the greatest respect, not only for the reasoning contained in them, but for their having been made by judges of the highest character and reputation.

If parties enter into a joint obligation, it is certainly to be understood they are to be sued jointly, and not severally. It is part of their bargain, and they have a right to insist upon its fulfillment. In the words of C. J. Spencer, "Each debtor is bound for the whole, until the debt is paid; but as regards the remedy to coerce payment, there is a material and settled distinction. If they have undertaken severally to pay, separate suits may be brought against each; but when their undertaking is JOINT, unless they waive the advantage, by not imposing a plea in abatement, they must be sued jointly, if in full life, and neither has been discharged, by operation of a bankrupt or insolvent law, or is not liable on the ground of infancy."—Robertson v. Smith et al., 18 John. R., 477.

The principle we have laid down is to be found in all the text books. In Chitty on Pl., 48, we find that, where there are several parties, if the contract be joint, they must all be made defendants." So in Comyn Dig., tit. action, K. 4, "a recovery against one obligor and execution, will be a bar in debt against the other." It is true, that in the same work, tit. as above, L. 9, it is said: "So a recovery and execution against one, where the thing demanded is certain, is no bar in another action, against another, upon the same foundation—as if two be bound by a bond, a recovery and execution against one, is no bar to an action upon the same bond against the other obligors." Baron Parke, in a case to be cited hereafter, remarked, in relation to this last clause in Comyn, "that it is merely a repetition of the old cases relating to joint and several bonds," and such seems to have been the opinion of C. J. Spencer.

We are aware, that in stating our conclusion, we may be said to have impugned a decision of the highest legal tribunal in our country, the Supreme Court of the United States, and that decision, too, pronounced by Chief Justice Marshall. Shehee v. Mandeville, 6 Cranch, 263. Delicate must be the task at all times of criticizing an opinion emanating from such a source—bold, perhaps, the tribunal that may differ from its conclusions; and we are free to admit, 516 that in that case the rigid technicalities of the law were made to succumb and give way to equity and justice. There certainly seems something exceedingly unjust in one partner, receiving the profits of a partnership for a long period of time, and upon the concern becoming unsuccessful, concealing his interest, and leaving a third person to bear the loss; besides, if he were a secret partner, how could the creditor learn whom to sue? But ita lex scripta est. The case at bar stands upon a different footing; the suit was upon a bond—in which, of course, all the names of the obligors were clearly and distinctly set forth.

The decision, however, in Shehee v. Mandeville, has been directly overruled in this country, and in England. In Ward v. Johnson, et al., 13 Mass., 148, it was quoted by the plaintiffs, and its doctrine denied by the court, Justice Wilde holding: "This being a joint action, to support the declaration, a joint subsisting cause of action must be shown against both the defendants. (There had been a previous judgment against one of the defendants, upon the same cause of action.) "We know of no principle of law," he further says, "which can authorize us to give separate judgments in an action on a joint contract."

In the case before cited, 18th Johnson, it was commented upon at large by C. J. Spencer, and received his decided disapprobation, and the principle contained in it was overruled by the court. So, too, in Peters' C. C. Reports, 301, Judge Washington says: "a judgment against one partner extinguishes the simple contract debt as completely as if one had given his bond for it." This same principle is sustained in the courts of Pennsylvania. 9th Sergeant & Rawle, 142; 1 Watts & Sergeant R., 339, and in the latter case, the decision of Shehee v. Mandeville, is not considered as authority, though with an expression of regret by the court that it had been overruled, as "its justice might have supported it."

Chancellor Kent, in Penney v. Martin, 4 Johnson Ch. Rep., 567, approves of the decision in the case of Willings & Francis v. Consequa, 1 Peter C. C. R., 301, before cited, and refused even in equity to enforce the rights of a creditor against a dormant partner. The decisions in Peters' C. C. Reports, and that of Penney v. Martin, were made several years posterior to that of Shehee v. Mandeville.

The general principle as asserted by the court, is fully sustained also by a solemn decision of the Court of Exchequer in England, case of Shehee v. Mandeville was cited before that court, but it was not deemed satisfactory, and was disregarded. In this case, there are some dicta of Baron Parke upon the subject of extinguishment, and sustaining the argument of counsel for the defendants. He remarks that "If there be a breach of contract or wrong done, or any other cause of action by one against another, and judgment be recovered in a court of record, the judgment is a bar to the original cause of action, because thereby it is reduced to a certainty, and the object of the suit attained, and it would be useless and vexatious to subject the defendant to another suit, for the purpose of obtaining the same result. Hence the legal maxim, transit in rem adjudicatum. The cause of action is changed into matter of record, which is of a higher nature, and the inferior remedy is merged in the higher. This appears to be equally true, where there is but one cause of action, whether it be against a single person or many." With these remarks, we dismiss the first point in the case, and we come now to the second.

King and another, v. Hoare, 13 Mee. & Welsby Repts., 495. The 517

This involves a question of more difficulty, inasmuch as we can find no case precisely analagous, to assist us in coming to a conclusion. The facts succinctly are these: The plaintiffs in the court below took judgment against only one of the joint obligors, and when that fact is pleaded by the defendants in bar, they reply that they did only do so, because their attorney was circumvented and induced to dismiss the proceedings as to the other defendants, in consequence of the fraudulent representations of one of the defendants

It matters little as to the mode or manner in which fraud is effected. A court must look to the effect, and ask if the result is a consequence of the fraud. Here the defendants seek to avail themselves of a legal defence, arising from a state of facts which they themselves by their fraud have produced. They admit, virtually, by their demurrer, that the plaintiffs have been deprived of a legal right by their fraud, and they seek now, by their defence, to take advantage of their own wrong—a defence admitted to arise from their own fraudulent act. The question now is, will such a defence be available, tolerated, or allowed? Law, reason, justice and morality, unite in a negative response.

Lord Coke says, that "fraud and deceit by him who is trusted is most odious in law." "The common law doth so abhor fraud and covin, that all acts, as well judicial as others, and which of them- 518 selves are just and lawful, yet being mixt with fraud, are in judgment of law wrongful and unlawful." 3 Reports, Fermer's case.—Lord Mansfield, too, (Cowper, 434,) remarks: "The principles and rules of the common law, as now universally known and understood, are so strong against fraud in every shape, that the common law would have attained every end proposed by the statutes of 13th and 27th Elizabeth."

Fraud will vitiate any, even the most solemn transactions, and an asserted title to property founded upon it is utterly null. 15 Peters' S. C. R., 594. 2 Howard, 284. No doubt a record may be affected and even vitiated by fraud. White v. Hall, 12 Vesey, 324. Hampson v. Hampson, 3 Vesey & Bea., 42. But this principle of fraud is so generally admitted, it is useless to multiply authorities.

We do not deem it imperative, as contended for by counsel, that the plaintiffs should be driven into a court of equity for redress, if a fraud has been perpetrated. We consider the defence to the plea in this case, as set forth in the replication, a good one at law. Judge Story remarks: "To remedy defects in common law proceedings, is the principal reason of interference—that a wrong is done for which there is no plain, adequate and complete remedy in the courts of common law." 1 Story's Equity, 53.

It is an admitted principle that a court of law has a concurrent jurisdiction with a court of chancery in cases of fraud. The principles as to fraud may be often more correctly applied in a court of equity than in courts of law. Chancery can compel discovery of facts which a court of law cannot. Fraud may frequently be presumed in equity by the chancellor, while at law, it is the province of the jury to find the facts and determine their character, under the instruction of the court. 8 Peters, 244. 12 Ibid, 11. 10 John R., 462. 4 Wash. C. C. R., 662.

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in speaking of this subject, hold this language: "But when a court of law has regularly the fact of fraud admitted or proved, no good reason can be assigned why relief should not be obtained there, although not always in the same way in which it may be obtained in a court of equity." Boynton v. Hubbard, 7 Mass. R., 112.

So in the case at bar, the fraud is admitted; then why should not the court act upon it? A chancellor, too, might feel no little diffi-519 dence in allowing an appeal to his jurisdiction, when a good defence existed at law, of which the party had not availed himself; and we all know that negligence in this respect meets with no favor in a court of equity.

At the first blush we thought we discovered some difficulty arising from the fact that only one of the defendants is alleged to have been guilty of the fraud, but it soon disappeared; for we find this principle broadly laid down—that interests gained by one person by the fraud of another cannot be held by them; otherwise fraud would always place itself beyond the reach of the court. 4 Iredel Eq. Rep., 219, citing Bridgman v. Green, 2 Vesey, 627. Huguen v. Basely, 14 Vesey, 273.

Again, a plea which is bad in part is bad in toto. If, therefore, two defendants join in a plea which is sufficient for one but not for the other, the plea is bad as to both; for the court cannot sever it and say that the one is guilty and that the other is not, when they all put themselves upon the same terms. Chitty on Pl., 598 (7th Am. ed.) 1 Saunders' R., 28, note 2. So an entire plea cannot be good in part and bad in another part, because such entire plea is not divisible. 1 Saun., 27. Stephens on Pl., 448. 1 T. R., 40. 3 T. R., 376. 3 Mass., 310. 7 Cranch., 159. 7 Cowen, 330.

In relation to the doctrine of transit in rem adjudicatum, a maxim borrowed from the civil law, we are free to admit that it would have been available but for the fraud of those setting it up against the plaintiffs, inducing them to single out one of the joint obligors against whom to take judgment; and we are disposed to carry out the civil law doctrine of the restitutio ad integrum, so far as the defendants are concerned, by restoring the plaintiffs, as near as may be, to the same state in which they would have been but for the fraud of the defendants. Of course, we are not to be understood as intending to set aside the judgment against Crowell, in this collateral way. It would have been better, no doubt, for the plaintiffs to have had it reversed or vacated before the second suit was brought. Crowell was not served with process in the last suit, so that there cannot be two judgments against him. That a legal anomaly, two judgments on a joint cause of action, has, by the peculiar circumstances of the case been produced, must be admitted. But who occasioned it? Who is to complain? Crowell will scarcely do so, and the defendants have no right to be querulous, estopped as they are by their acts and 520 their own conduct in the premises. If the plaintiffs in this case were to be turned out of the court, an anomally far more to be regretted, involving the strongest principles of justice, would arise, viz: a deep, palpable wrong, without a corresponding remedy. We have argued this case, of course, as it stand upon the pleadings. Whether fraud actually was committed, or not, is a question easily solved by the creation of an issue of fact in the court below, to which the parties are remitted.

With these views we are opinion that the judgment of the court below should be reversed. It is therefore ordered that it be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Per Curiam.

DANIEL MCRAENY, TRUSTEE, &C., PLAINTIFF IN ERROR vs. WILLIAM JOHNSON AND WORMLEY R. MOORE, DEFENDANTS IN ERROR.

The trustee of a married woman is the proper person to bring an action at law for asserting or defending the legal title, and every action founded on such title must be brought in his name.

The fact that the property, for an injury to which the action is brought, was in the actual possession of the feme at the time of the injury, does not change or affect the right of the trustee to sue.

When the deed of trust allows the property to remain in possession of a married woman, her possession is consistent with the deed, and she is to be regarded as the agent of the trustee.

The right of action, in such case, cannot be in the husband and wife, the cestui que trust—he having neither the ownership nor possession.

Wherever the trust would be supported in equity, the right of the trustee will be supported at law.

The trustee is the owner and has all the remedies devised by law for any injury done to the property in his charge.

In cases of injury to slaves, the American courts give a more enlarged protection than prevails in cases of mere chattels. They are moral and sentient beings, and the right of the master to maintain trespass for any battery of his slave is clear and well settled.

This was an action of trespass, brought in the Circuit Court of 521
Leon county, by McRaeny, Trustee of Rebecca C. Williams, against William Johnson, Daniel Johnson, Wormley R. Moore and James G. Wells, claiming damages for a trespass which was alleged to have been committed by defendants, and which consisted in assaulting and beating a certain slave of plaintiff, so that he died. Defendants pleaded not guilty.

At the Fall term of the Circuit Court of said county, in the year 1847, the Hon. THOMAS DOUGLAS, Judge presiding, the case was argued and submitted to the jury, who found the following verdict:

"The jury empannelled in this cause appeared in court and upon their oaths do say that the defendants are guilty in manner and form as the plaintiff against them has complained, and they do assess the plaintiff's damages, by occasion thereof, to four hundred and thirty-five dollars, subject to the opinion of the court upon the following points reserved:—Whether, inasmuch as the jury find that the said plaintiff claims title to the negro, Sam, under and by virtue of a deed of trust from Joseph Williams, which is on file in this cause, whereby an interest in, and the possession and use of, said slave was secured to Rebecca Williams during her life, and the said Rebecca Williams was in possession of the slave under said term, so secured to her, not then expired at the time of the alleged trespass, the said plaintiff can maintain this action; and if the court shall be of opinion that the said plaintiff can maintain this action, then the verdict is to be entered for the plaintiff, as aforesaid; but if the court shall be of a contrary opinion, then a verdict is to be entered for the defendants."

Upon this special verdict the court below, being of the opinion that the law upon the point reserved was for the defendants, gave judgment accordingly."

There were other points in the case arising out of the right of challenge, but not material to be noticed in this statement.

The plaintiff, before trial, dismissed his suit as to Wells and Daniel Johnson.

Archer, for plaintiff in Error,

I.—Contended that the court erred in deciding the point reserved in favor of the defendants;

1. Because the possession of Mrs. Williams was the possession in 522 law of the plaintiff. 1 Chitty Pl., 175. 8 Taunt., 676.

2. Trespass lies by the legal owner though not entitled to immediate possession, when there is a destruction of the chattel. 2 Saunders' Pl., 862. 2 Saund. Rep., 479. 1 Chitty Pl., 198-200. 12 Wend., 98. 8 Metcalf, 235.

3. For injury to a slave by force trespass lies by the general owner, under all circumstances. Gilliam v. Senter, 9 Ala., 395. 2 Bailey, 95. Harper, 113. 1 McCord, 100. Dudley's Law and Equity Rep., 83.

II.—The court erred in allowing eight challenges to defendants in empannelling the jury.

III.—The court erred in giving judgment for all the costs against plaintiff, when the verdict was in his favor.

Randall & Thompson, for defendants in error:

The only question here is, whether the court below erred in its judgment on the special verdict. It will be seen that the jury submit to the court, whether the plaintiff had such an actual or constructive possession and also such a general or qualified property in the slave, as will entitle him to maintain trespass vi et armis. [See special verdict.]

The plaintiff must, at the time when the injury was committed, have had an actual or constructive possession, and also a general or qualified property therein. 3 Stephens' N. P., p. 2631. 1 Term R., 480. 2 Greenleaf on Ev., 504, 506. 4 Term R., 489. 7 Term, R., 9.

But if the general owner has parted with the possession, and the bailee have a right to use the thing, the constructive possession is rebutted, and he can no longer maintain trespass, though he retain the right of property, because he has not an immediate right, but only a reversionary right; and when that is the case, the owner cannot maintain trespass for an injury done to the property, even by a stranger, but is driven to his action on the case. 2 Tucker's Coms. 90, 91.

Whether the general owner can maintain trespass for the taking or injury of a chattel while in the hands of a bailee or person having a special property, depends on the question whether such owner has the constructive possession. If the bailee has a right of posses-

McRaeny, Trustee, vs. Johnson and Moore.—Opinion of Court.

523 sion for any time, however considerable, to the exclusion of the owner, such owner cannot maintain trespass.

Therefore, where furniture of a landlord, let with a house, was taken under an execution against the tenant, it was held that the landlord could not maintain trespass against the sheriff, for he had not the constructive possession. Ward v. Macauley, 4 Term R., 489.—Smith v. Plomer, 15 East., 607. Gordon v. Harper, 7 T. R. 9.—Ryan & Moody's Ca., 99. 9 Bac. Abr., title Trespass, 455, note A.

Thus it will be seen that a voluntary bailment, if it have secured to the bailee the right of possession for any the least considerable time, to the exclusion of the owner, such owner cannot maintain trespass for injury done during such bailment.

In the case at bar, McRaeny had neither actual or constructive possession. Moreover, he had not the right to the possession—that was in another, by a title and tenure as good as his own right to the reversion.

Now the exception to this rule yet more fully confirms the correctness of our position.

That "exception" is—where the owner has parted with his possession to a carrier, servant, &c., giving him only a bare authority to carry or to keep, not coupled with an interest in the thing, such owner may yet maintain this action. Stephens' N. P. 2636.

But "e conira"—when the authority of the bailee is something more than a bare authority to carry or to keep; when it is a vested interest in the thing in possession, coupled with the use, this action cannot be maintained by the general owner.

This is illustrated by the case of Hall v. Pickard, 3d Camp., 189. See opinion of Lord Ellenborough, 61, g., in the above case.

Now, for the American rule on this point, see Mr. Justice Washington's opinion in Corfield v. Corfield, 4 Wash. C. C. R., 387, in a case analogous to the one in 3d Campbell.

See further cases cited in 4th Wash. C. C. R., to wit: 1 Chitty's Pl., 166, 7.—193, 4.—150. 8 Johns. R., 337. 11 Johns., 385.—7 Johns. 9, 535.

Cases may be multiplied to any extent:—5 Vermont, 274, 328.—6 Ibidem, 622. 11 Pick., 382. 13 Johns., 141, 561. 21 Pick., 367. 1 New Hamp., 110. 4 J. J. Marsh., 18.

To get rid of this difficulty the counsel for plaintiff in error assert that the possession of Mrs. Williams is the possesion of McRaeny, 524 trustee, and thus seek to shelter themselves behind the principle of law that the possession of the cestui que trust is that of trustee.

But it must be seen that the principle cannot apply here to the possession secured to Mrs. Williams, individually, in the same deed that secured to McRaeny his title as trustee.

It may be true, as laid down in Tillinghast's Adams on Ejt., p. 52, that "cestui que trust is tenant at will to the trustee," and for the very obvious reason that, the whole estate, legal title and possession usually going to trustee, the possession of cestui que trust is ordinarily, in fact, but permissive by trustee, and is, in fact, his very possession.

Opinion by Justice BALTZELL:

That the owner of a slave is entitled to damages from a wrong doer for an injury occasioning his death, is not denied; but in the present case it is urged, that the trustee is not the proper person to bring the suit, nor trespass the form of action appropriate to such an injury. The slave, on whose account the action is instituted, is found by the jury in their special verdict to have been in the possession of a married woman, under a deed of trust constituting the plaintiff trustee; and whether he can maintain the action, under such circumstances, is the question.

For injuries to personal property, without a motion or carrying it away, the remedy is either trespass or case. The injury should be immediately injurious in the action of trespass, and the plaintiff should be in the actual or at least constructive possession of the chattel at the time it was injured. Arch. Pl. & Ev., p. 16, 17. Constructive possession is where the general owner, although the chattel is in the actual possession of another, has the right to reclaim it immediately; the person in possession not being entitled to retain it against his will. 8th Pickering, p. 235. Bacon Abridg., title trespass, C. 7th Connecticut R., page 235. 5th Vermont R., page 97. The plaintiff must have a constructive possession in respect of the right being actually vested in him. 1 Term. Rep., 498. 3 Day, p. 498. 8 Johnson, p. 432. A general property in a personal chattel draws to it the possession in law. Bacon Abridg., title trespass, C. 7 Connecticut, 235. 5th Vermont, 97. Not only he who has the property, but also he who has the possession of goods, shall maintain trespass for the goods. 7th Comyn's Digest, 510.

Has the trustee for a married woman such property or possession 52 by right actually vested as will enable him to maintain the action? We confess that but for the confidence with which the contrary has been maintained by learned counsel, we should have no hesitancy in giving an affirmative, as he is the proper person to bring any action at law for asserting or defending the legal title, and every action founded on such title must be brought in his name. Lewin on Trusts, p. 481, 482. The trustee cannot maintain the action in this case, it is said, because the feme was in the actual possession, and by the deed was entitled to it. There is nothing peculiar in this: "for," says an eminent writer, "it is a case that seldom happens, for the trustee to be in the actual possession." 1 Cruise's Digest, 489.

In the case of Haselton v. Gill and another, which was trover for eight cows, &c., the marriage settlement was in trust, that the trustees should permit the feme (about to be married) to keep and enjoy, and at her will to sell and dispose of the said cows and premises, and the increase and produce to arise and be produced from the same, for her own use, &c., and to carry on the business and trade of a cow keeper and milk-seller; and the action was by the trustees, for part of the cattle contained in the deed, and others bought with the trust money. Lord Mansfield says: "By the common law the wife can have no property during the coverture, but all her estate is in the husband. But courts of equity have for ages past thought the rules of the common law too hard, and have thought it right to protect the property of the wife from the extravagance of the husband, in cases clear of fraud. This is done by the intervention of trustees, and thus far the wife is, to all intents and purposes, a single woman. And whenever the trust can be supported in equity, this court will consider the trustee entitled at law." The title having been contested as fraudulent, on account of the possession, Ashurst and Butler, Justices, say, it was consistent with the deed—the wife was the agent of the trustees—she acted as their agent, and a recovery was had." 3 Term R., p. 622, n. To the same effect, and under like circumstances, are the cases of Jarman v. Woolaston and another, 3 Term R., p. 622. Caddogan v. Kennett, 2 Conn. R., 242, and Foley, &c., v. Sheriff of Middlesex, stated in a note to this latter case. These were cases of trover, yet property is required in it, as well as in trespass. "When the defendant takes goods wrongfully and by trespass, the plaintiff, if he brings trover, waives the trespass, and admits the possession to 5 have been lawfully gotten." Coolidge v. Chitty, &c. 1 Bur., 31.—"Two things are necessary in the action of trover—property in the plaintiff, and a wrongful conversion by the defendant." Ibid. In trover, there must be proof of actual possession, or that plaintiff was entitled to the immediate possession of the goods. 2 Phillips' Evidence, 221. 7 Term. R., 13. A case still more conclusive is that of Wooderman v. Baldock, being an action of tresspass, for the asportation of goods, brought by trustees, under a deed of assignment, with a clause for the trustees to permit the goods to remain in possession of the assignor—those remaining with him were levied upon, and suit being instituted, a recovery was had, no objection being raised as to the form of the action, or to their want of possession, although a new trial was mo d on other grounds. 8 Taunton, 677.

Referring to elementary treatises, whilst the rule is as we have stated, as to the right of the trustee to sue, there is no exception as to any particular action, or class of cases. He is owner, and there is no reason for denying him all the remedies devised by law for redress for any injury sustained by the property under his charge. Nor is there any obstacle, on account of the interest of the cestui que trust; the cases just quoted speak of him as the agent of the trustee; others, of his possession as the "very possession of the trustee," and not liable to be displaced by it, however long continued, the holding not being adverse. Hill on Trustees, 266. Adams on Ejectment, 52. Such right to the possession, it is said, is recognized in equity only. Lewin, 481. Again: cestui que trust is regarded as tenant at will and at sufferance of the trustee. Hill, 266. Lewin, 481. In Dane's Abridgement, as mere borrower of goods from the trustee. 4 Dane, 249. Courts of law do not distinguish between a suit brought by trustee against his cestui que trust, and that by another person. 8 Term Rep., 122, 123. Nor are trustees for married women, as has been insisted in argument, mere nominal appointments, or dry trustees; on the contrary, we find them classed amongst the trustees clothed with active duties. Hill, 545. Where, then, is the pretext for considering their interests and rights as distinct or separate? If the provision, entitling the feme in a trust deed to the possession, may not be noticed or asserted in a court of law, by what rule or right can it avail a stranger claiming its protection 527 not only adversely, but in a manner to annihilate and destroy, as well the possession as the interest and property itself?

It is sought to bring this suit within the authorities holding that trespass will not lie in cases where there is a bailment or right of possession derived from the owner. To this it may be answered, that if the trustee of Mrs. Williams, by his implied sanction, had hired the negro for a term, and during its continuance the injury had been committed, there might be pretext for the argument, though even in such case the destruction of the chattel, for obvious reasons, will give right of action even against the bailee. 1 Chitty Pl., 171.

In cases of injury to this peculiar species of property, the American courts, by a spirit of enligtened humanity, have extended a more enlarged protection than prevails in cases of mere chattels; it is said, "slaves are, by the operation of our law, deprived of all personal rights, yet they are moral agents, subject to the same feelings, and have a right to protection from abuse, as other human beings." Whilst different remedies have been used, "they all, either impliedly or expressly, admit the right of the master to sustain trespass for any battery of his slave. 2 Bailey, 95. Harper, 113. 1 McCord, 100. 11th Alabama, 395, n. s.

The right of action for the injury in the present case, is asserted to be in the husband, Williams, and his wife the cestui que trust, but he has neither the ownership nor possession—neither a right in law, nor one in fact. For him to maintain the action, is to permit him to defeat his own deed, and destroy the very interest he had vested in the trustee. We are satisfied that the trustee is the person to bring the suit, or thre is no remedy—that it was his duty to have brought the action, and that it was rightly brought.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed and set aside, and the cause remanded, that a judgment may be enterd on the special verdict for the plaintiff in that court.

528 ALBERT G. PORTER, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, vs. PAUL R. BEVILL, DEFENDANT IN ERROR.

The act of 1843, T. Dig., 340, does not authorize the admission in evidence of such records or judicial proceedings from other States as are plainly irregular, or defective, or void, but only such as are valid between the parties.

If it appears from the record of the judicial proceedings of a court in another State, that a judgment was rendered against a party not legally summoned, the judgment will be considered here as void, just as such judgment would be regarded, if rendered in this State against a person not legally summoned.

When the courts of this State are required to sanction and enforce the proceedings of the courts of other States, the regularity of such proceedings can and ought to be inquired into.

Where the rule of court in a sister State, made in pursuance of authority given by law, requires in any given case personal service of notice of any proceeding, or publication in a gazette or newspaper, and no such notice or publication appears in the record of the proceedings offered in evidence in the courts of this State, such proceedings, so far as concerns the party here, against whom they are attempted to be enforced, will be regarded as coram non judice, and not binding upon him.

Error to Jefferson county Circuit Court.

This cause was tried at the Spring Term of the Circuit Court, sitting in and for the county of Jefferson, in the year 1845, the Hon. GEORGE S. HAWKINS, Judge, presiding.

An action of assumpsit was brought on the copy of a note, which had been established by certain proceedings in the Superior Court of Effingham county, in the State of Georgia, a certified copy of which proceedings was offered in evidence on the part of the plaintiff in the court below, and held not to be admissible. A full statement of the case, and of the proceedings had in the State of Georgia, is contained in the opinion delivered by the court.

Archer, for Plaintiff in Error.

Call, for Defendant in Error.

Opinion by Justice LANCASTER:

Upon the trial of this cause in the court below, the plaintiff offered in evidence a copy from the record of the Superior Court of

Effingham county, in the State of Georgia, of certain proceeding 529 had in the said court, wherein Albert G. Porter was petitioner, and one Stephen P. Bevill and Paul R. Bevill were made defendants—the object of said proceedings being to establish a copy, in lieu of a note alleged to be lost, which said copy is certified by the clerk of said Superior Court of Effingham county, Georgia, to be a true copy of the proceedings had in said Superior Court, and his seal of office is thereto annexed. To the introduction of which in evidence, the defendant by his counsel objected—which objection was sustained by the court, and the said certified copy of the record ruled to be inadmissible. To which ruling the plaintiff excepted—which was signed, sealed and made part of the record in this case.

The question of this court to adjudicate is, whether the copy of the proceedings, certified as above, was admissible as evidence against this defendant, or not?

By the act of the year 1843, Thompson's Dig., 340, it is enacted: "The records and judicial proceedings of any court of another State, or of the United States, shall be admissible in evidence in all cases in this State, when authenticated by the attestation of the clerk, prothonotary, or other officer having charge of the records of such court, with the seal of such court annexed."

A literal construction would seem at once to exclude these proceedings from being admitted as evidence; they do not purport to be original, but only a certified copy from the original. This question is not deemed necessary to be adjudicated in this case. But if it were conceded that the provision of the act before recited, authorized the admission in evidence of certified copies, so far as the authentication is material, it seems in due form.

This court cannot understand that it was the intention of the Legislature, by the above recited enactment, to authorize the admission in evidence of such records, or judicial proceedings, from other States, as are plainly irregular and defective, or void; but only such as are sound and valid between the parties by whom, and against whom, they are sought to be used. A judgment obtained in this State could not bind a person not a party to it; nor yet a person sought to be made a party, unless he voluntarily appeared, or was duly and legally cited to make his appearance and defend. The same must be true of all manner of judgments obtained in other States. The courts have no jurisdiction over a defendant in an action who has not been legally summoned to defend, and who has not appeared, and judg- 530 ment against such an one is void.

This court is aware of the judicial courtesy due between States of the Union, under the constitution of the United States, and are disposed so to construe the before recited section of the act of 1843, as to give due faith and credit to their records and judicial proceedings. We may add that we feel every proper respect for the judiciary of our sister State, Georgia, but this should not deter or prevent us from looking at the regularity of judicial proceedings sent hither from there, when we are required to sanction and enforce them.

By the 28th section of the before recited act, Thompson's Dig., 342, all the courts of law in this State are authorized to admit the printed statutes of any of the States, when published by authority and commonly read there, as prima facie evidence of the law in such State.

By the judiciary act of the year 1799, the Superior Courts of Georgia were authorized to establish copies in lieu of lost papers, according to law and equity, and to make such rules for their government in the premises as they should think meet. Prince's Dig., 206. Under the authority of that act, the judges of the Superior Court established a rule that it is necessary for a person seeking to establish a lost paper, "to present to the Superior Court a petition, together with a copy in substance of the paper lost as nearly as he can recollect, which copy shall be sworn to by the party, or proved by other evidence. Whereupon a rule nisi may be obtained, calling upon the opposite party to show cause (if any we have) why the copy should not be established in lieu of the original so lost—which rule shall be personally served on the party, if to be found in the State—and if he cannot be found, then the said rule shall be published in some public gazette in the state, for the space of three months."—Appendix to Hotchkiss' Dig. L, of Ga., p. 949. By reference to the copy of the record offered in evidence, it appears that the petition filed in Effingham Superior Court was sworn to, but not the copy of the note sought to be established. The note sought to be established is in the following words, to wit: Scriven County, December, 1841. On the first day of January next, I promise to pay to Paul R. Bevill, or bearer, one hundred dollars, for value received.

(Signed,) STEPHEN P. BEVILL,
(Indorsed,) PAUL R. BEVILL."

531 This, then, is an effort to establish a note alleged to be lost, and an endorsement thereon upon an affidavit appended, not to the copy of the note, as required by the rule of court, but to the petition in which both the form of the note and endorsement are indistinctly set forth; it is not said by whom the endorsement was made. Upon this showing, a rule nisi, was obtained for the defendants, Stephen P. Bevill, the obligor, and Paul R. Bevill, the alleged endorser, to show cause. That rule was executed, in the following manner, as appears from the certified copy of the proceedings: "We acknowledge service of this petition and rule, 30th March, 1843.

STEPHEN P. BEVILL,
PAUL R. BEVILL,
per Attorney.
STEPHEN P. BEVILL."

Upon which service so executed, the defendants were afterwards called, but answered not, and judgment was rendered against thm, and the said copy established to stand in the place of the original. It nowhere appears that Stephen P. Bevill was the attorney of Paul R. Bevill, authorized to acknowledge service for him; his assumption of that authority is not sufficient evidence that he possessed it. Either a power of attorney for that purpose should have been exhibited, or satisfactory evidence of his authority been given.

There was, then, no personal service of the rule nisi on Paul R. Bevill, nor advertisement in a public gazette in the State of Georgia, as required by the rule. It is not shown he had notice of the proceedings, or that he made defence to them, nor is it constructively inferable. As to him, therefore, the said proceedings were plainly coram non judice, and are void and do not bind him. The certified copy of the proceedings offered in evidence, as against the said defendant, are, therefore, inadmissible as to him.

This renders any examination of the reasoning on which the court below proceeded unnecessary; but the opinion of that court, ruling out the testimony, was correct, and must be affirmed with costs.

532 JOHN MCDOUGAL, ADMINISTRATOR, &C., OF JOSEPH W. LEA, vs ANDREW J. LEA, EXECUTOR OF JOHN WILLIAM LEA, DECEASED.

A plea that is founded upon the idea that the cause of action arose in a particular county from the fact that probate of the will was made and defendant undertook and assumed the duties and responsibilities of the office of executor in such county, only goes to the right of action.

The statute which requires a party to be sued in the county of his residence or in that where the cause of action accrued, relate to the cause of action and not to the right to sue.

When the plaintiff's replication alleges that the cause of action accrued in the county where the suit is brought, and the defendant demurs, the demurrer admits that the cause of action did accrue in such county, and consequently that suit is properly brought in that county.

This was an action of assumpsit brought in the Circuit Court for the County of Leon by McDougal, Administrator of Joseph W. Lea, against Andrew J. Lea, Executor of John William Lea, deceased. The cause of action, as set forth in the declaration, was an account for money paid, laid out and expended by plaitniff's intestate to and for the use and at the special instance and request of defendant's testator, in his life time

The defendant pleaded that he was not a resident of Leon county, but of the County of Madison; and that probate of the will of his testator was had in the County of Wakulla, in which his testator resided at the time of his death; and that the cause of action declared upon accrued against him in the county of Wakulla.

To this plea there was a replication to the effect that the cause of action, in the plaintiff's declaration mentioned, accrued to the plaintiff's intestate in his life time and against defendant's testator in his life time, in the county of Leon.

To this replication the defendant demurred and the court below sustained the demurrer. Judgment for defendant at the Spring term, 1848, of Leon County Circuit Court, Judge BALTZELL presiding.

Archer, for plaintiff in error.

Call, for defendant in error.

Opinion by Chief Justice DOUGLAS:

This cause was brought up by writ of error from Leon Circuit Court. The declaration contains but a single count, and that is for

"Money by the said Joseph Lea paid, laid out and expended to and 533 for the use of the said John W. Lea, and at his special instance and request. "To this declaration the defendant put in a plea alleging that he is not a resident of Leon county, but that he resides in Madison county, in the Middle Circuit of the State of Florida, and that the probate of the will of John Williams Lea was had in the county of Wakulla and State of Florida, where the said John Williams Lea resided at the time of his death, and the cause of action above declared upon accrued against this defendant, as executor, as aforesaid, in the county of Wakulla aforesaid, where the defendant undertook and assumed the duties and responsibilities of the office of executor of the last will and testament of said John Williams Lea, and not in the county of Leon. To which plea the plaintiff replied that the said several causes of action, in the said declaration mentioned, accrued to the said Joseph Lea in his life time and against the said John Wiliams Lea in his life time, in the county of Leon aforesaid. To this replication the defendant put in a demurrer, upon which issue was joined, and the court below, after argument, sustained the demurrer and held the replication to be bad.

The error assigned is this: "The court erred in sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's replication.

And, upon a full consideration of the question presented, we think the error well taken. The question arises upon the provisions of the 7th section of the act of November 21st, 1829 (Duval's Compl., 106, Thompson's Digest, 320, No. 4,) which says, "Summons ad respondendum shall be made returnable to the Court having jurisdiction over the County in which the defendant resides, or the cause of action accrued; and the cause shall not be tried in any other County"—with certain exceptions not affecting this case and therefore not necessary to be stated. The plea proceeds upon the idea that the cause of action arose from the fact that probate of the will of John W. Lea was made in Wakulla county and that the defendant there undertook and assumed the duties and responsibilities of the office of executor, &c.; but this only goes to the right of action. The statute relates to the cause of action and not merely the right to sue. When Andrew J. Lea made probate of the last will and testament of John Williams Lea and took upon himself the duties and responsibilities of the office of executor of said will, it gave to the plaintiff a right to sue him as such executor, provided he had a pre-existing cause of action. The declaration alleges such pre-existing cause of action, to 534 wit: money paid, laid out and expended by the said Joseph W. Lea, (of the goods and estate left by whom, at the time of his death, the said plaintiff is administrator,) to and for the use of the said John W. Lea, in his life time. This cause of action the plaintiff, in his replication alleges accrued in Leon Coutyn; the defendant, as his plea shows, resides in Madison county, and, so residing, might have been sued there. The demurrer admits that the cause of action declared upon (to wit: the money paid, laid out and expended, as aforesaid,) accrued in Leon county, and, consequently, we think this suit was well brought in that county. The judgment of the court below must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Per curiam.

LEWIS HALE, MICHAEL FERRAL AND THOMAS M. CROWELL, PLAINTIFFS IN ERROR, vs. RICHARD CROWELL'S ADMINISTRATRIX.

It is a well settled principle that a party may resort to a court of error to obtain a reversal of his own judgment, if it has been so rendered that he may sustain injury by it.

The rule that a party shall not take advantage of an error for his benefit does not apply to errors of the court, as when it pronounces a wrong judgment.

When, in a joint action upon a joint contract, a judgment is entered up against one defendant, after having discontinued as to the other who had been in court as co-defendant, it is erroneous and fatal. This principle applies with greater force when the judgment is first taken against one of several joint obligors, and the suit is afterwards dismissed as to the others.

When, by the negligence or unskilfulness of an attorney, a judgment has been taken which stands in the way of a recovery, or is calculated to embarrass the plaintiff in a suit upon the original contract, and such judgment thus improvidently taken is erroneous, the plaintiff will be allowed to reverse it.

Error to Leon Circuit Court.

The plaintiffs in error, who were also plaintigs in the court below, brought their action against Richard H. Crowell, Edward Bradford and Richard Bradford, in the late Superior Court of the county 535 of Leon, on a joint obligation signed and sealed by defendants.—Three separate præcipes were filed by the attorney for plaintiffs, directing the clerk to issue three separate writs of summons ad respondendum against the defendants, which was accordingly done.

At the Spring term of said Superior Court, 1843, the attorney for plaintiffs filed a declaration against the defendants jointly, declaring on the aforesaid writing obligatory.

At the Fall term of said court, in December, 1844, the plaintiffs by their attorney took a judgment by default against Crowell, and dismissed as to the other defendants.

This writ of error is sued out by plaintiffs to reverse their own judgment, as having been improvidently taken and to their injury, and for manifest error in the proceedings.

Douglas, for plaintiffs in error:

The plaintiffs in error, who were also the plaintiffs in the court below, assign the following error as apparent of record, viz:

That the bond sued on was the joint bond of three persons and the judgment was taken by default against one of the joint obligors, and the proceedings were dismissed as to the other joint obligors.

Upon an inspection of the record the court will find that three several præcipes were filed and three sumomns were issued, all of which were duly executed and returned; and that the plaintiffs declared jointly in one declaration against all the defendants. It also appears of record that the obligation declared on is the joint bond of the three defendants, and not their joint and several bond.

It is one of the canons of the law of contracts that all must be sued jointly who have jointly sealed a contract and are in life. 1 Peters S. C. Rep., 81. Rice v. Shute, 5 Burrows, 2611. Hermer v. Moore, cited in same case. In this last case the judgment was arrested because the facts, of the plaintiff's own showing, made out that he ought not to have judgment; and these facts were: That all had sealed the bond and all were alive at the time of suit brought.

It seems to be well established law that, in all actions on joint contracts, the plaintiff is compelled to bring his action against all the parties thereto, and must recover judgment against all the joint contractors or none. 1 Ch. Pleadings, 32, 33, 38 and 546. 3 Term Rep. 782. 1 Hen. and Munf., 62. 3 Munf., 187. 2 Maul. and 536 Selwyn, 23. 2 Randolph, 446, 478, 174, 313. 2 Day's Rep., 387. 1 Hen. Blackstone, 108. 1 Saund. 207, note 2.

The only exception to this general rule or canon of the law of contracts is, where one of the joint contractors pleads some plea which goes to his personal discharge; such as bankruptcy, ne unques executors and the like, and not to the action of the writ. In cases of the latter character the plaintiff may recover against the remaining joint contractors who are not by act and operation of law discharged from the action. 1 Saund. Rep., 207, note 2. It is the practice in England, even in the case of bankruptcy or infancy, to require all the joint contractors to be sued. Bevil v. Wood, 2 Maul. & Selwin, 23. Mr. Justice Johnson, in the case of Miner v. Bank of Alexandria, 1 Peters' S. C. Rep., 81, says "It cannot be questioned that a joint contract by several, where all remain equally bound, all in life and all within reach of the process, more especially where they have been all actually arrested, the plaintiff must recover against all or none." This is that case; all were bound, all within reach of the process, and all served. Still more; the plaintiffs show, by their own pleadings, that they are not entitled to recover, for they declare against them all jointly, and take a judgment against one by default, and subsequently dismiss as to the others. Saddler v. Houston, 5 Stew. & Porter, 205. Jenkins v. Hunt, 2 Randolph, 446, 478, 174, 313.—2 Blackf., 121. 1 Stew. & Porter, 189, 62, 130.

It may be said that the plaintiffs in error in this case, who were also plaintiffs in the court below, are not entitled to reverse a judgment which they have erroneously taken. In reply to that we say:

1. That the plaintiffs are not to suffer for the errors, mistakes and inattention of their attorney. See the case of Holker et al. v. Parker, 2 Cond. Rep. S. C. U. S.

2. That nothing is more frequent than a resort to an appellate court by those who are injured by improvidently taking an erroneous judgment. To this point Geecher's case, reported in 8 Coke, 58, Croke James, 211, is direct and positive. That was a suit upon a bond, and a nolle prosequi was entered by the plaintiff. On a second action upon the same contract it was held to be a bar, and it became necessary to remove the judgment by a writ of error for some technical information, before the obligee could recover on the original contract. Croke James, 211. The case at bar is that case. An unproductive and erroneous judgment stands in the way of a recovery on the original contract. The plaintiffs have been grievously in- 537
jured by the unskilfulness of their attorney. This unskilfulness is now used to defeat a just demand. The record shows manifest error, and this court is now appealed to, for the purpose of removing the impediment to a just recovery and promoting the ends of justice.

Archer, for defendant in error.

Opinion by Chief Justice DOUGLAS:

This suit was instituted in the late Superior Court of Leon County by Lewis Hale, Michael Ferrall, and Thomas M. Crowell, against Richard H. Bradford, Edward Bradford and Richard H. Crowell, upon the joint bond of the defendants, (in the court below, for the sum of thirteen hundred dollars, payable to the plaintiffs. Process was sued out against and duly served upon all of the said defendants, and the declaration filed in the case is in the usual form in debt, charging all the defendants jointly. Judgment by default for want of plea, was rendered against Richard H. Crowell only, for the said sum of thirteen hundred dollars debt, and one hundred and ninety-four dollars and seventy cents, making together the sum of fourteen hundred and ninety-four dollars and seventy cents and costs, &c.—Whether on motion of the attorney for the plaintiffs or not, the record does not state; but it shows that he was present, and he seems to have acquiesced in it, for immediately after it was entered, the suits against Richard H. Bradford and Edward Bradford were dismissed "by consent of parties, by their attorneys." Since the rendition of said judgment, the defendant, Richard H. Crowell, has departed this life, and this suit is prosecuted by the plaintiffs in error, (who were also plaintiffs in the court below,) to reverse their own judgment, on the ground that it was improvidently taken by their attorney, and tends greatly to their injury. The error assigned is, that the bond sued on was the joint bond of three persons, and the judgment was taken by default against one only of the joint obligors, and the proceedings were dismissed, as to the other joint obligors. The defendant in error appears by her counsel, but makes no objction.

That a party may resort to a Court of Error, to obtain the reversal of his own judgment, if it has been so rendered that he may sustain injury by it, is a principle too well settled to be now contested. Johnson v. Jebb, 3d Burr Reps., 1772. 2 Eng. Comm. Law cases, 255, is a leading case upon this subject, and it was likewise so held by this Court, in the case of Ward and May v. Bull and Shine, 1 Florida 538
Reps., 275, where a number of authorities in point are cited, but a number more might be added; it is also laid down in 2 Tidd's Pr., 1134, and 1 Archbold Pr., 232. The only opinion is, whether this is a case proper for the application of the principle, and we think it is. In Capron v. Von Noorden, 2 Cranch, 126, 1 Peters' Cond. Reps., 370, Mr. Capron (who was plaintiff below) sued out a writ of error, and assigned for error that the record did not show that the Circuit Court had jurisdiction, the parties not being described so as to show they were within the provisions of the act of Congress. "The only question submitted to the court was, whether the plaintiff could assign as error his own omissions and irregularities in the pleadings. The defendant did not appear, but the citation being duly served, the judgment was reversed." The rule that a party shall not take advantage of an error for his benefit does not apply to errors of the Court, as where it pronounces a wrong judgment. Cross v. The United States, 1 Gallison's Reps. 26. In the case of Teal v. Russell, et al., 2 Scammon, 319, 321, it was held that where an action is brought against several, and a plea is filed as to one, and the default of the others is entered, it is erroneous to take final judgment against them until the plea is disposed of. The court say, "it was clearly erroneous in the Circuit Court to render a judgment against McClure and Russell, during the pendency of the plea filed by Peyton. If issue had been joined on that plea, the proper course would have been to have sworn a jury, as well to try the issue joined as to assess the damages, as to those who had suffered the default. Until the plea filed by Peyton was disposed of, no judgment could regularly be entered against the other defendants; and although the judgment against McClure and Russell was in favor of Teal, yet the law is well settled that the plaintiff may have his own judgment reversed. Judgment reversed." In Jones et al. v. Wright et al., 4 Scammon, 338, 339, Catron, Justice, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "This suit was brought against Wright and Jackson on a promissory note, process was served on both the defendants, and Jackson appeared and pleaded the general issue. At a subsequent term, without noticing this plea, a judgment by default was taken against him, the damages assessed, and execution awarded. Afterwards Wright appeared, and filed a plea, on which issue was taken, and a jury called, when the plaintiff submitted to non suit as to him. Execu-539 tion had been issued against Jackson, and returned 'nulla bona.'—To reverse this judgment against Jackson, the plaintiffs have prosecuted this writ of error, that they may commence their action anew." The question was, whether the plaintiffs could obtain a reversal of their own judgment, and after citing Capron v. Van Noorden, 2 Cranch, 126, Teal v. Russell, et al., 2 Scam., 321, Johnson v. Jebb, 3 Burr, 1772, and 2 Tidd's Practice, 1134, the court proceeded: "Without going further into the authorities, it is clear that a plaintiff may obtain a reversal of his own judgment, for irregularities which may have intervened in the court below, in order that he may commence another suit, and obtain a regular and valid judgment, as well as where errors have been committed against him."—And Beecher v. Shirley, reported in 8 Coke, 58, and Croke James 211, also sustains this principle.

Another question presented for our consideration is, what was the effect of rendering judgment against Richard H. Crowell only, and then dismissing as to the two Bradfords. It is to be recollected that Crowell could not have pleaded a non-joinder of parties, because when the judgment against him was rendered they were parties to the suit, and such a plea would have been contradicted by the record. In Sadler et al. v. Houston and Gillespie, 1 Stewart and Porter, 206, service of the writ was effected on both the defendants. "There does not," said Ch. J. Lipscomb, "appear to have been any appearance, unless we can infer the presence of the defendants, from the manner in which the clerk has entered the judgment." The case is first stated of Houston and Gillespie against both defendants; he then goes on to say, "the parties appeared by their attorneys, and the said plaintiff dismissed his suit against the said Mary Sadler, and the said defendant said nothing in bar, &c., concluding a judgment of nihil dicit in the usual form. The error assigned is in entering up judgment against one only, after having discontinued against the other defendant, who had been in court as co-defendant."

"That such a discontinuance is error and fatal, has been ruled (said the Chief Justice) by a series of decisions in this court, and it will be only necessary to refer to the cases. The case of Smith v. Hill, 1 Stewart and Porter, 62. Adkin v. Allen, ibid 130. Brahan v. Johnson, ibid, 189. Roberts v. Johnson, 2 Stewart, 13, and Thompson v. Saffold, et al., 2 Stewart, 494. The principle (he says) is acknowledged in all these cases, and we are fully satisfied 540 of its soundness." And if it is thus conclusive, where the suit was dismissed as to some of the joint obligors, or contractors, before judgment against the others, "a fortiori," it must be so, where the judgment is first rendered against one obligor, and the suit is afterwards dismissed as to the others. In King's administrators, v. Anthony, 2 Blackford, 131, the court held, that "if the plaintiff in an action against two, proceed to judgment against one alone, and the record do not contain a return of the writ that the other had not been found, and a suggestion of such return, the judgment will be reversed in error." In Jenkins v. Hart's Commissioners, 2 Rand. 447, the Court held, that in a joint action upon a joint contract, (the very case at bar,) the plaintiff must have judgment against all the defendants, or he can have judgments against none. In the case of Newnan v. Graham, 3 Mum., 187, 188, the Court of Appeals of Virginia, upon the authority of the case of Leftwick v. Berkley, 1 Hen. & Mum., 62, held, "that in an action of debt against one obligor only, if the declaration describe the bond as joint, and do not state the other obligor to be dead, it is a fatal error, though not pleaded in abatement, and is not cured by verdict." That case is analogous to the case at bar in this, that the defendant did not crave oyer of the bond, but a copy of it was nevertheless annexed to the transcript of the record by the clerk, as in this case. But there is an essential difference between them in this: the bond in that case (as shown by the copy) was joint and several—while in this it is joint only: in that the defendant appeared and pleaded—in this, there was judgment by default. The court decided the case according to the showing of it, which the plaintiff had made in his declaration, and so we deem it proper to decide this.

A nolle prosequi, or dismission, is simply an agreement not to proceed further in the suit, as to the particular person, or cause of action. 2 Saunders' Reps. 207, note 2, and authorities there cited.

Holker et al, v. Parker, 7 Cranch, 436, 2 Peters' Cond. Reps., 560, is cited as an authority to show that plaintiffs should not be permitted to suffer, on account of the errors or mismanagement of their attorney. But the case of Beecher v. Shirley, 8 Coke, 58, and Croke James, 211, above cited, is an authority more directly in point. That was a suit upon a bond; the defendant, Shirley, pleaded payment, and it was found for him; but the court being in doubt upon a point of law which arose in the case, after divers motions, the plaintiff, Beecher was content that a discontinuance should be entered, but by the 541 negligence of his attorney, a judgment was entered, which it became necessary for him to remove by writ of error, before the obligee could recover on the original contract. He sued out a writ of error, which was sustained, and the judgment was reversed. That is precisely the case before us. Here an erroneous judgment, improvidently taken, as appears by the attorney of the plaintiffs, stands in the way of a recovery, (or is calculated at least to embarrass the plaintiffs very much in a suit) upon the original contract; the plaintiffs having been injured by the unskilfulness of their attorney, there is manifest error in the record. The judgment of the court below is, therefore, reversed, but at the cost of the plaintiffs.

Per curiam.

JOHN B. DOGGETT, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, vs. MARCELLUS JORDAN, DEFENDANT IN ERROR.

It is erroneous so to instruct or charge a jury, as to leave the whole case to the opinion of the jury, without reference to the testimony. If a charge is so framed, the jury may suppose that they are at liberty to find their verdict upon what they know of the case, irrespective of the evidence before them.

The question whether a partnership exists between parties, is a question of fact for the jury to determine, upon the evidence adduced, under the instruction of the court, if asked, as to what, in law, constitutes a partnership. It is error to tell the jury that a partnership exists, and that a defendant is liable in consequence of such partnership. Such a charge is erroneous, because it is both as to the law and the fact, and the court is, therefore, not warranted in giving it.

The jury should be told by the court that they are the sole judges of the facts, and that it is not only their right but their duty to find according to their own views of the proofs before them, regardless of any opinion the court may entertain in reference to such proofs.

A charge to the jury upon the facts of the case is in violation of the express provisions of the act of the General Assembly of January 3, 1848, entitled "An act to amend the several acts regulating judicial proceedings."

It is error not to reduce to writing the charge given by the Court upon the law of 542 the case. The act of January 3d 1848 makes it the duty of the judge presiding upon the trial of common law causes to charge the jury only upon the law of the case, and points out the manner of such charge, and directs that it shall be wholly in writing.

Error to Leon County Circuit Court.

This was an action assumpsit, brought by Jordan against John B. Doggett and Henry Doggett, in the Circuit Court of Leon county, claiming the sum of one thousand dollars, for services as an overseer, alleged to have been rendered the defendants in the years 1843 and 1844, at a plantation in Leon county, called the Black Creek plantation. Henry Doggett was not served with process, but the plaintiff, under the provision of the judiciary act of this State, elected to proceed against John B. Doggett, who was served. The cause was tried before the Hon. THOMAS BALTZELL, at the Spring Term of the Circuit Court of the county of Leon, 1848.

The bill of exceptions shows the following state of facts, as proved at the trial. The plaintiff introduced a witness, who testified that he, plaintiff, was overseer on the Black Creek plantation, which belonged, to Henry Doggett, during the years 1843 and 1844. That John B. Doggett told witness that he had hired plaintiff to oversee said plantation—and that, since the commencement of this suit, he had told witness that he had hired plaintiff for his uncle, Henry Doggett. That John B. Doggett, so far as witness knew, had no interest other than eight hands working on the plantation, and that he informed witness that these were placed there to help his uncle to work out of debt. Witness also proved that plaintiffs' services as overseer were worth $400 or $500 per annum.

Plaintiff here rested his case, and introduced no other testimony.

Defendant then proved by Hardy Gaskins, a witness called to testify on the part of defendant, that he was present in the State of North Carolina, in 1842, when Henry Doggett employed plaintiff as an overseer for his Black Creek plantation—John B. Doggett was not present. That plaintiff continued in the employment of Henry Doggett during the years 1842, 1843, and 1844; but that in the latter part of the year 1844, he was engaged on another plantation.—That plaintiff complained to witness in the spring of 1845, that Henry Doggett had left Florida for North Carolina, without paying him for his services. Plaintiff made no allegation of any claim against Doggett vs. Jordan.—Argument of Counsel.

543 John B. Doggett at that time, nor did witness ever hear of any such claim until the commencement of this suit. Henry Doggett had forty hands, and John eight. That the plantation belonged to Henry—that John brought his hands to this country in 1842, and owned no land, so far as witness knew. That John lived on the plantation, and acted as the agent of his uncle.

Defendant proved by another witness, that in 1846, plaintiff had given him a draft on Henry Doggett, for some six or eight hundred dollars, which he requested witness to present to him in North Carolina, and collect if possible. That plaintiff at that time said nothing to witness about any liability of John B. Doggett to him.

James J. Barnes was sworn, and testified that he was employed to oversee the Black Creek plantation in 1844—that he was employed by Henry Doggett—that John B. Doggett's slaves were there, and workd as they had when plaintiff was overseer at that plantation—that witness never looked to John B. Doggett for his pay—that the plantation belonged to Henry, and that John acted as the agent of the old man.

Defendant also exhibited a receipt, dated in January, 1845, signed by plaintiff, for the sum of two hundred dollars paid him by Henry Doggett, in part payment of plaintiffs' services as overseer on the Black Creek plantation.

After argument of counsel, the court below charged the jury, as is set forth fully in the opinion pronounced by this court. To all which charge, and to the refusal of the court to give the instruction asked by defendant's counsel, (also stated in the opinion,) the defendant by his counsel excepted.

Branch for plaintiff in error:

The liability of John B. Doggett is alleged in the declaration to be joint with that of Henry Doggett.

The evidence, therefore, to entitle Jordan to recover in this action must show their joint promise or assumpsit, or it must arise from the fact that they were partners. The joint liability of John B. Doggett can in no other way be established, and the expression in the charge of the Court, "liable as partner or otherwise," can mean nothing more.

It is not pretended there was a joint promise, nor does the evi-544 dence in the remotest degree show there was; nor, indeed, is there evidence that John B. and Henry Dogggtt jointly mployed him, from which a joint promise or liability might be implied. Then as there was no joint promise, the only other way in which John B. Doggett can be made jointly liable is upon the presumption, which seems to have been adopted by the court, that there was a partnership.

To constitute John B. and Henry Doggett partners, there must have been a participation mutually in the profits. This is the test 3 Kent. Comm., 23, 25, 28. 2 Greenleaf's Ev., 393-'4-'5.

There is no evidence whatever that John B. Doggett ever received one cent of the profits, or anything else, or that there was any agreement that he should. The proof is, that he was merely an agent of his uncle, Henry Doggett, without any interest in the plantation or the profits thereof.

Nor is it pretended that either John B. or Henry Doggett ever held themselves out to the world as partners. The evidence is to the contrary, and shows that it was well known that they were not.

If, then, John B. Doggett was liable neither on a joint promise, nor as a partner, the court erred in instructing the jury that he was, and, a fortiori, that he was liable for the whole amount of Jordans' claim.

If the court should hold, that John B. Doggett was liable as a partner, then the judgment should have been against both, both being sued.

Upon either hypothesis, the judgment is erroneous—for if a partner, the judgment should have been against both, and joint; or if he was not a partner, the court erred in instructing the jury that he was liable for the whole claim.

If Jordan had a demand against John B. Doggett, for his care and diligence in overseeing his hands, he could not recover in this action but should have sued John B. Doggett individually, in a separate suit. This action is against John B. Doggett and Henry Doggett, on a joint liability, and a judgment could not be taken against one, on a separate and individual claim.

As to the effect of the receipt and draft given by Jordan on Henry Doggett, for the claim now sued for, the court should have instructed the jury that they were prima facie evidence that Jordan gave the credit to Henry Doggett alone, and that if he now sought to make John B. Doggett liable, he should explain or rebut their effect by other evidence. Instead of this, the court instructed the jury in such 545 a manner as to mislead their minds.

In relation to fourth error, see Acts of General Assembly, passed 1847-'8, page 12.

The court also erred in refusing to give the instruction asked by defendant's counsel. Possession of personal property is ordinarily evidence of title. But where the property is admitted to be in another, the only inference from the lawful possession of negroes, is that the party in whose possession they are either hired them from the owner, or that they were loaned to him.

In this case, the property in the eight negroes was admitted to be in John B. Doggett, and the possession of Henry Doggett to be lawful. Is it not, then, a legitimate presumption, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that John B. Doggett's negroes were hired by Henry Doggett?

One thing, however, is certain—that the possession of John B. Doggett's negroes by Henry Doggett, or the fact that they were at work on Henry's plantation, does not, per se or prima facie, make John and Henry partners. If it did, persons hiring out their negroes would run great risks by being, without their knowledge or consent, made partners of persons totally insolvent, and, as in this case, might subject themselves to heavy losses.

Long & Walker for defendant in error:

This was an action of assumpsit brought by plaintiff against John B. Doggett and Henry Doggett, to recover compensation for services alleged to have been rendered as overser on a plantation, called the "Black Creek plantation," in the years 1843 and 1844. Process was not served on Henry Doggett, and the sheriff having returned that he did not reside in Leon county, the cause proceeded against John B. Doggett alone. See Thompson's Digest, 327, sec. 3. 9 Mass. R., 300.

The substance of the charge of the court, as we understand it, was that if the jury believed from the evidence that the plaintiff had rendered services to John B. Doggett and Henry Doggett jointly, and had not agreed to look to Henry Doggett alone for payment, then that John B. Doggett was jointly liable for the whole amount of the plaintiff's wages. See Addison on Contracts, 214, 876, 880. 9 Mass. R., 300. If this position be correct, then the first and second 546 errors are not well assigned.

The third error assigned we think is founded in mistake of fact.—It will be seen by reference to the testimony of Gaskins that the plaintiff had charge of the Black Creek Plantation for Henry Doggett alone in 1842, before John B. Doggett brought his negroes to this country. It was in part payment of the wages of that year that the two hundred dollars mentioned in the receipt was paid. The order sent by Daffin to North Carolina was for the balance due for 1842, and also for services rendered to Henry Doggett alone on his Jefferson county plantation, in 1844. The verdict of the Jury was for services rendered to John B. Doggett and Henry Doggett jointly on the Black Creek plantation, in 1843. 5 Mass., 196.

The fourth error assigned is also founded in a misapprehension of the facts. The court did reduce to writing every thing it charged "as to the law of partnership."

It is deemed a sufficient answer as to the sixth error assigned, to say that it was the duty of the jury to draw their own presumptions from the testimony before them.

In answer to the seventh assignment we say that the refusal to grant a new trial was matter of practice which cannot be assigned for error in this court, and if it could be, no sufficient ground for a new trial was shown.

Opinion by Chief Justice DOUGLAS:

This suit was instituted in the Leon Circuit Court by Marcellus Jordan, the plaintiff in the court below, against John B. Doggett, the plaintiff in error, and Henry Doggett, against whom summons ad respondendum issued, which was returned by the sheriff endorsed in these words: "Executed by serving a copy hereof on John B. Doggett—Henry Doggett does not reside in this county."

The declaration contains several counts in assumpsit; all in the usual form, upon a claim for services charged to have been rendered by the said Marcellus Jordan to the said John B. Doggett and Henry Doggett, as overseer of a plantation. To which declaration the said John B. Doggett put in a plea of non assumpsit and issue was joined therepuon, and the case was submitted to a jury who returned a verdict for the plaintiff and assessed his damage at fourteen hundred and eighteen dollars, for which sum a judgment was entered, and that judgment has been brought up to this court by writ of error.

The record contains a bill of exceptions that sets forth the evidence adduced to the jury, and goes on to state that "after argument of counsel the court instructed the jury that, if they were of opinion that the negroes proved to be owned by John B. Doggett were actually hired to Henry Doggett, and the former was agent of the latter merely, they will find for the defendant.

"If the jury shall be of opinion that there was no hiring, then that, in general, the liability of a party depends upon services rendered to him. That, in this case, if the services were rendered in the care and management of eight negroes belonging to John B. Doggett, with forty belonging to Henry Doggett, on the plantation of the latter, John B. Doggett was responsible to the plaintiff to the extent of his interest, certainly. Whether liable to the extent of the claim as partner, or otherwise, is a question of greater difficulty; but the court inclines to the opinion that he is, and so instructs the jury. This is the general rule, and its operation may be avoided by evidence that the plaintiff agreed to look to one of the parties and not to the other for payment, and that a receipt in part payment to one of the parties does not confine the liability to him nor prevent the operation of the contract as to the other."

The court, further, as to the responsibility of John B. Doggett as part owner of the negroes, informing them as to the law of partnership, instructed the jury, "if they were satisfied that defendant and Henry Doggett were partners in the business of farming, then the defendant was responsible, as a partner, to the plaintiff, jointly with Henry Doggett, for the services rendered."

The following are the errors assigned, to wit:

First. The court erred in instructing the jury that John B. Doggett was liable for any part of Jordan's claim as overseer.

Second. The court erred in instructing the jury that John B. Doggett was liable, as partner or otherwise, for the whole of Jordan's claim.

Third. The court erred in instructing the jury that Jordan has a right to look to John B. Doggett for his pay as overseer, after he, Jordan, had recognized Henry Doggett as his sole debtor, by receipting to said Henry Doggett for part of his pay and drawing a draft on him for the same; and in not instructing the jury that such receipt and draft were prima facie evidence that Jordan recognized only Henry Doggett as his debtor and looked to him alone for pay.

Fourth. The court erred in not reducing to writing and incorporating in his charge to the jury what it instructed the jury "as to the law of partnership."

Fifth. The court erred in entering judgment against John B. Doggett alone, if John B. Doggett was liable as a partner of Henry Doggett.

The sixth it is not deemed necessary to notice, and the seventh and last was abandoned at the argument of the cause.

The first and second may well be considered together, for although the latter is somewhat more extensive than the former, both are deemed erroneous and for similar reasons. They are both founded upon that part of the charge in which the court instructed the jury that, "if the jury shall be of opinion that there was no hiring, then that, in general, the liability of a party depends upon services rendered to him; that, in this case, if the services were rendered in the care and management of eight negroes belonging to John B. Doggett, with forty belonging to Henry Doggett, on the plantation of the latter, John B. Doggett is responsible to plaintiff to the extent of his interest certainly. Whether liable to the extent of the claim, as partner or otherwise, is a question of greater difficulty; but the court inclines to the opinion that he is, and so instructs the jury."

The first thing which presents itself to our notice in this charge is, that the whole matter appears to have been left to the opinion of the jury, without any reference to the testimony. There are few points upon which jurors are more apt to mistake, than in supposing that they may find their verdict upon their own knowledge of the case, acquired before they took their seats in the jury box. We presume this was an inadvertence of the learned judge who tried this cause, as it is one that often happens in other courts, and it may have had no material bearing in this case; but we can readily imagine cases where thus to charge might have a very injurious effect, and have therefore deemed it not amiss to mention it, en passant, as we think care should always be taken to instruct the jury that they must base their verdict upon the evidence adduced before them. "The jurors are triers of the facts not upon their own personal knowledge," but from the evidence thus adduced. Clark v. Robinson, 5 B. Monroe's Reps., 55. 2 Supp. to the U. S. Digest, 763, No. 232. The United States vs. Fourteen packages, &c., Gilpin's C. C. Rep., 235. 1 Starkie on Ev., 405. 3 Black. Comm., 374.

Again, the jury were charged in substance that, if there was no hiring in the case, if the services were rendered in the care and management of eight negroes belonging to John B. Doggett, with forty belonging to Henry Doggett, on the plantation of the latter, John B. Doggett was responsible to the extent of his interest certainly.—This, however, we think does not necessarily follow. The eight negroes might have been lent by John B. Doggett to Henry Doggett as an act of kindness by the former to the latter, or Henry Doggett might have held them as guardian of John B. Doggett, or, indeed as a mere wrong doer, or in some one of various other ways that may be imagined, without rendering John B. Doggett liable to the plaintiff for overseer's wages.

But the Court added "Whether liable to the extent of the claim, as partner or otherwise, is a question of greater difficulty; but the Court inclines to the opinion that he is, and so instructs the jury." This is the first time in the whole case that anything is said in the record about a partnership. The defendants were not sued or declared against as partners, and the testimony, the whole of which is set out in the bill of exceptions, no where speaks of them as partners.—Yet it was not only left to the jury to find that John B. Doggett was liable to the whole extent of the claim as such partner, but they were expressly charged that he was so liable, or otherwise.

The most objectionable feature, however, in this instruction is, that it is compounded of both law and facts. For instance, whether a partnership existed, or not, between John B. Doggett and Henry Doggett, at the time when the services sued for in this action were rendered, was a question for the Jury to determine upon the facts of the case, under the instructions of the Court, if instructions were asked as to what in law constituted a partnership: but here the fact of partnership is assumed by the Court and the jury specially instructed that the defendant, John B. Doggett, is liable, and thus to assume (where, as in this case, if there was any evidence of partnership it was very slight, wholly inferential, the fact contested and the testimony contradictory,) and to charge both upon the law and the fact was erroneous. McRea v. Smith, 4 Rand. Reps., 463. Plater v. Scott, 6 Gill & John Rep., 116. Fowler v. Lee, 4 Munf. Rep., 373. McEldery v. Hannagan, 1 Harr. & Gill Rep., 308. Kendall v. Hughes, 7 B. Monroe's Reps., 371. It is true that the court further, as to the responsibility of John B. Doggett as part owner of the negroes, informing the jury as to the law of partnership, instructed them that, if they were satisfied that defendant and Henry Doggett were partners in the business of farming, then defendant was responsible as a partner to the plaintiff, jointly with Henry Doggett, for the services rendered;" but they had been, as we have seen, expressly charged before that he was so liable; and they were not, in the further instruction, informed that they were the sole judges of the facts, and that they had not only a right, but that it was their duty to find their verdict according to their own understanding of the proofs adduced in the cause, whatever views the court might entertain in regard to them. And besides, they had also been before especially charged that, if John B. Doggett was not liable to the whole extent of the claim, as partner of Henry Doggett, he was liable otherwise to that extent; so that the jury could not have found any other than a verdict for the plaintiff for his whole claim, without disregarding the instructions of the court, as they appear in the record. Perhaps, if the portion of them which was verbally given had been reduced to writing and filed, we might have found it a proper explanation of the whole matter; but unfortunately that was not done and we are compelled to decide the case upon the record as it is presented to us, and that shows a charge to the jury upon the facts of the case, which is against the express provisions of the act of the General Assembly of January 3, 1848, "To amend the several acts regulating judicial proceedings," Pamph. Laws of 1848, page 12, by which it is made the duty of the judge to charge the jury only upon the law of the case. In Reel v. Reel, 2 Hawk's N. Ca. Reps., 85, there was a motion for a new trial on the ground that the court intimated its opinion to the jury on the matter in issue. Taylor, Chief Justice, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The act of Assembly relative to the duty of a judge charging forbids him to give an opinion whether a fact is fully or sufficiently proved, such matter being the true office and province of a jury. It is not for this court to discuss the wisdom or expediency of the law, or to pervert its true construction under a belief that no mischief can be produced thereby, or even that justice can be more substantially administered." A new trial was therefore awarded. The 9th section of the 6th article of the constitution of Tennessee provides: "That judges shall not charge the jury with 551 respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony;" and under this provision the Supreme Court of that State, in the case of Ivey v. Hodges, 4 Humph. Reps., 154, held "That the judge had no right to declare what is proved, but simply to state what is sworn to; that the truth of the statements of witnesses and the deductions to be drawn therefrom must be left to the jury." Cited in 1 Supp. to the U. S. Dig., page 170, No. 294.

The facts should be left to the jury whose peculiar province it is to say what effect they shall have. 10 Peters' S. C. Reps., 98. It is the province of the jury to weigh and decide on the sufficiency of the evidence. Greenleaf v. Birth, 9 Peters' S. C. Reps., 299.

As to the third error assigned we think that the receipt and draft therein mentioned should have been left to the jury with the other evidence in the cause, as testimony conducing to prove that Jordan recognized only Henry Doggett as his debtor and looked to him only for pay.

The fourth error is undoubtedly well assigned. It is, that "The court erred in not reducing to writing and incorporating in its charge to the jury, what it instructed the jury 'as to the law of partnership.'"

The act above cited, sec. 1, provides: "That hereafter, upon the trial of all common law causes in the several courts of this State, it shall be the duty of the judge presiding on such trial, to charge the jury only upon the law of the case and in the manner following, that is to say, the said judge shall only charge the jury upon some points of law or exceptions to evidence arising on the trial of said causes; and said charge shall be wholly in writing." The second and third sections contain provisions on the subject not deemed material to the decision of this cause. But the fourth provides: "That all such instructions, as well those given as those denied, and also as well those prayed for by the parties as those declined by the said judge, shall be signed and sealed by the said judge and form a part of the record in the cause." In this case exceptions were taken to the whole of the charge, and that important portion of it does not appear. Yet the clerk of the court from which this record comes, has certified that it is a true transcript of the record and proceedings, &c. The provisions of the statute last mentioned are restrictive and mandatory, not merely directory; and whatever views we may entertain as to their wisdom or expediency, it is our duty to obey them, and a failure so to do is error.

The fifth error alleged seems to have been assigned under a mis-552 apprehension of the provisions of our judiciary act, the 12th section of which (Duval's Compilation, page 92, Thompson's Digest, p. 327, No. 2,) declares: "That when any original writ or summons has been sent out against two or more defendants, and returned by the sheriff or other officer served upon one or more of the defendants, and that the other defendants do not reside in said district or county, as the case may be, it shall be lawful for the plaintiff, at his option to proceed to judgment against those upon whom process has been served, or to obtain from the court time to perfect service, &c." We have seen that the summons in this case was issued against John B. Doggett and Henry Doggett, and that it was returned "served on John B. Doggett, and that Henry Doggett did not reside in this [Leon] county." This brings the case within the provisions of that statute; the plaintiff elected to proceed to judgment against John B. Doggett, the defendant upon whom process had been served, and we see no reasons to doubt his right to do so. The fifth error, therefore, is not sustained.

That errors should occasionally be committed by the most astute and able judges, in the hurry of the trial of cases at nisi prius, is a matter that need not excite surprise in the mind of any one. The only wonder is that they do not more frequently occur, and especially in the charge of the court to the jury, which must often be given immediately after the close of a long and tedious examination of testimony, complicated and perplexing, out of which important, difficult and not very familiar questions of law frequently arise. But when they do take place it is not therefore the less our duty to correct them. And here it may not be improper to remark that there are no two matters in the exercise of judicial authority, about which a judge should be more careful than in not permitting the jury to usurp the power of the court, to decide questions of law, and in not himself invading the province of the jury to respond to the facts of the case.

Believing that the facts of this case were not properly left to the jury, and that, if they had been so, the verdict might and probably would have been different, and the Judge having failed to reduce the whole of his charge to the jury in writing and file it, according to the requirements of the statute upon the subject, to which we have above referred, the judgment of the court below is reversed, the verdict to be set aside, a venire de novo awarded, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

Per curiam.

SAMUEL S. SIBLEY, APPELLANT, vs. MARIA, A WOMAN OF COLOR, 553
APPELLEE.

W. O., of South Carolina, devised the greater part of his real and personal estate to W. H. upon the condition that a certain slave and her four children, as his property and under his protection shall be allowed all the privileges of free persons in the State of South Carolina consistently with good order and a proper subordination, and shall be allowed out of the property devised to W. H., two hundred and fifty dollars each, to be paid them at such times and in such quantities as, in his judgment, will be most proper;—otherwise, they are to be taken to the State of Ohio, and the balance of the money, over and above what will be expended in their passage, to be paid to them there; and in case the said W. H. should refuse or neglect to comply with the conditions herein expressed, or should die without an heir, then, in either of these cases, all the interests, rights and emoluments left by the will to W. H., to go to J. H.

Held, first That W. H. takes the estate devised to him, subject to certain conditions subsequent, which, unless he performed, a limitation over to J. H. is created, and is termed a conditional limitation.

Second.—The testator by such a will, manifests unequivocally his intention that the slaves shall be free, and this is shown by the declaration that they shall enjoy all the privileges of free persons, &c., if they remain in the State—as well as by the wish expressed, that if they do not remain, they be taken to the State of Ohio.

Third.—A solemn trusts is clearly created by the terms of the will involving the freedom of slaves, and the greater part of the testator's estate is devised, subject to and conditioned upon this trust.

Fourth.—That portion of the will which provides that the slaves shall have the privileges of free persons is void, because it is a condition inconsistent with the gift, and incompatible with the relation of master and slave.

Fifth.—Such privileges would also be inconsistent with the laws and policy of South Carolina, where the will was made. This portion of the will could not, therefore, have been carried out.

Sixth.—The intention of the testator being to give the slaves their freedom could have been carried out by taking them beyond the limits of the State—there being at the time of the probate of the will no law to prevent it in South Carolina.

Seventh.—The taking of the slaves to Ohio, was regarded by the testator as a dernier means of giving them freedom. No rational intendment other than that of freedom can be made or inferred from the direction to remove them to Ohio, and to pay them money when there.

Eighth.—In the absence of any proof to the contrary, the presumption is, that the 554 devisee, executed and performed the trust reposed in him, the general rule being, that when a person is required to do a certain act, the omission of which would make him guilty of a culpable neglect of duty, it ought to be intended that he has duly performed it, unless the contrary be shown.

Ninth.—The will not having pointed out within what time the condition was to be performed, the law presumes that it must be done within a reasonable time.

Tenth.—If not performed within a reasonable time, then the ulterior legatee might claim the estate for condition broken—subject, however, in his hands, to the same condition.

The establishment of the right of the mother to freedom by the courts of Florida, does not infringe upon the policy of this State, owing to our statute in relation to the manumission of slaves, the presumption being that she was free when she came here.

This was an action of trespass, instituted by the appellee in the Circuit Court of Leon county, at the Spring term, 1847, for the purpose of establishing her right to freedom, under the will of William Oliphant, made in South Carolina in 1837, and admitted to probate in that State in 1838.

The defendant pleaded not guilty, and that plaintiff was a slave.

The case was tried at the Spring Term, 1848, before the Hon. THOMAS BALTZELL, Judge, presiding in said court.

After the proofs were submitted to the jury, and after argument of counsel, the court charged the jury as follows, viz:

That it was the duty of the executor under the will, to give freedom to the slave, according to its provisions, and that, in the absence of all testimony on the part of both plaintiff and defendant, as to the mode in which she has been held, or is now held, and after the lapse of time, the jury may infer that that duty was performed.

That the bequest of the will imposes a duty and trust, and the presumption of law is, that it has been performed.

That a fraudulent disposition, in opposition to and in defiance of the will, would not confer a right on defendant.

That the law of South Carolina having received a judicial construction by the courts of the State, their decision is conclusive in reference thereto, and according to that construction, the bequest gave clear and indisputable right of freedom to plaintiff.

Defendant by his counsel prayed the court to instruct the jury (among other charges asked,) that if they believed that emancipa-

555 tion was prohibited by the laws of South Carolina, (except by the Legislature,) at the time the will under which the plaintiff claims freedom was made, then plaintiff is not entitled to her freedom, and they should find for defendant." But the court refused to give the instruction asked, as well as others prayed by defendant. To which refusal, and to the instructions given, the defendant by his counsel excepted.

Papy, for appellant:

The right claimed by the appellee in this case is based upon the will of William Oliphant, executed in South Carolina in the year 1828.

It will be observed, by reference to the copy of this will to be found in the record, that there is no provision which expressly directs the appellee to be emancipated. She can, then, only claim by construction.

She is given to the legatee, W. H. Hollingsworth, as his property, but directs that she be permitted to enjoy the privileges of a free person. This direction is manifestly void, because it is a condition inconsistent with the gift. No person can be a slave, the property of another, and yet enjoy the privileges of a free person. Such a privilege is incompatible with the relation of master and slave, and with the rights, duties and reciprocal obligations resulting therefrom. If this provision, however, be considered as an indirect gift of freedom, it is void, because the laws of South Carolina of force when this will was executed, and when admitted to probate, prohibited emancipation of slaves, except by act of the Legislature. Courts of justice will not give effect to the provisions of a will, or deed, having for their object the evasion of the settled law and policy of a State.

It may, however, be insisted that the alternative part of the clause, "or otherwise to take them to the State of Ohio, and the balance of the money bequeathed (to the slaves) to be paid them there," is sufficiently explicit to obviate the difficulty presented by the statutes of South Carolina. But this is left at the option of the legatee. He could adopt either the first or the latter part of the clause.

But the will does not direct what shall be done with them, after they reach Ohio. In order, therefore, for this court to establish the claim set up by the appellee, they must (there being no evidence of 556 the fact) take judicial notice that the laws of the State of Ohio prohibited domestic slavery when this will was executed, and by construction, determine that the design of Oliphant was to have the appellee emancipated when she arrived there.

But conceding that the effect of the will is an express direction to take the appellee to Ohio, and there set her free, how is it to be enforced?—at whose instance? It is very clear that as long as the appellee remained in South Carolina, where the provisions of no will emancipating a slave could operate, or in any of the slave-holding States, (so far as her rights under this will are concerned,) she could not be free, because, if she obtained her freedom at all, it could only have been by operation of law prohibiting slavery in the State to which she might have been taken, as there is no express direction to manumit her. If this be true, and it seems to be a proposition too plain to require illustration, she must still be a slave, and must continue to be, until she is taken to a free State, with a view to free her, or until she is emancipated in the manner prescribed by law. And if she is now a slave, she has no status in court. In contemplation of law, slaves are mere chattels, things. They have no civil rights—they can hold no property, nor can they bring a suit—they can acquire no right which does not, in the instant it is acquired, pass to the master. The courts cannot interfere to compel Wm. H. Hollingsworth to perform the trust in this case, at the instance of this party, because to do so, they would be recognizing a person unknown to the law.

In the case of Frazier v. Frazier, 2 Hill's Ch. Reps., 316, which, it seems, governed, in a great degree, the decision of this case in the court below, the principle just contended for is admitted, but the court in that case decide in effect that as the bill was filed by the heirs to partition the slaves, the court would, if on looking into the will they find that the executors could execute it, by sending the slaves out of the State, order them to discharge the trust. In that case too, there was an express direction to the executors to take the slaves to San Domingo and emancipate them, and the executors had seized the slaves for the purpose of carrying out the will. But it will be perceived that even there the slaves were not emancipated, but were directed to be taken out of the State, as expressed in the will.

It will be seen, however, by a further examination of the will, that, in the event of the failure of the first legatee to perform the conditions annexed to the bequest to him, the testator bequeathes the es- 557 tate given to him to John H. Hollingsworth, without any condition or limitation expressed. The effect of this whole clause taken together, conceding that the conditions attached to the bequest to Wm. H. Hollingsworth were valid and binding to vest in John H. Hollingsworth the title to the property bequeathed, as if given to him originally, upon the neglect or refusal of Wm. H. Hollingsworth to comply with the conditions adverted to.

John H. Hollingsworth, then, had the right in such event to claim the property, and in that case no provision is made in reference to the appellee. It is conceived that in such case the appellee would either fall into the residuum of the estate of the testator, or would be included in the property going over to John H. Hollingsworth. Whether, therefore, the conditions annexed to the bequest to Wm. H. Hollingsworth are void, or whether, upon the neglect or refusal to comply therewith, if valid, the property vested in John H. Hollingsworth, in neither event is the appellee entitled to recover.

If this case is to be decided as if it were now pending in the Courts of South Carolina, even, if there was a direct and express injunction to carry the appellee out of the State into a free State, and there emancipate her, it could not be done, because by an act of the Legislature of that State, passed in 1841, it is expressly forbidden for executors to carry out such direction in a will, and the courts there have decided that the law adverted to operates as well upon wills executed and not carried into effect before the passage of the act as after. 1 Richardson's Eq. Rep., 65. 2 Richardson's Eq. Rep., 43.

But if it be insisted that this case must be decided by the laws of this State as they now exist, it will be seen, by reference to Thompson's Digest, page 533, that certain pre-requisites are necessary, in order to manumit a slave here. No slave can acquire her freedom in any other wise. In this case, there is no one to perform the requirements of the law. Let it be recollected that, under the will, the appellee could not be emancipated, except by operation of law in the State to which she might be taken, and if not until then, she must still be a slave. Now, then, can the court listen to her claim, against the consent of the party holding her as a slave, and grant her freedom before the right of emancipation is vested.

It would only be necessary for a person desiring to emancipate a slave in this State to go into an adjoining State, whose laws permit 558 it, and there, by deed or otherwise, manumit her, deliver her into the possession of another, have her brought here and sue for freedom, in order to evade the law which requires all persons desiring to manumit a slave to give bond to send such slave out of the State within thirty days.

These laws in relation to emancipation are founded in high public policy, and are enacted to preserve the institutions peculiar to the Southern States. Courts of justice are careful not to countenance any attempt to evade them, and will not give their sanction to any efforts to render them nugatory by schemes, however artfully concontrived, to set them at defiance.

It is better even that cases of transient injustice should be endured, than that the general law and policy of the country should be disturbed.

The court below charged the jury, that there being no evidence of the manner in which the appellee was held, the presumption arises, that Wm. H. Hollingsworth discharged the trust in the will to set her free, and that, therefore, she was entitled to her freedom. But with all deference to that court, how could such presumption arise, in the face of the fact that she was held as a slave, admitted by the very suit itself, and that the laws of this State and of South Carolina forbid emancipation, except under certain forms?

The only way in which the appellee could have been freed under this will, was to have been taken to Ohio with that view—and if she had been so taken, she would not now be in Florida, or if she were here, she could only be so as a slave. Thompson's Digest, 533. The presumption, then, of her present freedom, cannot arise in any view of the case; nor can the principle that the presumption of law is always in favor of liberty be invoked here. That principle had its origin in a country where slavery was and is unknown. The institution of slavery in the Southern States is unlike the systems of feudalism and villainage in England. It is more like the slavery of the Greeks and Romans, where the slaves, as our slaves, had no legal rights or privileges whatever, with the exception that here they are protected by our laws from the cruelty to which the Roman slaves were exposed.

In the States of this Union where slavery exists, the black complexion affords a presumption of slavery, and a black person will so 559 be regarded until the contrary is shown. 2 Halsted, 253. 2 Bibb, 238. The presumption of law, in favorem libertatis, instead of having any application in this case, is entirely reversed. The presumption being against the appellee, arising from her complexion, it devolves upon her to prove her right to freedom, by proper and legal testimony. This, I apprehend, cannot be done, unless she can show that she was taken to the State of Ohio, or any other free State, with the view of emancipating her, and that her right to freedom vested accordingly.

If, however, under the most favorable view, the appellee is entitled to have the trust in the will carried out, the utmost she can claim is to have her sent to Ohio; and in that case, it being a trust, a court of law cannot afford relief, but she must resort to a Court of Chancery.

Woodward, for appellee:

This is a suit for freedom, under the will of William Oliphant, of South Carolina, made October 13, 1827, admitted to probate, January 20, 1828.

The clause containing the bequest of freedom is in the alternative, to wit: "The privileges of free persons of color, consistently with good order and subordination—or otherwise, to take them to the State of Ohio."

The object of the will is the freedom of the slave.

The instructions of the court are sustained by law.

1. As to the duty of the executor.
2. The presumption of its performance.
3. The fraud of dereliction.
4. The judicial decisions of a State being the best exposition of its laws.

The counsel cited and commented on the authorities adduced by him in reference to the instructions given by the court below, and then proceeded to establish the following propositions:

I.—A will takes effect from the death of the testator—rights under it accrue from that time. How, then, can a bequest revert to the testator, 'eo instanti"—it is passing away from him forever.

II.—It is only our own slaves that are bound to conform to our emancipation laws. Those of other States to theirs.

560 III.—The right to freedom being vested by the will, at the death of the testator, a law declaring emancipation illegal can have only a prospective operation.

IV.—Emancipation not being inhibited by the laws of South Carolina—ergo, a provision thereof by will is NOT VOID.

V.—An act of the Legislature was not essential to emancipation, if the slave were to be removed beyond the borders of the State, and only in that event, claiming to be free.

VI.—The executor was bound to adopt the alternative which should effectuate the testator's will—his will was the freedom of this slave—removal to Ohio the only certain mode of accomplishing the purpose, if the other were impracticable, or having been attempted, had failed. This being the duty of the executor, it is equally incumbent upon the legatee, because expressly enjoined.

VII.—The omission, neglect, or refusal to remove the slave to Ohio, constitutes the fraud, against which the courts will relieve—it is the very gravamen of the wrong, for which this suit is seeking redress.

The appellee had a right to resort to a Court of Equity in South Carolina, for the enforcement of her claim. She is equally entitled to assert it in this form of action here. That court would have compelled performance by the executor, or legatee—this court can adjudge her rights in the only mode in which they can be practically exhibited in the tribunals of this State.

The assertion of a purely personal right can be restricted only by want of jurisdiction over the person against whom, or the subject matter in reference to which, it is urged. In this case, jurisdiction over the subject-matter and the person is not only unquestionable and conceded, but it is such as our courts are bound to entertain.

To sustain these propositions, the counsel cited the following authorities, viz: 1 Leigh, 465. 4 J. J. Mar., 370. 2 J. J. Mar., 475. 3 Leigh, 8, 9, 11. 2 Leigh, 189, 192, 193. 2 Hill's Ch., 303, 313. 1 Peters, 680. 2 Peters, 220, 37, 38. 2 Phillips, 296, 297, 298, 301, 302, 307, 368. 6 Con. Rep., 445. 19 Johns., 345. 2 Cowan, 285.

Duval, also for appellee, supported the views taken by Mr. Woodward, and urged her right to freedom.

Opinion by Justice HAWKINS:

This was an action of trespass brought by the appellee, Maria, a 561 woman of color, against Sibley, who claims her as a slave.

To sustain the action, the will of William Oliphant,, of Edgefield District, South Carolina, was introduced, the plaintiff claiming her freedom by virtue of a clause contained in it in the following words, to wit:

"Item 16th, and lastly, I give and bequeath to my nephew, William C. Hollingsworth, all the remaining part of my estate, both real and personal, including my interest in a house and lot in the city of Augusta, in the State of Georgia, after my lawful debts are paid out of it. I give and bequeath to him a life estate in my tract of land known by the name of my Turkey Creek place, and at his death that it shall descend to his legal heirs in fee simple; all the rest of my real estate I give and bequeath to him and his heirs forever, together with all my personal estate not otherwise disposed of, and under the following conditions, to wit: that my negro woman Maria, and her four children as his property and under his protection shall be allowed all the privileges of free persons, consistently with good order and a proper subordination, and shall be allowed out of the property demised to the said William H. Hollingsworth, two hundred and fifty dollars each, to be paid to them at such times and in such quantities as in his judgment will be most proper, otherwise to take them to the State of Ohio, and the balance of the money over and above what will be expended in their passage to be paid to them there; and in case the said William H. Hollingsworth should refuse or neglect to comply with the conditions herein expressed or should die without a legal heir, in either of these cases it is my will and desire that all the interests, rights and emoluments which the said William H. Hollingsworth has, by virtue of this will, shall go to John H. Hollingsworth, and shall be his to all intents and purposes as though they had been originally demised to him, &c."

Giving the will what we deem a proper construction, it appears clearly to have been the intention of Oliphant, the testator, that Wm. H. Hollingsworth should take the Turkey Creek place free from all conditions, but that he was to take all the rest of his real and personal estate, not otherwise disposed of, subject to the conditions above set forth. In other words, William H. Hollingsworth, the devisee, was to take the estate devised to him subject to certain conditions subsequent, which unless he performed there was a limitation over to John H. Hollingsworth, creating what is termed a conditional lim- 562 itation.

By the terms of the will Maria acquired certain rights and, upon their acquisition, the law would have lent its aid to enforce them, if not against law, policy or morality. She was a beneficiary under the will, and was entitled to the benefits of its provisions, unless they contravened some statute of the State in which the will was made, or were void for some other cause. The testator manifested unequivocally his intention as to the partial or total freedom of Maria, firstly, by the wish that she shall enjoy all the privileges of free persons, consistently with good order and proper subordination, and a devise to her of two hundred and fifty dollars; and secondly, to be taken to Ohio and, after her expenses of transportation thither were paid out of this money, the remainder of the same to be paid to her there.—Here, certainly, is created a solemn trust—a trust involving the freedom of a slave who, it is fair to suppose, had most favorably commended herself to the greatest kindness of her owner, and he, for the purpose of more effectually carrying out his benign and munificent intentions, devises the greater part of his estate, (which the witnesses tell us was a large one,) subject to and conditioned upon this trust.—There is no evidence to show that William H. Hollingsworth actually took the estate so devised to him. Although a devisee is not bound, nolens volens, to accept of a devise, yet the law will presume an acceptance, if the devise or gift is of a beneficiary character; its presumption being based upon that strong, impulsive principle of self-interest which so generally directs and governs the actions of men.—If, therefore, Hollingsworth took the estate, he took it upon the condition of the will and subject to the trust. That portion of it in which it is proided that Maria shall have the privileges of free persons, we believe, in the language of the counsel for the appellant, is void, "because it is a condition inconsistent with the gift. Such a privilege is incompatible with the relation of master and slave, and with the rights, duties and reciprocal obligations resulting therefrom." There are decisions going the other way, but in deciding this case we are governed by what we deem the laws and policy of Carolina. In that State, the slave was not permitted to go as free and exercise all the rights and privileges of free persons of color, and if he did so he became liable to be seized as a derelict and sold. This being the case, the intention of the testator as to this clause could not be Sibley vs. Maria, a woman of color.—Opinion of Court.

563 carried out, and the law of Carolina not permitting direct manumission, of course it could not be effected indirectly—the evasion of a statute being an infraction of it.

There is some diversity in the decisions how far a devise of property to a slave will entitle such slave to his freedom by necessary implication. The case of Hale v. Mullin, 5 Harr. & J., 590, and confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, 2 Peters, 670, goes to this extent, while the cases found in 2 Call, 319, 4 Dess., 266 and 1 Stewart, 320, assume the negative of this proposition. A decision of this question is not necessary, however, in this case, further than this—that if the manumission of Maria could have been legally effected by the laws of Carolina, the legacy to her of the money would at least have been good, so far as furnishing the means to carry the intent of the testator into execution. We have spoken of it rather as a fact indicating this intention, and as a fund to enable the party taking under it to effectuate it.

At the time of the probate of the will there seems to have been no law of South Carolina to prevent the carrying off slaves beyond the limits of the State and then to be liberated. The case of Fraser v. Fraser, 2 Hill Ch., 303, 35, sustains us in this view. The policy of the law against manumission was to prevent an increase of free blacks in the State, and to guard against its deleterious effects.

It is contended that there is no direct gift of freedom after the arrival of Maria in Ohio. There was certainly a trust, no precise form or set of words being necessary to create one; and taking the whole clause of the will together in relation to Maria, we think there can be but one construction of it, and that is, that the taking her to Ohio was regarded by the testator as a dernier means of giving her freedom. It is very true that no evidence as to the laws of Ohio was adduced in the court below; but what rational intendment, other than that of freedom can be made or adduced as to this required removal and the payment of money upon her arrival in that State?—Beside, the ordinance of 1787 embraced the territory now comprising the State of Ohio, and the decisions of the legal tribunals of that State show that its provisions were embraced in its Constitution.

Having shown that there was a clear intention of giving freedom to Maria and a trust resulting from the nature and very terms of the devise, the next question is whether that trust has been executed.

The will was admitted to probate January 7th, 1828, upwards of 564 eighteen years having elapsed between that time and the period of the commencement of this suit. The defendant in the court below introduced no evidence to rebut any of the presumptions raised by or under the will, and we know nothing of the time of Maria's arrival in our State, or the circumstances in which she came. All that we know is, she was held in bondage as a slave at the time of action brought. In the absence of all evidence, therefore, to the contrary, we have a legal right to presume that the trust was executed, and perfectly coincide with the Judge who tried the case in the court below, as to the principles laid down by him. We think, however, that inasmuch as William H. Hollingsworth was to take the estate by condition subsequent—in other words, the estate was obliged to vest in him ere he could perform the conditions—he, instead of the executor, was the person called upon to execute the trust. But inasmuch as the verdict was in accordance with the justice of the case, and the defendant had the full benefit of all the exceptions raised by him to the plaintiff's action in the shape of instructions asked of the court, we are not disposed to disturb the finding of the jury, who evidently acted upon the principles as declared by the court. The presumption we have spoken of is one of law, arising from the facts of the case. It is an inference drawn as to one fact from the existence of another fact, owing to a connection between them. 2 Starkie on Ev., 680.

In this case the presumption of law that the trust was executed is, however, but a prima facie inference or intendment, liable to be rebutted by proof to the contrary. In this case, as we have before remarked, no evidence was adduced by the defendant, showing any title whatever to Maria; and we think, owing to the presumptions arising in the case, he was called upon to defend his claim by some affirmative evidence, instead of relying entirely upon what he deemed the wakness of the cause of his adversary.

In support of the views we have taken on this subject we will cite a few authorities. "The general rule is, that when a person is required to do a certain act, the omission of which would make him guilty of a culpable neglect of duty, it ought to be inferred that he has duly performed it, unless the contrary be shown." 3 East., 192. 10 East., 216. Phil. Ev., 151. Woodward, Justice. Hartwell v. Root, 19 John. R., 347. So in the case of the Bank of the United States v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat., 64, Judge Story remarks: "By the general rules of evidence presumptions are continually made in cases of private persons, of acts even of the most solemn nature, when 56 those acts are the result of necessary accompaniment or other circumstances. In aid of this salutary principle, the law itself, for the purpose of strengthening the infirmity of evidence and upholding transactions intimately connected with the public peace and the security of private property, indulges its own presumptions. It presumes that every man, in his private and official character does his duty until the contrary is proved; it will presume that all thing are rightly done unless the circumstances of the case overturn this presumption, according to the maxim, omnia presumuntur rite, et solemnitur essee acta, donec probetur in contrarium."

"Fictions of law," says Mr. Justice Blackstone, "although they may startle at first, will be found on consideration to be highly beneficial and useful." They are invited, say the civilians, "ad conciliandum equitatem, cum ratione et stabilitate juris," and it is a well known maxim of the common law, that in "fictione juris, semper subsistit equitas." Best on Pre., 24. It is a general rule that, whenever trustees ought to convey to the beneficial owner, it should be left to the jury to presume that they have so conveyed, whenever such presumption can reasonably be made. 3 Sugden, V. & P., 25, 42, 43, tenth ed. Hill on Trustees, 255. See also Greenleaf, 18, 53. 2 Starkie on Evidence, 680, 681, 2—75. While the law will presume in certain cases that all things are rite acta, it never presumes illegality. 12 Eng. Com. Law R., 371.

As to the time within which the condition annexed to the estate devised was to be performed, there being no specific time pointed out for so doing, in such a case the law says that the condition must be performed within a reasonable time. Ross v. Tremain, 2 Metcalf, 495. 1 Jarman on Wills, 804. If, therefore, the condition in relation to Maria had not been performed within this reasonable period, the ulterior legatee might have claimed the estate for condition broken, subject, however, to the same condition; for the will uses this language: that if William H. Hollingsworth should refuse to comply with its conditions, then it was the will and desire of the testator "that all the interests, rights and emoluments which the said William H. Hollingsworth was to have by virtue of the will, should go to John H. Hollingsworth, and should be his to all intents and purposes, as though they had been originally devised to him." In other words, merely substituting John H. in lieu of William H. Hollingsworth as the devisee of the estate bequeathed, with the condi- 56 tions annexed to it.

The sustaining of this suit would not have the effect, as contended for by counsel for appellant, of infringing upon the policy of our own State, owing to our statute in relation to the manumission of slaves. If Maria had been proven to have been a slave ever since the death of Oliphant, the testator, and this suit had been primarily brought for the purpose of establishing her freedom, then the question involving the policy and statutes of our State would have arisen; but it cannot arise here, because the presumption is that she was free when she came here; and if she came after the passage of the law of 1829, she only rendered herself amenable to that act and that of 1832, prohibiting the coming of free persons of color to our State.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Per curiam.

LUKE LOTT, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, vs. BANKS MEACHAM, EXECUTOR OF JONATHAN THOMAS, DEFENDANT IN ERROR.

Writ of error to Gadsden Circuit Court.

This was an action of replevin, brought by Meacham, as executor of Thomas, in the Circuit Court of Gadsden county, against Lott, for divers slaves.

Jonathan Thomas, by his last will and testament, devised and bequeathed to Mary Thomas, during her widowhood, the slaves in controversy in this case—and in the event of her subsequent marriage, the property was given to his executors in trust, to and for her sole and separate use, and for her support during her life. Upon her death, the testator directed the property to be sold, and to be divided among his six children named in the will.

Meacham, the executor, made his final settlement of the estate in July, 1836, having before that time assented to the bequest to Mrs. Thomas, and delivered the property to her. By the final order, bearing date 16th July, 1836, he was discharged from the executor-

567 ship, but not from the trusts committed to him by the will. Mrs. Thomas did not marry again. She continued in possession of the property until her death, which happened in November, 1846. The persons entitled under the will, upon the death of Mrs. Thomas, took possession of the slaves, and divided them by an amicable arrangement among themselves. Lott, who had intermarried with Ann Maria Thomas, one of the daughters of the testator, was in possession of the slaves in dispute in this action, under and by virtue of the aforesaid agreement, and with the consent of all the parties entitled under the will.

The court instructed the jury, that the plaintiff, as executor of Thomas, on the death of the widow, is entitled to the possession of the property devised to her, to administer the same according to law and the directions of the will—stating, at the same time, that unless there were debts of the estate to pay, or some cause of interference by the executor, it was not disposed to allow the amicable division made by the heirs to be disturbed.

The defendant asked the following instructions: 1. That the devise and bequest in the will of the property in dispute created an estate in remainder in the persons appointed to take, after the death of Mrs. Thomas, the tenant for life, and that this estate in remainder was created at the same time with the creation of the particular or life estate.

2. That the assent of the executor to the bequest, by the delivery of the property in dispute to Mary Thomas, the tenant of the particular estate, is an assent to the remainder given to the persons named to take in remainder; and having so assented, he cannot now retract that assent.

3. That the property in dispute being in the possession of the defendant, as one of the persons entitled to take in remainder, in virtue of his marital rights, he is entitled to that possession, as against the plaintiff in this action.

4. That the plaintiff having, by his own showing, been fully discharged by the County Court of Gadsden County from all the duties of executor, on the 16th July, 1836, cannot now maintain this action.

The court refused to give the instructions prayed, and to that refusal, and to the instructions given by the judge, the defendant by his counsel excepted.

568 The jury found for plaintiff.

This cause was tried before the Hon. THOMAS BALTZELL, Judge of the Middle Circuit, at the Spring Term, 1848, of Gadsden Circuit Court.

Dupont and Thompson, for plaintiff in error.

Carmack, Stephens & Baker, for defendant in error.

This case not being deemed in a condition to be determined, with a just regard to the rights and interests of the parties concerned, no opinion affecting their rights and interests was delivered.

The following is the judgment of the Court, delivered by HAWKINS, Justice:

The court, after having had this case under due consideration, is of opinion that, inasmuch as its decision must depend very much upon the construction of the will of Jonathan Thomas, and as only detached portions of it are before the court, it cannot proceed and pronounce a definite opinion and decision upon it. The court is, therefore, obliged to require, that it be remanded to the Circuit Court, for the purpose of having sent hither a more perfect and complete record. Whilst making this order, without intending to indicate to parties any opinion as to the course already pursued, it cannot refrain from the expression of a regret, that the case was not, in the first instance, brought on the equity side of the court, where all the rights of the litigants could have been so fairly, and certainly far more satisfactorily adjudicated, than they can be at law.

The cause is, therefore, remanded to the court below for such proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the foregoing views and objects.

Per curiam.

HENRY D. DARDEN & WIFE vs. SARAH A. LINES, ET AL. 569

The Supreme Court of this State has no jurisdiction in a cause in Chancery, brought up by appeal from a decree, pro forma, entered in the court below by counsel of parties.

At a Circuit Court, held in and for the county of Gadsden, on the 16th day of November, 1848, the following decree was entered in this case: "And now, on this sixteenth day of November, came the said complainants and defendants, by their respective solicitors and counsel; and thereupon it was agreed by Counsel, that a decree pro forma shall be entered, sustaining the demurrer filed herein—so as not to exclude the Judge of this court from sitting in this cause in the Supreme Court on the hearing thereof.

"It is, therefore, ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the demurrer of the said Sarah A. Lines and others, defendants, to the complainants' said bill of complaint, be sustained, and the bill be dismissed, at the costs of the said complainants.

"And the said parties respectfully agreeing thereto, it is ordered that said complainants be allowed their appeal to the Supreme Court, without bond and security."

This case, and others, in which pro forma decrees had been entered, were submitted to the court, upon the question of jurisdiction, upon which the court were divided, and gave the following opinions:

Opinion by Chief Justice Douglas:

This and other cases have been brought up to this court, on decrees made in the court below, by consent of parties, "pro forma." The professed object of the proceeding is, to avoid the provision of the Constitution of this State, which disqualifies the judge who decides a case in the court below from sitting on the trial or hearing of it in this court; and in other cases to prevent the delay which would occur from the inability of some of the justices to sit in this court in consequence of their having been of counsel, or otherwise concerned in the case in the Circuit Court; and thereby to secure a trial in this court by all the justices of the Supreme Court, including, of course, the judge who, by consent of the parties, rendered the decree "pro conforma" in the court below. In order that this matter may be more readily and clearly understood, it is deemed proper here to refer to that clause of the Constitution which creates this dis- 570 qualification; it is as follows, to wit: "No Justice of the Supreme Court shall sit or take part in the Appellate Court, on the trial or hearing of any cause which shall have been decided by him in the Court below.' See Thompson's Digest, page 50, sec. 2, No. 4.

Another object professedly is, to avoid also the delay that would otherwise have occurred in the Circuit Court, from the disqualification of the judge to try a cause in which he had been employed as counsel, or attorney. The statute which creates the disability, declares that "It shall not be lawful for any judge of this State to try any cause in which he may have been employed as counsel or attorney, but shall continue the same until some judge shall hold court in the circuit in which said causes may be pending, that was not employed in such cause at the time of his election." Ibidem, 55, No. 11.

It seems to be supposed that the judge who had been thus employed may, by consent of parties, make such decree "pro forma," and send the case up to this court, and that this court can take jurisdiction of it. If this can be done it is very clear that it is upon the principle that the case is not tried in the court below, and that this court can take jurisdiction of a case that has not been thus tried; and it has been strongly insisted that the judge who made such decree may sit and take part in the trial and hearing of the case in this court. From this statement two questions naturally arise: First. Can this court entertain jurisdiction of a case upon a decree thus rendered, by consent pro forma? and Second. If it can, may the judge who pronounced such decree rightfully sit as judge, and take part in the trial or hearing of such case in this court?

The first is by far the most important question, and, indeed, seems decisive of the other; for I am free to confess that, if I entertained no doubt but that this court might rightfully take jurisdiction of a cause thus brought up, I should not hesitate were I the judge who made the decree pro forma, to sit and take part here in the trial and hearing of the case, upon the principle that it was not in fact tried or decided by me in the court below. But entertaining as I do a very serious doubt upon that subject, and having expressed that doubt, it is proper that I should state the reasons on which it is founded, and the views which I entertain in relation thereto.

571 The Constitution, art. 5, sec. 2, Ibidem, 50, No. 1, declares that "the Supreme Court, except in cases otherwise directed in this Constitution, shall have appellate jurisdiction only, which shall be coextensive with the State, under such restrictions and regulations, not repugnant to this Constitution, as may, from time to time, be prescribed by law." This is not one of the excepted cases, nor is the provision in regard to it repugnant to the Constitution. The same section, Ibidem, No. 5, says: "The Supreme Court shall have and exercise appellate jurisdiction in all causes brought up by appeal or writ of error from the several Circuit Courts, where the matter in controversy exceeds in amount or value fifty dollars." "An appeal is the act by which a party submits to the decision of a superior court a cause which has been tried in an inferior tribunal." 1 Bouvier's L. Dict., 82.

From the record of this case, it does not appear that there has been any trial of this cause in the court below—and if not, then it is not a proper case for an appeal.

But it is said that it has been decided in the court below, and, therefore, may be properly reviewed here. Has it, however, been decided. To decide is to determine, to form a definite opinion; decided means determined, ended, concluded; the word decided implies decision, clear, unequivocal, that puts an end to doubt. Webster's Dict., Fol. Ed., 1848, page 306. It implies in this case the exercise of judgment upon the law and the facts of the case. Judgment is the decision or sentence of the law given by a court of justice, or other competent tribunal, as the result of proceedings instituted therein, for the redress of an injury. The language of judgments, therefore, is not that it is decreed or resolved by the court, but it is considered "consideration est per curiam," his debts, damages, or possessions, or the like. Ibidem, 548.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case ex parte Tobias Watkins, 3 Peters, 202, says: "A judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction in its nature concludes the subject on which it is rendered, and pronounces the law of the case; it puts an end to all enquiry respecting the fact by deciding it.'

A decree is the judgment or sentence of a Court of Equity; it is either interlocutory or final. The former is given on some plea or issue in the cause, which does not decide the main question; the latter settles the matter in dispute, and a final decree has the same ef-572 fect as a judgment at law. Bouvier's Law Dict., 295, and authorities there cited.

It will hardly be seriously contended, we think, that there is any such final decree in this case, or that there has been any such decision, any such action of the mind of the court upon it. The proceeding on its face does not import any such thing; on the contrary, it appears very clearly intended as a device to avoid what seems to me a clear, plain and unequivocal provision of the Constitution. It is true there is a decree which, if taken by itself, apart from its context, would import finality, but then the record tells us that it was entered by consent of parties, "pro forma," which means "a mere matter of form." Branch's Principia, page 114. Now is mere matter of form to be held conclusive? Is that the result of proceedings instituted in a court of justice, for the redress of an injury?

The decree is either final, or it is not final; if it is not final, then it is not properly here, for no appeal lies except on a final decree. The case of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 1 Peters' Cond. Reps., 282, has been cited to sustain the jurisdiction in this case.—In that case, Chief Justice Marshall held that the essential criterion of appellate jurisdiction is, that it revises and corrects the proceedings in a cause already instituted, and does not create that cause.

If this be the essential criterion, (and I do not doubt it,) then the principle is conclusive upon this case; for the court below created no cause for this court to act upon, unless it committed an error in rendering the pro forma decree. As it did nothing else, it is very clear that there is nothing else, no other proceeding of that court for this corrected in that court. It was not the action or the original causes of action to which the Chief Justice referred—no court creates them—it is the errors committed in the subordinate tribunal, upon which the appellate jurisdiction is to be exercised. If the final decree of the inferior court is, in all respects, right, there is nothing for the appellate court to correct, no case made for the action of the appellate court. It is true the appellate court may look into the record of a case which is within its jurisdiction, and has been brought according to the regulations prescribed, to ascertain whether there is any thing in it that requires correction, and if there is not, may affirm the judgment or decree of the subordinate tribunal. To warrant this, however, there must have been a trial, in the court below. Trial "is the examination before a competent tribunal, according to the laws of the land, of the facts put in issue in the cause, for the purpose of determining such issue." 2 Bouvier's Law Dict., 457.—"The examination of a cause in controversy between the parties, before a proper tribunal." Webster's Dict., Fol. Ed., 1848, page 1173, and it must have been properly brought up. But if it is not within its jurisdiction, or brought up according to the regulations prescribed, it cannot act upon it at all, further than to dismiss and remand it for such action to the court below as to right and justice shall appertain.

The case of Ponder v. Moseley, et al., administrators, &c., 2 Florida Reps., 267, has been cited to show that no evil consequences can flow from the exercise of jurisdiction in these cases, because the court there held in accordance with the principles laid down in Elliot et al., v. Piersal et al., 1 Peters' Reps., 340, and re-asserted in 2 Peters, 369, that where a court has jrisdiction, it has a right to decide every question which occurs in the cause, and whether its decision be correct or otherwise, its judgment, until reversed, is regarded as binding on every other court; and according to Vourhees v. The Bank of the United States, 10 Peters, 474, 475, where the court says: "The line which separates error in judgment from the usurpation of power is very definite, and is precisely that which denotes the cases where a judgment or decree is reversable only by an appellate court, or may be declared a nullity collaterally when offered as evidence in an action concerning the matter adjudicated, or purporting to have been so. In the one case, it is a record importing absolute verity—in the other, mere waste paper."

But this court has never decided that where there was an usurpation of power the judgment was conclusive and could not be enquired into and declared a nullity collaterally; or, where the court had no jurisdiction the record of its judgment would import verity, or any thing more than mere waste paper. In the case of the United States v Stone, 14 Peters' Rep., 524, 525, a verdict was rendered in the District Court; it was then, by consent of counsel, transferred to the Circuit Court, precisely in the state in which it then was, and a division of opinion there entered, pro forma, to send the case to the Supreme Court of the United States, which the latter court deemed exceedingly irregular. "We are aware," said the court, "that in some cases, where the point arising is one of importance and difficulty, and it is desirable, for the purposes of justice, to obtain the opinion of this court, the judges of the Circuit Court have sometimes, by consent, certified the point to this court as upon a division of opinion, when, in truth, they both rather seriously doubted than differed about it. We do not object to a practice of this description when applied to the proper cases and on proper occasions; but this must be sanctioned by the judgment of one of the judges of this court in his circuit. A loose practice in this respect might render the court substantially a court for the original decision of all causes of importance, when the constitution and the laws intended to make it altogether appellate in its character; except in the few cases of original jurisdiction enumerated in the constitution."

This case has been invoked to sustain the jurisdiction of this court in the case at bar; but, when rightfully considered in reference to the Constitution of the United States and the acts of Congress conferring jurisdiction upon that court, it seems an authority against it. The case of Grant et al., v. Raymond, 6 Peters, 220, 221, cited for the same purpose, came before the Supreme Court of the United States in the first place, on a certificate of a division of opinion in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. On inspecting the record it appeared that, at the trial of the cause in the Circuit Court, the counsel for the defendants had excepted to the decisions of the court on various matters which had been presented for its consideration, and that a bill of exceptions had been sealed by the court. A motion was made for a new trial, when the opinions of the two judges of the Circuit Court were opposed upon questions presented for the decision of the court, excepted 575 to on the trial, as stated in the bill of exceptions. The Cir. Court certified a division of opinion on the motion for a new trial. The question was whether the court would entertain the case as it came up from the Cir. Court on a division in that court on a motion for a new trial. C J. Marshall suggested that the case might be brought on if the parties would agree that it should stand as if a judgment had been given by the Circuit Court on the bill of exceptions; which was done, and an agreement in writing filed. But the court said "it would reserve its opinion and judgment in the cause till the defendants in the court below shall have sued out a writ of error in this cause to the said Circuit Court and filed a return thereto, with a bill of exceptions in the usual form, signed by the court below, in this court." So very careful was that learned court to have the cause rectus in curia, before it would give its opinion or pronounce its judgment upon it.

In the case of the United States v. Tillotson, 12 Wheat., 180, 6 Peters' Condensed Reps., 507, the court held that "Where the burthen of proof, in certain specific defences set up by the defendant, is on him, and the evidence presents contested facts, an absolute direction from the court that the matters produced and read in evidence on the part of defendant were sufficient in law to maintain the issue on his part and the jury ought to render their verdict in his favor, is erroneous, and a judgment purporting to have been given under such a charge will be reversed, although the record was made up as upon a bill of exceptions, taken at a trial before the jury upon the matter in issue, no such trial having taken place and the case having assumed that shape by the agreement of parties in order to take the opinion of the court upon certain questions of law."—All this case proves is that the Supreme Court of the United States will sometimes give its opinion upon a point of law for the satisfaction of counsel or parties upon an assumed case, in which, of course, no question of jurisdiction could possibly arise.

Prigg v. the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 16 Peters, 609, is the strongest case to which we have been referred in support of the jurisdiction that we are called upon in these cases to exercise; but in that case there had been a jury trial, a verdict taken and judgment rendered upon a criminal charge in a subordinate tribunal of that State. The question to be decided arose under the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, which confers upon the Supreme Court of the United States jurisdiction of questions such as arose in that 576 case. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania affirmed pro forma the judgment of the court below and the case was carried up to the Supreme Court of the United States upon the single question of law presented in it, and which would have been precisely the same in any shape in which the case might have been carried up; was one which no other court was competent finally to decide, and it was appellate and not original jurisdiction which that high tribunal was called upon to exercise—it was that the errors in the proceedings of the courts of Pennsylvania might be corrected that the case was carried up. Had it been taken up before it had been investigated in a subordinate tribunal, no doubt the Supreme Court of the United States would have at once dismissed it for want of jurisdiction. And it is believed that no case can be found where the parties have been permitted to so mould and shape the proceedings in it as to bring the original matter or cause of action, and the testimony offered to sustain and rebut it, before that court for adjudication, until it had first undergone the ordeal of a subordinate tribunal, whose proceedings they were called upon to revise and correct, unless it was a case in which the original jurisdiction had been expressly conferred. Cases so moulded and shaped may have gone there, and been acted upon, but if they have, I will venture to say it was upon some point of law only, and that they passed without observation as to the manner in which they had been brought up.

It has been suggested that we have no statute or rule providing specifically the mode of taking appeals in chancery cases, and that we must, therefore, refer to the English practice. I fear, however, that their mode of proceeding in such cases is not sufficiently analagous to our own, to be a safe guide. In the case of Putnam v. Lewis and wife, 1 Florida, 475, where it was contended that the test of a decree's being final is that an appeal will lie upon it, this court [the Judge of the Middle Circuit delivering the opinion] said: "We have been referred to various cases of partition in the English Courts, showing appeals from decisions of the Master of the Rolls to the Lord Chancellor, in cases like the one under consideration. If their mode of proceeding was like our's, such an authority would be entitled to great respect; but we find no such similitude or resemblance. By our statute, which, in this respect, is the same as that prevailing in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, a decree must be final before an appeal can be had. Not so in the English courts of chancery, for there an appeal may be taken from every or- 577 der or petition, motion or interlocutory decree, in the progress of the suit; and this seems to be the course in New York." Citing 3 John. Ch., 66, 68, 163, 319. 9 Vesey, 319. 14 Vesey, 184 15 Vesey, 184, 585. 16 Vesey, 213, 218. 18 Vesey, 453.

In the case of Armstrong et al. v. the Treasurer of Athens County, 16 Peters, 235, 236, Mr. Justice Catron delivering the opinion of the court said: "This is a writ of error from a State Court, and it becomes the duty of this court, before proceeding to examine the merits of the controversy, to determine whether jurisdiction over it is conferred by the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789. It is true no question upon that subject was raised at the argument presented for the appellants, (the respondent having no counsel,) but it has been the uniform practice of this court, in every case of this description, to ascertain in the first instance whether the record presented a case in which we are authorized by law to reverse the judgmnt or decree of a State court."

The same principle is asserted in Stamps, v. Newton, 3 Howard's Miss. Reps., 34, by the Supreme Court of Mississippi, who say, "Although the attention of this court has not been directed to the present defect by the counsel in the cause, yet we are bound to enquire in every case, whether the facts presented by the record give this tribunal jurisdiction."

In the case of Read and others v. Robb and others, 4 Yerger's Rep., 66, the precise question now presented to us came before the Supreme Court of Tennessee (of which Mr. Justic Catron was then Chief Justice,) by whom it was held that they had no jurisdiction of an appeal taken from a decree of a chancery court made pro forma: that it had jurisdiction of appeals only in cases where there had been a judicial action in the court below.

The attention of the Supreme Court of Alabama was called to this subject in 1845, in the case of Elmes v. Sutherland, 7 Ala. Rep., New Series, 269, in which a motion had been made to dismiss the bill for want of equity. The Chancellor refused this motion, and it was then agreed by the parties that a decree pro forma should be rendered for all that is alleged or prayed for in the bill, in order that the case might be taken to the Supreme Court for revision. No specific decree was rendered in the case by the Court of Chancery; it seems to have been carried up on the idea that this agreement was to be considered as a decree. The court said: "It in point of fact 578 a decree had been rendered by the Chancellor for the relief prayed by the bill in accordance with the agreement of the parties, it would present a question worthy of grave consideration how far this court could take cognizance of the cause under such circumstances, as it only has appellate, not original jurisdiction. It is quite possible that we might feel constrained to repudiate a case where the parties had consented to a 'pro forma decree.

At the next term of that court, the question was directly presented in the case of Stone et al. v. Lewin. 8 Ala. Reps., New Series, 395 to 399. In that case the Chancellor had been of counsel in the cause, and for that reason an agreement had been made that he might enter a decree pro forma, either for or against the complainant, as she might elect, and the following entry appears: "This case is submitted for a decree on bill, answers and exhibits, by consent, with an agreement that a decree pro forma be rendered by this court in favor of the complainant, perpetuating the injunction heretofore in this case granted. It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said injunction be, and the same is hereby rendered perpetual; and that the defendant pay the costs herein." Peck and L. Clark for the plaintiff in error; no counsel appeared for the defendant in error. Goldthwaite, Justice, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "We suggested in the recent case of Elms v. Sutherland, that it was questionable if this court was invested with any jurisdiction when a decree is not made by the Chancellor, but is entered pro forma, by consent of the parties, in oredr to have a decision here more speedily, or from any other cause. This case presents the matter of such a decree so fully that we must now decide the question or consider it at rest. At the formation of our State Government it was provided that "the Supreme Court, except in cases otherwise directed by the Constitution, shall have appellate jurisdiction only. This is to be co-extensive with the State under such restrictions and regulations not repugnant to this constitution, as may from time to time be prescribed by law." Const., Art. 5, sec. 2. We remark here that this provision of the constitution of Alabama is identical with that of our State, which we have above cited. "It is quite unnecessary," says that court, "to speculate upon the reasons which induced the prohibition contained in this section, as there can be no doubt it was the intention to exclude the exercise of any original ju-

579 risdiction by the court. As a court, our duty certainly is to give it the effect which its authors intended it should have, and this can only be done by refusing to entertain jurisdiction of cases which have not, in point of fact, been decided by the inferior courts. It is quite evident, if the consent of parties can confer what is really original jurisdiction upon this court, many cases will find their way here which otherwise might have come, and it might become common to use the inferior courts as mere offices for the preparation of causes." And this is in pr ise accordance with the reasoning of Chief Justice Taney, who delivered the opinion of the court in The United States v. Stone, 14 Peters, 525, and does appear to me to contain a plain natural and common sense view of the matter. That court, after further arguing the question, concludes its opinion by the following pertinent remarks, which appear to me to contain great force: "We have endeavored to show that this practice is in conflict with the letter and spirit of the constitution, and earnestly hope that it may be entirely eradicated, as it is frequently important to a deliberate and correct examination of the cause in this court, that it should have a careful examination in the subordinate courts. It is only when a cause is thus examined in a court of original jurisdiction, that the many mistakes of the parties can be corrected, deficiencies supplied and new views presented. If this examination is deferred until the case comes into the appellate court, there can in most cases be neither amendment nor revision of the evidence or frame of proceedings, and great injustice may result to suitors. The cause now before us (say the court) is an illustration of the evil of this practice; as no evidence was taken to sustain the bill, and the reversal of the Chancellor's decree would conclude the complainant, when, if the same deficiency had been disclosed to him, he might have exercised his discretion in permitting the party to take testimony."

Lord Eldon, who adorned the woolsack longer than any other man who ever sat in the English Chancery, was so sensible of this, that he considered it to be contrary to the duty of a court of justice, under any circumstances, to make a decree pro forma, in order to suffer the cause to go up. "The suitors," he said, "have a right to the deliberate attention and the deliberate judgment of the court in every stage in which, according to the constitution, the cause may proceed; and there can be no circumstances under which I would ever permit myself to say, as the cause is to go elsewhere, I give 580 no judgment." Lord Eldon did not consider a decree pro forma as a judgment of the court, but as no judgment. It is said, however, that the case of Le Baron and Colquitt v. Fauntleroy and others, decided by this court, at the last term, came up on a decree pro forma—that we acted upon it, and that settles the question. It is true that case did come up on a decree pro forma, and we acted upon it; but it is equally true, that it passed sub silentio, so far as the question now under consideration is concerned. No question was made in that case, as to the jurisdiction. The same identical argument was presented to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of The United States v. Moore, 3 Cranch, 172, which was a criminal case. In the course of the argument, Chief Justice Marshall suggested a doubt whether the appellate jurisdiction of that court extended to criminal cases, page 188. Mason, in support of the jurisdiction, said: "This court has exercised jurisdiction in a criminal case," and cited The United States v. Simms, 1 Cranch, 252, when that great expounder of the Constitution, to whom the country is more indebted than to all other men beside, for the luminous and able expositions given of that great charter, which binds the thirty States of this confederacy (and it is hoped indissolubly) together, replied: "No question was made in that case as to the jurisdiction; it passed sub silentio, and the court does not consider itself bound by that case." This breathes the true spirit of morality and of constitutional liberty; one wrong is not to justify another; one encroachment is not to justify a subsequent breach of that sacred instrument.

It has been attempted here to weaken the force of the decision of the Supreme Court of Alabama by saying, that at one time it was construed as our's is now—that then pro forma decrees were common, and more approved; but that since a separate Supreme Court has been established, it is disposed to restrain the practice. But there is nothing in that case to justify the remark; it is unworthy of the reputable court of whom it was made. The language of the constitution means the same thing, whatever plan may be adopted for the organization of courts, and so I have no doubt that learned court would hold.

The reason alleged for bringing the case up in this form is, that the judge who made the pro forma decree shall not be disqualified from sitting or taking part on the trial or hearing of the case in this Court, so as to secure here a full bench and prevent delay; and it 581 has been urged upon us with great zeal and eloquence, by the learned counsel who argued this question on behalf of the appellants, that if this practice shall not be sustained, great inconvenience will result; and I feel the full force of the argument, can see the apparent evil, and should most sincerely regret that such a consequence should ensue; but if I was fully satisfied that there was no constitutional objection in the way of the exercise of this jurisdiction, I should have no doubt that the judge who made the decree could not rightfully sit on the trial or hearing of it in this court. That a case must either be decided, or not decided, appears to me as clear and strikes my mind with as much force as any problem in Euclid. If the case is decided, then it must have been decided by the judge who pronounced the decree in the court below, and the Constitution says, he "shall not sit as judge or take part in this court on the trial or hearing of it." This is a plain, clear, constitutional prohibition. It is said that this is for the benefit of the party, and he may waive it; but can a judge waive a constitutional prohibition? It is not for me to discuss the reasons which may have caused the insertion of this prohibition in the Constitution. I can imagine several, and one much more forcible and much more deeply seated in the very nature of man, than the mere fact that the judge, because he had decided the cause in the court below, might feel an interest in having his judgment affirmed. It is not to be presumed that the members of the Convention thought that the General Assembly would elect men to fill the high and responsible offices of judges, who possessed so little of that high disinterestedness, that noble magnanimity, which ought to characterize him who is clothed with "the judicial ermine," as to entertain a feeling so wholly inconsistent with his high position . Whatever reasons may have induced its insertion, it is sufficient for me that the people have spoken in their primary assembly; as judge, it is my duty to obey.

"The judges (said the learned judge who pronounced the dissenting opinion in the case of Gadsden v. Jones, administrator, 1 Florida Reps., 348,) are not to presume the intentions of the Legislature, but to collect them from the words of the law, and they have nothing to do with the policy of the law," citing Dwarris on Statutes, 703. Again: "Recently all the judges, and particularly the late present Lord Chief Justice, have manifested the strongest inclination to adhere more closely in the construction of statutes to the words of the act of Par- 582 liament." "I have often lamented (says Lord Tenterden) that, in so many instances, the courts have departed from the plain and literal construction of statutes relative to the settlement of the poor. Where the authorities are silent, I shall hold myself forced to construe the acts of Parliament according to the plain and popular meaning of the words." 2 B. & A. Dwarris; and again, in another case, the same distinguished judge says: "The words may probably go beyond the intention; but if they do, it rests with the Legislature to make the alteration; the duty of the court is only to give effect to the provision." "It is safer," said Mr. Justice Ashurst, "to adopt what the Legislature has actually said, than to suppose what they mean."—Again, citing Dwarris on Statutes, 707-'8, and T. R., 52: "Without saying how far I would, in all cases and under all or any circumstances, apply these principles to the construction of acts of the Legislature, as applicable to the construction of the Constitution, that great charter of our liberties, the fundamental law of the land they have my most decided and cordial approbation, and I am not disposed to depart one jot or tittle from the rule which they prescribe in construing that important instrument, and more especially in favor of a power to be exercised by myself."

The argumentum ab inconvenienti is never to be applied, where the sense is clear, where there is no equivocal expression, where the words used admit of only one meaning. Attorey General v. Duke of Marlborough, 3 Madd., 540. Deane v. Clayton, 7 Taunt, 496. Fletcher v. Lord Sandes, 3 Bing, 590. 13 Eng. Com. L. Reps. Broome's Legal Maxims, 85.

"In construing an act of Parliament, if the words used by the Legislature in framing any particular clause have a necessary meaning, it will, according to the English authorities, be the duty of the court to construe the clause accordingly, whatever may be the inconvenience of such a course." Turner v. Sheffield Railway Company, 10 M. and W., 434. Doe ex dem., Governor of Bristol Hospital v. Norton, 11 M. and W., 928.

"No justice of the Supreme Court shall sit as judge or take part in the appellate court on the trial or hearing of any case which shall have been decided by him in the court below." There is no equivocal expression in this clause; the words used admit of only one meaning, and most clearly exclude the judge who decided the cause 583 from sitting or taking part in it in this court. So that the object in view, if the case was decided, could not be thus attained; if it has not been decided, if there has not in fact been a final decision, a final decree in the case, then, as we have before shown, no appeal lies.

The case of Charles v. The State, 1 Florida Reports, 298, 300, was a capital case; there was a verdict of guilty, but no final judgment had been entered. The learned judge who tried the cause, entertaining a doubt as to the sufficiency of the indictment, had certified that matter to this court, pursuant to an act of the Legislature Council of the late Territorial Government; the question was, whether this court possessed jurisdiction of the case? A strong and able appeal was made on behalf of the prisoner, but, after due examination and the most mature consideration, this court held that it had not jurisdiction, and concluded its opinion in the following words: "The most prudent and safe course for a court of dernier resort, when a doubt about the power exists, is deemed to be to decline to act. The exercise of doubtful powers by a court of the last resort is always extremely dangerous, and tends to excite alarm and distrust." Such was the opinion of this court at that time, and surely, if it was right and proper then, and in a case where human life was at stake, "a fortiori" it is so now, when we are called upon to extend, by construction of a plain, clear and unambiguous clause of the constitution, our own powers.

In the case of Willis v. Shepherd, 2 Florida Reps., 399, this court (the same learned judge of the Middle Circuit again delivering the opinion) said "We consider it by far safer and more prudent, more in the spirit of the Constitution, and in harmony with the character of our institutions, to keep within the range and limits of a rightful jurisdiction, than to subject ourselves to the reproach of travelling beyond it, and exercising a doubtful and questionable power."

For the reasons above set forth, with the decisions of two most respectable courts of dernier resort directly upon the point, against the exercise of such jurisdiction, with no like case in favor of it, the question, it does seem to me, cannot rightly be said to be clear of doubt, and the power, I think, should not be exercised.

But if the right to exercise this jurisdiction were perfectly clear, the policy of doing it would, as this court is constituted, be exceed-584 ingly questionable. It being composed of four judges, the court might be equally divided in opinion, and the result would be, that such decree, which in fact is, (and was intended by the court below and the parties to be,) but "a mere matter of form," would, of course, stand, and the rights of the party against whom it was rendered be forever concluded by it, to his great and irreparable injury, and to the total subversion of every principle of justice and equity

Without, therefore, imputing aught of blame to any one for the manner in which these cases were brought up to this court, I am decidedly of opinion that they should be remanded to the courts below, from which they respectively came, for such proceedings to be had therein as to law, right and justice may appertain—not doubting but that all concerned in them, animated by those high sentiments of honor, morality and good faith, which should mark the conduct of all who are called to aid in the administration of those sublime principles, will be disposed at once, by consent and without delay, to place them in the same position which they would now have occupied, had not these pro forma, consent decrees been made.

Judge LANCASTER concurred fully in the foregoing opinion, and Mr. Justice HAWKINS gave his assent to the views and sentiments expressed in the last clause, as to the disposition of this and other causes brought up to this court by appeal from pro forma decrees.

Opinion by Justice BALTZELLS

This and other cases have been brought to this court on decrees made in the court below, by consent and pro forma, to avoid the constitutional objection which disqualifies the Judge who made the decision in the Circuit, from sitting on the Supreme bench, thereby securing in the case a trial by all the justices, and in other cases to prevent the delay which would arise for the want of justices to try the case in this court, owing to the inability of some of the other justices to preside, from having been counsel or otherwise concerned.

There being an equal division of the justices as to the right to entertain cases so situated, I proceed to announce the views by which I have been governed in arriving at the conclusion that the cases can rightfully and should be tried and disposed of. The objection is that the jurisdiction of this court is appellate only; that this matter not

cising original jurisdiction to give a decision of itself. It is not perceived how the conclusion is arrived at that there was no decision; there is a decree final and conclusive between the parties, and so long as it remains, no farther action can be had on the subject. It is obviously, we think, res adjudicata, and whether made by consent, or pro forma, it is yet a decree. Can it be pretended that the case is now at issue and that the parties can proceed as if it had not been made? Whether the Judge making such a decision or pronouncing such decree is competent to preside in the Supreme Court, under the clause of our Constitution declaring that "no justice of the Supreme Court shall sit as judge, take part in the appellate court, on the trial or hearing of any case which shall have been decided by him in the court below," is another question and the one more appropriately resulting from the position of the case than the question presented. (For my part, I am free to declare that I feel no difficulty or embarrassment on either question. Even in the case of the Judge having decided the case below, I see no difficulty in his presiding, with the assent of the parties, in the Supreme Court. The provision is for the benefit of parties, and such an one as, in my opinion, they may very properly waive. It is a matter, so far as private rights or interests are concerned, in which the State has no interest, and the object was to give to the party a privilege of excepting to a judge on account of the bias proceeding from a prior decision, which he did not possess; but if the party chooses to forego the privilege I see no reason why he should not be allowed to do so. A man may waive his objections to a juror, or select as arbitrators persons totally disqualified, and yet it is his own concern.) The very difficulty entertained by the counsel and court as to the mode of opening the decree, so as to leave the parties in their former position, shows that there has been a decision and that the case is not before the Circuit Court for trial. If so, where is it?

Passing, however, this view of the subject, the enquiry arises, whether it is in violation of the Constitution to try a case so situate? It is said to be so, because the jurisdiction of the court is appellate and to decide these cases is to try them originally, as if in a court of original jurisdiction. The clause in our Constitution is almost identical with that in the Constitution of the United States, and if the objection be tenable, we shall be able, by reference to the decisions of that tribunal, always distinguished for the ability, the intimate ac- 586 quaintance with and attachment of its members to the Constitution, to ascertain and solve it. No court has had the intricate subject of jurisdiction so frequently before it; being limited in its sphere of action its care has been from necessity always to keep within the range of its powers. Every foot of ground from the commencement has been contested, so that none understands the subject so well or has defined it with such precision. An appeal, then, can most safely be made to that court, as embodying the sentiment and opinions of American jurists upon this interesting question.

At an early period the court through their Chief Justice, Marshall, in the case of Marbury v. Madison, declared as "the essential criterion of appellate jurisdiction that it revises and corrects the proceedings in a cause already instituted, and does not create that cause." 1 Cond. Rep. S. C., 283.

It can hardly be contended that any of these cases have been created in this court by their institution here, or that, in case of their affirmance or reversal, the decree or sentence of the court would be carried into execution here. There has not been, nor was there, any thing to be done originally here—no testimony to be taken—no amendment of the pleadings. The cases, if tried, are to be tried upon the decree and action of the court below. This being the general, rule and principle, let us see how far in practice the court has conformed to their doctrine by assuming or refusing to consider cases situate like the present.

The case of the United States v. Tillotson came up as upon a bill of exceptions taken to the opinion of the court, upon a trial before a jury upon the matters in issue, when, in reality, no trial was had, but the case assumed this shape by the agreement of the parties, in order to have the opinion of the court upon certain questions of law. "We must," say the court, "consider the case exclusively upon principles applicable to it as upon a bill of exceptions taken at a real trial."—The court took jurisdiction and reversed the case. 12 Wheat., 180

In Grant and others v. Raymond, a question was, whether the court would entertain the case as it came up from the circuit. Mr. Chief Justice Marshall suggested that the case might be brought on if the parties would agree that it should stand as if a judgment had been given by the Circuit Court on the exceptions. The case, he said, could not be heard on a difference in opinion of the judges of the

587 court on a motion for a new trial. The counsel having agreed that the case should stand as suggested, the court made the following order: "It is now here by the court considered and ordered that this cause shall now be heard and decided as on a writ of error brought after verdict and judgment in the Circuit Court, on the exceptions taken in that court; that the cause shall now proceed as if judgment had been actually entered in the Circuit Court for the plaintiffs there, and the certificate in the case shall be taken, regarded and treated as a writ of error sued out by defendants below, and that the question shall be whether said judgment ought to be affirmed or reversed; but that the court will reserve its opinion till the defendants shall have sued a writ of error and a return, with a bill of exceptions," &c. 6 Peters, 221.

Another case more directly in point is that of Prigg v. the State of Pennsylvania. It was a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania, to revise a judgment of that court, as a case involving the construction of the constitution and laws of the United States. Prigg was indicted in the court of Oyer and Terminer, of York county, for forcibly taking away a negro woman, and a verdict was rendered against him. The case was removed to the Supreme Court of the State and the judgment affirmed pro forma, and the case was carried to the Supreme Court under the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789. The judgment of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania was reversed. 16 Peters, 609.

To appreciate the full force of this decision and its application to the present case it will be proper to refer to the action of the same court on cases arising under the 25th section, showing the requisites to the vesting of jurisdiction as to them. In Armstrong and others v. the Treasurer of Athens county, the court held "that to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction under that section, it must appear that a question involving the Constitution and laws of the United States was necessarily involved in the decision, and that the State court could not have given the judgment or decree which they passed, without deciding it.' 16 Peters, 282.

At the same term the court refused jurisdiction of a case under this section, although all objection was waived, saying "consent will not give jurisdiction, and we have on several occasions said that, when the act of Congress has so carefully and cautiously restricted the jurisdiction conferred upon this court over the judgments and de-588 crees of the State tribunals, it would ill become the court to exercise it in a different spirit, and it certanly could not be justified in expressing an opinion favorable or unfavorable as to the correctness of this decree, when it has not the power to affirm or reverse it." Mills and others v. Brown, ibid., 526—7.

In the case of the United States v. Stone, the court it will be seen say: "We are aware that in some cases, where the point arising is one of importance and difficulty and it is desirable, for the purposes of justice to obtain the opinion of this court, the judges of the circuit have sometimes, by consent, certified the point to this court as upon a division of opinion, when, in truth, they both rather seriously doubted than differed about it. We do not object to a practice of this description when applied to proper cases and on proper occasions.—But they must be cases sanctioned by the judgment of one of the judges of this court in his circuit. A loose practice might render this court substantially a court for the original decision of all cases of importance when the constitution and laws intended to make it altogether appellate,' &c. 14 Peters, 525.

These cases very conclusively show, we think, that in the opinion of the Supreme Court at least there is no objection to the exercise of jurisdiction in a case situate like the present, and certainly under circumstances less ugent and imperious. We might well be content to rely upon this authority.

Let us examine how the matter stood under the English law, which is more immediately an authority with us, than that of the Supreme Court itself. The mode of taking appeals under our law is provided for by the rules of pratice in the courts of equity of the United States and, in case they are not applicable, by the practice of the High Court of Chancery in England. Duval, 137. In the rules adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States there is no provision for the taking of appeals, so that they and our statute also being silent, we must refer to the English practice. And here, I think, we shall find even less difficulty. According to the English practice a party had three modes of redress when aggrieved by a decree:—re-hearing before the same or another judge, appeal to the House of Lords,, and bill of review. A re hearing by the Chancellor of an order or decree made by the Master of the Rolls, or of the Vice Chancellor, is in part an appeal and governed in general by the same rules. 3 Daniel's Prac., 1602. A case may be re-heard before the judge who heard it, or the Lord Chancellor, in which case 58 it is generally termed an appeal although, in fact, it is only a re-hearing. 3 Daniel, 1617. A re-hearing before the Chancellor or the same judge, making the decree, opens the pleadings, and the cause is proceeded with exactly as if it were an original hearing. Ibid., 1627, 28, 29.

It is clearly not to this jurisdiction our laws can have an application as, very clearly, by the practice and general understanding, no new pleadings or proof can be adduced in the Supreme Court.

We have been referred to the case of Elmes v. Sutherland in the Supreme Court of Alabama, as decisive. The circumstances under which that decision was given are entitled to consideration; the Supreme Court of that State is a separate tribunal and independent of the Circuit Courts, and there may be, and undoubtedly is, a propriety in each discharging its duty as designed by the Constitution and Laws of the State; nor is it now the wish, or design to encourage on the part of the Circuit Judges of this State an evasion of duty, but to provide for the exigency in which the loss of one Judge, by having made the decision below, will incapacitate the Supreme Court for action in the case. The Judge, too, who makes the pro forma decision below, does not avoid responsibility, but actually assumes it, and a more responsible position in the court above. We learn that it was the practice in that State, whilst a system like our own prealled, to admit pro forma decrees. The same state of things also prevailed in North Carolina previous to the establishment of a separate Supreme Court. The decision in Alabama refers to the case of Brown v. Higgs, 8th Vessey 566, as authority on the subject, yet we find Lord Eldon to say: "Upon conversation with persons who are practiced in courts of equity, it has been thought that in cases of this sort the court might formally affirm the judgment and suffer the cause to go to the House of Lords," &c. But he considered it contrary to the duty of a court so to act, as suitors had a right to the deliberate attention and judgment of every court in every stage in which, according to the Constitution, the cause may proceed, &c. Brown v. Higgs. Now the objection here is not as to the power or right of the court to make a pro forma decree, but to its impropriety, an objection by no means applying to the cases before us, as the parties themselves ask us to adopt this course as the better means of attaining their rights. The learned Judge spoke of the practice as being different to his ideas of right; but suppose the necessity of the case 59 and the certain failure and denial of justice, had been presented to him, can it be supposed that he would have hesitated, or even that the Alabama Court would have refused, under like circumstances?

But there is another view of this case in our judgment no less conclusive. Appeals from decrees in chancery are regulated by the practice of the Court of the Chancery in England, there being nothing in our laws, nor in the rules of the Supreme Court of the United States, adopted by our laws (with the single exception that the appeal shall be taken within two years,) to prescribe the mode of taking the same. From an opinion delievered by the late Judge Baldwin, exhibiting a masterly analysis of this subject, we find the appellate power (that of courts of chancery,) is an assumed one, from the necessity of the case, being neither conferred nor regulated by statute. It may and has been exercised according to the exigency of the case and time as either may call for the adoption of new rules or orders which partake more of the character of legislation than the mere regulation of the forms and modes of proceeding in the practice of the courts. 4 Bridg. Eq. Dig. 50 pl. 49. Not restrained by any act of Parliament they permit or prohibit the action of courts of equity in cases appealed from according to their discretion. Appendix 777. 9 Peters 777.

It has been supposed that the general law regulating the mode of suing out writs of error and prosecuting appeals was applicable to cases in chancery, but we do not think so; it is true the term decree is used, but this of itself would not embrace them any more than the use of the word judgment in an act regulating chancery proceedings would include cases at law; the fact is that the terms judgment and decrees are in some respects treated as synonymous by the Legislature. Independent of this, there is such a contradiction between this law and the law as to proceedings in chancery, as to forbid the construction contended for. Besides, the law allowing two years for appeals evidently showed the consideration of the Legislature that they stood on a different footing. And, indeed, under that view, if a party in chancery failed to appeal within ten days he would have been remediless.

The court has already exercised the power of making rules for the practice in the Chancery cases.

It is said, however, that the judgment to be pronounced by this

Darden and wife vs. Lines et al.—Opinion by Justice BALTZELL.

591 Court in these cases would not be conclusive, nor of binding efficacy. If such a result were to follow, undoubtedly the court should not hesitate to refuse the jurisdiction. But we have not apprehended any such consequence.

This court itself, in Ponder v. Moseley, quoting the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States in Voorhees v. Bank of the United States, 10 Peters, 74 says: "The line which separates error in judgment from the usurpation of power is very definite and is precisely that which denotes the cases where a judgment or decree is reversible only by an appellate court or may be declared a nullity collaterally, where it is offered in evidence in an action concerning the matter adjudicated or purporting to have been so." 1st Florida Reports, 267.

In the case of Parkhill's administrators v. the Union Bank, the jurisdiction of the Superior Court of the Territory was considered by the Supreme Court, at the January term, 1846, under the following circumstances: The Union Bank obtained a judgment against persons who had been, by the same court, at a time prior to its date, removed from the office of administrators. In reference to this removal the Sup. Court say: "eo instanti the letters of administration were taken from her and annulled she became as to the suit civiliter mortuus." Sentiments to the same effect, declared by the Sup. Court of the United States, were quoted with approbation in the following language: "By his [Savage's] removal from the office of executor, he was a completely separated from the business of the executor as if he had been dead, and had no right to appear in or be a party in this or any other court, to a suit which the law confided to the representative of the deceased." Again: "Could an execution have correctly issued on the judgment against the defendant? It could not have been issued against the estate in the hands of M. A. Parkhill, because there was no such character in existence." &c. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Savage, also had said "the execution on the decree was unauthorized and void, and no right of property will pass by a sale under it, if one be made by the Marshal." Florida Reps., 127—130. Howard, 282. 17 Peters, 224.— At the last term of the court, in a very elaborate opinion delivered by the Chief Justice,it was asserted as an "essential principle of natural justice that every man have an opportunity to be heard in a court of law, upon every question involving his rights or interests, before he 592 is affected by any judicial decision of the question." Again: "No court is authorized to render a judgment or decree against any one of his estate, until after due notice by service of process to appear and defend." Although this was a case of attachment against a steamboat, and such vessels and ships, by the maratime law, every day are held to pass by constructive notice all over the world, still the doctrine of strict notice at the common law was held applicable to them, and an act of the Legislature of the State was held unconstitutional allowing judgment and other proceedings in the first instance against the boat. Flint River S. B. C. v. Roberts and others, Reports 1848, p. 113.

The judgment rendered in the case of the Union Bank v. Parkhill's administrators came again for consideration before the court at the last term, in a suit between Ponder and Moseley, and it was then held that the Superior Court had jurisdiction to give judgment so as to bind the estate of Parkhill—that the judgment was a valid one, and that a sale under execution by the Marshal passed the right of property to the purchaser: Ponder v. Moseley and other, adm's Reports 1848, p. 267.

But this court on two occasions, at their sessions of 1847 and 1848, has given an express and direct sanction to the consideration of decrees taken pro forma. In Bluett v. Nicholson, decided in 1847, the question of jurisdiction was presented in another aspect on an application to the court to decide a question not presented by the pleadings, which was refused. 1 Florida, 384. The case of Le Baron, & Co. v. Fauntleroy, was a case of importance, as well for the amount involved, as the delicate and interesting questions presented; it was argued with great ability; even new proof was adduced, yet no one suggested the want of jurisdiction. Florida Rep., 1848, 293.

At the present term, in the case of Edwards v. Moseley, the case as presented in the court below was varied, by the introduction of new facts, yet the point of jurisdiction was not raised, although unquestionably presenting an exercise of direct original action by the appellate court.

It is said that the question of jurisdiction is a delicate one, and the old maxim is quoted that consent cannot give jurisdiction. The force of both expressions, it is conceived, is misunderstood. By the first, I understand that a court will hesitate to embrace within their jurisdicition cases, or questions, or persons not rightfully the subjects of it—for instance, a State Court would be careful not to take cognizance 593 of cases exclusively pertaining to the United States Courts, or other courts, or of persons subject to their jurisdiction alone. It is in this sense, the remark was used by the Supreme Court at their first term, in the first opinion ever pronounced by this court. Stewart v. Preston, 1 Florida Rep., 1. But the fact is, that as well this expression as the maxim itself, is more appropriate to the courts of the United States than to the State Courts; for as to the latter, the jurisdiction is always implied, being courts of general jurisdiction, and in them consent will give jurisdiction. Beatty v. Ross. Without insisting on this, the language of all courts without exception is to amplify remedies, and without usurping jurisdiction, to apply their rules to the advancement of substantial justice.

The principle, then, upon which our courts of law act is, to enforce the performance of contracts not injuries to society, and to administer justice to a party who can make that justice appear, by enlarging the legal remedy, if necessary, in order to attain the justice of the case. Broom's Legal Maxims, 36.

The construction of the judiciary of the State gives facilities for the promotion of justice, by having the same judges to preside in the Circuit and Supreme Court, not possessed where these are separate tribunals. Does it not, then, become a duty so to exert the judicial power, arising from this source, as that public justice will be most effectually promoted.

For my own part, having undertaken to discharge the high public trust of administering justice, as provided by the Constitution, without sale, denial, or delay, I am not for regarding exceptions to its performance, existing rather in the letter than the spirit. I have no fear that a judgment of our's will be reversed by another tribunal, or that it will be set aside as nullity by another court. Surely with the precedents from the Supreme Court of the United States—those in this court expressly to the point—the implied jurisdiction asserted in Moseley v. Ponder, where judgment was given in a case where there was no defendant before the court—certainly there can be no question as to the jurisdicition. A motion has been made to withdraw the case, and send it back to the Circuit Court. To this, I cannot give my consent. In my opinion, it is rightfully here, and can only be rightfully disposed of by a decision of the case. I would as soon consent to have any other case taken from the docket, and sent 594 back without trial.

Justice HAWKINS concurred in the foregoing opinion delivered by Judge BALTZELL—not assenting to the view expressed in the last clause.

ROBERT MITCHELL, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, vs. JOHN J. MAXWELL, DEFENDANT IN ERROR.

Whenever a power is given by a statute, every thing necessary to the effectual execution of the power is given by implication.

Writ of Error to Leon Circuit Court.

This case, and the question involved in it, are fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Randall and Thompson, for plaintiff in error.

Archer, for defendant in error.

Opinion by Chief Justice DOUGLAS.

This is a proceeding, instituted by the plaintiff against the defendant, in the Circuit Court of Leon county, to procure a decree of that court to enable the plaintiff to cause the equity or legal right of redemption in certain property of the defendant to be sold by virtue of an execution at law, pursuant to the proivsions of an act of the General Assembly of 1845, Chap. 44, Sections 1 and 2, Thompson's Digest, page 355, 356, Nos. 3 and 4. Section 1 declares that, "from and after the passage of this act, equities of redemption, or the legal right of redemption in real and perosonal property, shall be subject to levy and sale under executions upon judgments, at common law or upon decrees in equity. Sec. 2, " that, upon application made by the party causing the levy or levies contemplated by the foregoing section to be made, the courts respectively rendering such judgment or granting such decree, shall cause the mortgageor or mortgagors, mortgagee or mortgagees, and all other persons who said mortgagor 595 or mortgagors, mortgagee or mortgagees, or any or either of them, shall state upon oath to be interested in said mortgage property so levied upon, to come into court and answer upon oath, what amount remains due and owing upon said mortgage—what amount has been paid, and to whom and when paid, that the value of said equity or legal right of redemption may be ascertained before the same shall be sold." By the record it appears that judgment was rendered in the late Superior Court of Leon County, in favor of the plaintiff, against the said defendant, on the 15th day of November, A. D., 1842, for the sum of $2,495 99-100; and that by virtue of a pluries execution, issued on the 20th of July, A. D., 1847, from the said Circuit Court, the said plaintiff caused a levy to be made upon the equity of redemption, being the legal right of redemption of the said defendant, John J. Maxwell, in and to certain real and personal estate, described and mentioned in a certain deed of mortgage, bearing date on the 13th day of November, A. D., 1839, made, executed, and delivered by the said John J. Maxwell to the Union Bank of Florida, to satisfy said writ of execution.

It also appears by the record, that a citation was duly issued, pursuant to an order of the court, made on application of the plaintiff for that purpose, and was served upon the Union Bank of Florida, and that said bank, by the president, John G. Gamble, appeared and answered. After which, the plaintiff obtained an order of the court under which a citation issued, and was served upon the said defendant, John J. Maxwell, requiring him to appear and answer, according to the provisions of the statute, upon oath, but that he wholly failed to obey the said citation, and did not come into court and answer upon oath, nor, indeed, did he answer at all, so far as the record shows. In this state of the case, and without and further proceedings in regard to the said defendant, John J. Maxwell, the plaintiff moved for a decree to authorize him to cause the said equity or legal right of redemption, so levied upon as above stated, to be sold, according to the provisions and directions of the statute; which motion, after argument and due consideration, the court overruled, and required the plaintiff to pay the costs of this proceeding. Whereupon the plaintiff sued out a writ of error, and assigns the following causes, viz: "The court erred in the construction of the statute relied on by the plaintiff, and in refusing to grant the order for the sale of the equity of redemption."

596 The record does not show what construction the court put upon the statute to which reference is made, and we are not able, therefore, to determine whether the first error is well assigned or not.—The second, we think, in the present position of the case, cannot be sustained.

The case, as stated upon the record, seems to be a proper one for the action of the court, under the second section of the act before cited; but all the steps, necessary to lay a foundation for the motion made, and for the overruling of which this writ of error is prosecuted, do not appear to have been taken. The direction in the statute is, not that the parties shall be cited to appear, but that the court shall cause them to come into court, and answer under oath. The citation is, doubtless, proper in the first instance, as the first process; but if such party fails to obey the citation, when it has been duly served upon him, some other step should be taken to cause him to come into court and answer upon oath to the matters, in relation to which the statute requires that he be called to answer. The object of the statute is plainly and clearly expressed. It is that the value of said equity or legal right of redemption may be ascertained before the same shall be sold. The reason for requiring this ascertainment of the value of the equity before the sale, does not so clearly appear upon the face of the statute itself; it doubtless was, however, that persons, disposed to purchase at the sale, might know the extent of the incumbrances upon the property, and, consequently, be enabled to bid understandingly. No one else can so well tell the nature and extent of the incumbrances as the mortgagor himself, and he is by the statute made a witness for that purpose. Although it may reasonably be supposed that he would generally be the best witness, yet all other persons, who the said mortgagor or mortgagors, mortgagee or mortgagees, or either of them, shall state upon oath to be interested in said mortgaged property so levied upon, are made witnesses also. There may be and often are, in such cases, other persons, besides the mortgagee, to whom the mortgagor has given liens and perhaps secret trusts, upon the property mortgaged, which may very seriously affect the value of the equity. Indeed, the very fact that such liens and incumbrances may exist, will necessarily render cautious men unwilling to bid, and thus affect the sales. Mortgages may appear of record which have been paid—fictitious mortgages, or other apparent liens, may so appear of record in favor of persons who never had existence, and there may be no one by whom 59 these facts can be proven but the mortgagor himself; and he, unless required by the court to disclose the information, may choose rather to withhold it, that he may, through the medium of friends, have the property bought in for a trifle for himself, to the great detriment of his creditors. It was to prevent such things as these, we think, that the provision of the statute was enacted. He should, therefore, be required, or to use the language of the statute, the court should, upon the application of the party causing the levy or levies, &c., cause the mortgagor to come into court and disclose these matters under oath, and when he shall show that other persons are interested, they too, should be caused to come into court and answer upon oath, as to the nature and extent of their respective interests. Unless this shall be done, he is a bold man who would bid for such property, at such a sale. The defendants, of course, would know the value and extent of the incumbrances, and might, by the aid of others, avail themselves of that knowledge, to defraud those whom it is the duty of the court, so far as power is given it for that purpose, to protect. We are not to be understood as intimating that any such fraudulent acts in intent exists in this particular case. None such has been charged, and we are neither authorized nor inclined to presume it; but it is our duty to expound this statute, according to our view of the purpose for which it was adopted.

It has been suggested, that, the statute has not declared the mode of proceeding by which the parties, upon whom it was intended to act, be caused to come into court, it cannot be enforced; but this is too narrow a view of the question. The law is well settled that, whenever a power is given by the statute, everything necessary to the making it effectual is given by application; for the maxim is "Quando lex aliquid concedit, concedere videtur et id, per quod devenitur ad illud." 9 Bac. Abr. Ed., 1846, page 220—citing 12 Reports, 130, 131. 1 & 2 Inst., 206. Witherspoon v. Dunlap, 1 McCord, 546. 3 U. States Dig., 483, No. 32. 1 Kent's Comm., page 465, note a, and Field v. The people, 8 Scamm. Reps., 79, 83.

If a subpoena had been issued according to law in a case pending in court, in which the testimony of a witness was required, commanding him to attend in such court on a given day to testify in the cause, and had been duly served, the court, if he failed to attend and had no good reason to offer for not doing so, would, we apprehend, be at no loss what to do, even if the statute had made no provisions on 597 the subject. Whether, were the defendants to stand out in contempt, refuse to answer and put the court at defiance, a decree for the sale might be made without his answer, or what insuch a case ought to be done as regards the execution, it is not necessary for us to say. We will not anticipate such a state of things.

This case is not properly before us; but if it were so, we should deem it unnecessary to examine the several interesting questions arising upon the charter of the Union Bank, which were presented at the argument of this case, as they have all been presented, very fully discussed, and the opinion of the court pronounced upon them, upon the cross writs of error in the case of the Union Bank and the administrators of Samuel Parkhill, deceased, at the present term of this court.

There having been no final judgment or decree in this cause, it must be dismissed and remanded to the court below, for such proceedings to be had therein as right and justice shall appertain.

Per Curiam.

DANIEL LOVE, APPELLANT, vs. JAMES GIBSON, APPELLEE.

Where money sought to be recovered under a count for money paid, has been paid under a judgment against the plaintiff, the record of the judgment is always admissible to prove the fact of the judgment and the amount so recovered. For such purpose it cannot be considered as res inter alios acta.

Where, in a suit against one of the sureties, judgment is fairly obtained against him and no collusion existed between him and the party recovering judgment or the principal obligor of the bond, if notice of the pendency of such suit has been given his co-surety, the latter stands virtually in privity with him against whom judgment has been obtained. The co-surety in such case is bound to avail himself of any defence he may have, and will not be permitted afterwards, in a suit for contribution brought against him by his co-surety who has paid and satisfied the judgment, to set up any defence which he ought to have pleaded in the original suit upon the bond, by becoming a party for that purpose. It was his duty to join in the defence to the action. Having failed to do so, though he 599 had full notice of the pendency of the action, he waives all defences he might have had; and in a suit against him for contribution by the co-surety the judgment is to be deemed res adjudicata.

The payment of a debt by the surety, on the fault of the principal is not deemed a voluntary, but a compulsory payment, and the action for contribution may be maintained, though no demand has been made or action brought on the original liability.

Appeal from Gadsden Circuit Court.

An action of assumpsit was commenced by Gibson against Love in April 1846. The plaintiff's declaration contained a special count setting forth that he and defendant were joint and several sureties for one John C. Love, on his bond as executor of John Colson, deceased, which bond was given in 1839, for $18,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of executor by the said John C. Love. That in 1845 a suit was instituted on the bond against plaintiff for the use of the heirs of John Colson, and a judgment obtained in said suit for the penalty of the bond to be discharged by the payment of $1,792.88; all which appeared by the record of proceedings in said suit. That in April, 1846, the plaintiff paid off and fully satisfied the judgment so obtained, with the interest thereon; by reason whereof the defendant became liable to pay plaintiff the sum of $1,396.40, being the aliquot part of the principal of said judgment.

The declaration also contained a count for money paid, laid out and expended.

To the first count of this declaration the defendant demurred, and to the other pleaded non assumpsit. The court overruled the demurrer to the first count and gave leave to answer over.

The defendant then pleaded to said first count.

1. Non assumpsit.

2. That plaintiff was not compelled to pay any part of the said bond.

3. That although suit was instituted upon said bond, as alleged in plaintiff's declaration, yet the same was not regular nor legal; nor had the plaintiff in the suit on the land bond any legal right of action against Gibson, the plaintiff in this suit, as surety for John C. Love upon his bond as executor, at the time of the institution of said suit; nor did the declaration therein contain any good and valid cause of action against Gibson; but the same might have been resisted and defeated. Yet that said Gibson did not resist said action, but per-
600 mitted it to proceed against him, and allowed judgment to be taken without availing himself of the want of a proper cause of action, and of the absence of all legal claim and demand against him at that time as surety, as aforesaid. That therefore the plaintiff has waived, abandoned and lost all right of contribution and recourse against defendant as co-surety.

4. That though there was a suit against Gibson as surety on the bond, as alleged, yet it was wholly irregular and illegal, and might have been resisted and defeated, because the said suit was brought against Gibson, the surety before recovery had against Love, the principal. Yet said Gibson, the plaintiff in this suit, did not resist said action but failed to make defence. Wherefore he has wholly lost all right to contribution and recourse against said defendant for any part of said bond not due nor payable by said sureties by law.

5. That by the 31st section of act of the Territory, approved Nov. 20, 1828, in relation to wills, letters testamentary, &c., it was and is provided that, "whenever it shall appear satisfactory to the county court or judge, on the petition of any legatee, heir or security, that any executor who has taken out letters testamentary on the estate of any testator, is either mismanaging or wasting the estate of the deceased, it shall be lawful for the said court or judge to revoke the said letters testamentary and appoint one or more appraisers of the said estate, or to require good and sufficient security, by bond to be filed by the said executors, for the further due administration of said estate." That prior to the date of said bond the said Love had taken out letters testamentary on the said estate of Colson and, on petition of the heirs was required to give bond according to law, and the bond on plaintiff's declaration mentioned was given under this requirement and was intended and declared to be in pursuance of said statute, whereas said bond is not, as required by law to be, conditioned "for the further due administration" of said estate, but was attempted to be made to cover waste before the date and delivery thereof done and committed by said Love, and to make good defaults already incurred. That the bond is void for the excess beyond the security, "for the further due administration" of said estate, and plaintiff has not been compelled to pay any money as surety on account of any waste committed after the delivery of said bond, nor to make good any default since incurred.

6. That though the bond was executed and delivered and suit situated thereon as alleged, yet that no valid breach of the condition 601 of said bond was assigned in the declaration in said writ, and no legal cause of action therein set forth; and that plaintiff was then and there so advised by the defendant in this suit; and before the rendition of the judgment in said suit, the plaintiff was called upon and required by defendant to defend and resist the action by all legal ways, but that plaintiff neglected so to do, and permitted the judgment to be rendered therein, and hath since paid the amount thereof, though not legally compelled so to do. And that therefore plaintiff has lost all legal right and remedy of contribution against defendant.

7. To the second count of plaintiff declaration defendant further pleaded that plaintiff did not pay, lay out and expend $3000 as alleged.

Issue was joined on the first plea. To the second there was a demurrer assigning for cause that the matter thereof, as set forth, amounts to the "general issue" and that the plea itself is uncertain, informal and insufficient.

Replication to the third and fourth and issue tendered—that plaintiff did resist and defend an action on the bond.

Demurrer to the fifth and causes assigned: 1. That defendant by said plea seeks to raise an issue upon the legality of the bond on which judgment was had against plaintiff as surety, and in consequence of which ,having paid the same ,plaintiff here sues for contribution. 2. That by said plea defendant seeks to make an issue on the legality and propriety of the verdict of the jury in the suit on the bond. 3. That the plea is double and otherwise informal and insufficient.

To the sixth plea plaintiff replied, tendering issue, that he did not fail and neglect to make legal defences to the action, nor permit judgment therein, but did defend said suit as advised by his counsel.

Issue was joined on the seventh plea of defendant.

The defendant demurred to plaintiffs replication to the third plea, because:—1. It does not aver that in the suit on the bond there was a good and valid cause of action against said plaintiff set forth in the declaration. 2. It does not contain a full and sufficient answer to said third plea. Defendant also demurred to the replication to the fourth plea:—1. Because it does not aver that in the suit on the bond there had been a recovery against Love, the principal, before suit brought against plaintiff, the surety. 2. Because of its not being a full and sufficient answer to the fourth plea.

Demurrer to replication to the sixth plea:—1. Because it does 602 not aver that in the suit on the bond a valid breach of the condition thereof was assigned in the declaration in said suit. 2. Because it does not traverse that he was advised and required by defendant, before judgment in said suit, to resist the same day by all legal ways. 3. Because it is not a full and sufficient answer.

The court sustained the plaintiff's demurrer to the second and fifth pleas—overruling those of defendant to plaintiff's replication to the fourth and sixth pleas, and sustaining defendant's demurrer to the replication of plaintiff to the third plea.

The plaintiff thereupon amended his replication to the third plea by inserting therein that there was a good and valid cause of action set forth in the declaration in the suit against him on the bond.

And afterwards at the Spring Term of the Circuit Court in and for the County of Gadsden, A. D., 1848, the Hon. Thomas Baltzell presiding, the cause came on to be tried, and a verdict and judgment were given for plaintiff.

From the bill of exceptions, it appears that, on the trial of this cause in the court below, the plaintiff offered in evidence the bond of John C. Love, executor, dated 13th April, 1839, on which plaintiff and defendant were sureties. Defendant objected, on the ground that, being a statutory bond,the palintiff must show that it was required in manner and forms as enjoined by the statute, but the court admitted the bond in evidence. Plaintiff then offered the record of the suit on the bond against him, showing a judgment for $2,792 80, and a receipt showing payment and satisfaction there of by him. A record from the Probate Court, showing the amount adjudged against John C. Love, executor, by auditors appointed to settle his accounts, which was simply the report of said auditors of the 2d of Sept., 1844, and the decree of the Judge of Probate thereon, given 21st April, 1845, was next offered in evidence by plaintiff. To this defendant objected, because the record contained no evidence of liability in favor of the plaintiff in the suit on the bond sufficient to charge the sureties—because, also, the decree of the Judge did not specify the parties, entitled, and, further, because it did not appear that the executor was before the court when the accounts were settled and the decree made. The court admitted the record, after testimony of D. L. White, (to which testimony defendant likewise objected,) showing that the proceedings were had at the instance of the Gibson vs. Love.—Statement of Case.

603 executor, through a petition which cannot now be found, and that he selected the auditors. D. L. White was at that time Judge of the County Court, acting as a Court of Probate.

Here the plaintiff rested his case.

Defendant then proved that neither the heirs nor legatees of Colson applied to remove the executor, or to lay him under security. He read to the jury the record of a suit against the executor as principal on the bond, and offered in evidence a mortgage given by the executor, Love, to Gibson, the plaintiff in this suit, to secure him against loss on account of suretyship, but, on objection from plaintiff, this was ruled out.

Defendant then offered the record of proceedings in the Probate Court, showing that the executor was removed in 1839, upon the application of his co-executor, Wm. Forbes, but soon afterwards was reinstated, upon giving the bond with palintiff and defendant as sureties. The record of these proceedings were offered by defendant, to prove that the bond was unlawfully executed and under coercion, against the consent of John C. Love, and to avoid being removed from the duties of his office of executor. Objection being made by plaintiff, the court refused to admit the record.

The counsel for the defendant then moved the court to instruct the jury as follows, viz:

1. That, to enable the plaintiff to recover for contribution in this form of action against a co-surety on an executor's bond, and for the default or devastavit of the executor, it is incumbent on him to prove that he was compelled by suit at law or in equity, on a valid cause of action, and after all legal defences, to pay the amount on which he seeks contribution; and in such action it is competent for the defendant to allege and prove in his defence any fact tending to establish the absence of any just cause of action, or any right to recovery in the legatees, heirs, or distributees, for whose use such suit was originally instituted against his co-security.

2. That a bond taken under the law of the State, regulating the duties of executors, &c., being a statutory bond, must, to be valid, pursue the terms of the law, and if varient therefrom, forms no ground or cause of action against the sureties thereon.

3. That such a bond, so far as it enlarges the responsibility of the executor, is void for excess, as regards the responsibility of a surety, and to the extent of such excess: and that it is the duty of the plain-
604 tiff, seeking to recover on such a bond against a surety thereon, to prove that the breach of the condition sued on occurred within the limits of the statutory liability, or after the date of the bond.

4. That, before the jury can find for the plaintiff, on the evidence of the settlement made before the County Court on the 2d day of September, 1844, they must be satisfied from the evidence as to what amount of the liability there stated against the executor occurred after the execution of the bond, and can find for nothing more.

5. That there being no judgment recovered or decree obtained by the legatees of John Colson, upon the settlement of accounts made by the auditors, and approved by the Judge of the County Court, there is no breach of the condition of the bond of John C. Love, as executor, upon which the securities can be charged, and that by reason thereof, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

6. That the order of the Judge of the County Court confirming the report of the auditors, and ordering distribution of the surplus, not specifying the parties entitled, or the sums to be paid to each, does not amount to a decree for distribution and is no evidence of a liability on the part of John C. Love, as executor, to the relatives, at whose instance and for whose use the recovery was had against said James Gibson.

7. That the liability of securities on executor's bond in this case does not accrue until a judgment or decree has been recovered against him as executor, and an action on such judgment to establish a devastavit has been successfully prosecuted.

8. That, to fix the liability of a security on an executor's bond, for the default or devastavit of the executor, it is not sufficient for the plaintiff to produce evidence of a settlement by order of the Court of Probate, without the further evidence of a judgment of a court of equity or of law establishing such liability, and that it is not competent for the Court of Probate to order or decree the distribution of the surplus remaining in the hands of the executor.

9. That the order or decree of the Court of Probate, of the date of 21st April, 1845, given in evidence of this cause, not determining the names or respective interests of the heirs or distributees of said estate, did not impose such a duty or obligation on the executor as that his failure to comply therewith fixed the liability of the securities for the amount decreed to be paid by the executor in such order or decree.

10. That no order or decree can be made valid or binding by the 605
Court of Probate for the distribution of the surplus of an estate, except it appear on the face of the proceedings that the executor had been cited to appear, at the instance of the parties interested, or had voluntarily appeared thereat.

11. That the securities on the bond are not responsible for the balances appearing in the account against John C. Love prior to the giving of the bond, if the jury believe from the evidence those balances had been previously appropriated to his use, and that the taking of the bond is evidence of a previous waste.

All which eleven instructions, or any of them, the court refused to give.

And the defendant also moved the court to give to the jury the following instructions, viz:

That the bond in this said suit, being taken for the due administration of the estate generally, while the statute of the Territory only prescribed a bond for the "further" due administration of the estate, it is the duty of the party seeking to fix the liability of a surety on such bond, to exhibit a breach of the same after the period of its execution.

That such securities are not responsible for any devastavit or default of the executor anterior to such date. Which last instruction the court did give, but added thereto as follows, to-wit: "That, prima facie, the decree of the Judge of Probate fixes the extent of liability of the executor and his securities; that it is for the defendant to show that any of the sums embraced in it, or the account alluded to by it, should not attach as a liability to the securities, as having occurred previous to the execution of the bond.

And further the court instructed the jury as follows, to-wit:

That a suit in favor of a legatee will not lie against an executor or administrator at law on the administration bond, the remedy being in equity.

That, prima facie, the order of the Judge of Probate, ascertaining the amount due to the legatees and ordering its payment, created an obligation on the part of the executor to pay; that, on failure to do this, his security on the administration bond might pay and claim contribution from a co-security, without requiring all the pre-requisites of a decree, a suit on the bond or devastavit, or other legal proceedings against the executor.

To all which rulings of the court, in admitting evidence and tes- 606 timony against the objections of defendant to go to the jury, in rejecting the evidence offered by the defendant, in refusing the instructions to the jury prayed for by the defendant, and giving other instructions by the court to the jury not moved or asked for by the defendant, be by his counsel excepted.

Randall, for appellant, argued:

I. That when, as in this case, there is no express promise to pay, the liability of a co-surety for contribution depends upon the fact, whether when the money was paid there existed a legal obligation on the parties-surety jointly to pay. We expect to prove in this case, that neither party to this bond has yet been placed in a position to become legally liable to pay, at suit of these relators at law. Skillin v. Merrill, 16 Mass., 40—cited 2d Stark. on Ev., 101, 102.

II. No cause of action did or does exist against Daniel Love, by reason of his pretended suretyship on the alleged executor's bond; that Gibson might have resisited the bond, and that his payment of a pretended and not a real demand against Love, could not involve the latter in any new liability.

We hold the bond void—

1. Because exacted by Judge of County Court, on petition of a co-executor, or on his (the judge's) mere motion, and not on petition of "legatees, heirs, &c," against the terms of Florida statute. Act of Nov. 20th, 1828, Sec. 31, Thomp. D., 210. 1 Williams on Exctuors, 130, 131.

2. If court did exercise a lawful jurisdiction and power in exacting bond in this case, then we say, the bond taken was variant in terms and effect from the one prescribed by statute, and for that reason void. United States vs. Linn, 15 Peters, 290, 314. United States v. Bradley ,10 Peters, 364.

3. That if not void "in toto" for these reasons, that, as it extends the condition beyond the terms prescribed in statute, it is void for the excess.

But we contend on the above authorities, and on reason that it is void "in toto"—

1. It is not valid as a statutory bond.

2. Not valid as a voluntary bond, and good as a common law bond.

607 If to be sustained as a common law bond, then it is only suable on by the individual obligee, R. K. Call, and not by his sucessors.—Governor, &c., v. Twitty, 1 Dev. 153—cited 1 U. S. Digest, p. 442, sec. 207.

In any aspect, not a ground of action against sureties—because it contains no proper condition, the breath of which would justify recovery against them. Archbishop of Canterbury v. Tappen, 8 Barn. & Cr., 151. 15th E. C. L. R., p. 177-'8.

III. If bond be valid, no such breach of it has occurred, as rendered sureties liable to action brought at suit of these relators. That Gibson paid too soon, and under no "legal compulsion."

Previous remedy should have been had against principal and exhausted, before resort to sureties. 8. Barn. & Cress., 151. Spottswood v. Danbridge, 4 Mum., 293, 296. 1 Williams' Executors, 363-'4, note. 1 Mum., 1, 12, 20. 2 Blackford, 52. 2 Mum., 24. 1 Wash. Va., 32. 1 Hen. & Mum., 11.

Thompson, for Appellee:

The parties to this controversy, James Gibson and Daniel Love, were sureties for one John C. Love, as executor of John Colson, deceased, for the due administration of said estate.

John C. Love made voluntary application to the Judge of the County Court of Gadsden, to have his accounts audited and settled. Auditors were appointed, who stated the account, showing a balance against the executor, and their report was confirmed by the court, who ordered the said John C. Love to pay over the balance so found due by him to the heirs or legatees of said estate. Upon his failure to comply with the order, separate suits were instituted against him and James Gibson, his surety—a recovery was had against Gibson, before the suit against John C. Lowe was brought to issue, and the latter was dismissed. Gibson, having paid the judgment rendered against him, brought suit in the court below against Daniel Love, his co-surety, for contribution, and having obtained judgment for one moiety of the sum so paid, Love now appeals from said judgment.

To maintain this action, the plaintiff in the court below was bound to show: 1. That defendant was co-surety with him for the principal on the bond, John C. Love.

2. That he was compelled to pay the money, and did actually pay it under such compulsion.

608 I.—The point first was fully proved by the production of the original bond, which on its face shows the characters in which it was executed by the respective obligors.

The introduction of this bond in evidence was objected to on various grounds: 1. It is said the bond is void because not required on the petition of a legatee, heir or security, as provided for in the 31st section of the act of 1828. Thompson's Digest, 210. That this is the only case in which a bond can be required of an executor—the spiritual court in England possessed no such power, and our County Courts do not possess it. That the requisition of the bond was evidently ex mero motu of the judge.

To this it may be answered, that the Probate Courts in this country possess a very general jurisdiction in regard to estates, and over executors, administrators, and guardians. A reference to the acts of our Legislature will show the express grant of powers never possessed by the Ecclesiastical Courts in England. It is by no means clear, that it is not the duty of the Probate Judge to require security of executors in every instance on the grant of letters testamentary, and such is the practice, it is said, in some parts of the State. Indeed, the section of the act referred to seems to consider it may or ought to be required. The language of the act is "whenever it shall appear satisfactorily to the said court or judges, on petition of any legatee, heir or security, that any executor who has taken out letters," &c. Now, if executors cannot be compelled to give security, unless they conduct themselves so as to be obnoxious to this section, how does it happen that a security is provided for in the enumeration of the persons or parties who have the right to complain?

It seems from other evidence, offered by the appellant from the records of Gadsden County Court, and rejected in the court below, that there were two executors of the will of Colson—that a petition was presented by Forbes, who was one of them, against Love, making sundry charges—that citation issued thereon, the parties appeared, and such proceedings had, that by an order the judge dismissed the complaint, and ordered both to give security for the due administration of the estate, by a day certain, or their letters would be revoked. On the day named an order was passed, noting the default and revoking the letters; and on the same day John C. Love applied for leave and further time to execute the bond, which was granted him. From all this it appears that the judge, from the proceedings before him, presumed from the conduct and ill feeling be- 609 tween the executors, that the rights of all interested in the estate were in jeopardy and required the bond for their protection. A general superintendence and jurisdiction over all matters relating to estates, testate and intestate, being given by the acts organizing the County Court, and the acts relating to wills and administration, and such an exercise of jurisdiction not being prohibited, it is not, I think, claiming too much to say, the judge was acting within the scope of his legitimate powers. This order was not appealed from, but submitted to, and the bond in question given.

If, however, there were any objection to the validity of this bond the appellant here, on being sued for contribution, cannot set it up unless he had given the appellee notice of it. Cave, use of Wallace v. Burns, 6 Ala. R., 781, 782. Ford v. Keith, 1 Mass. R., 139.

2. Another objection is, that the bond was exacted and required by duress, by threats of revocation of letters, &c., and is, therefore, void. It is not believed this can be seriously entertained, when it so clearly appears there was no duress—if the requisition of the bond was erroneous the party could have had full remedy against it by appeal, which would have suspended the execution of the order, until its adjudication in the Superior Court.

3. Another objection is that the bond is retrospective, and covers acts and defaults of the executor committed anterior to its execution. There is nothing in the bond, as the court will perceive, which indicates the intention of its framer that it should cover past defaults and such effect will not be given to its language. It is not susceptible of such construction. It is prospective in its terms, as well as effect. That it may and does cover property and moneys in his hand, unadministered at the date of the execution of the bond, is not denied; such, we contend, is its legitimate intention and effect. No devastavit is committed until the property or money is misapplied and wasted; and if such misconduct takes place after the bond is executed, the estate is protected by the bond from its consequences. The refusal by the executor to pay a just debt or a legacy, when there ought to be assets in his hands for that purpose, or to distribute the surplus, &c., &c., is evidence at the time of a devastavit. Ordinarily, it cannot well be otherwise proved. This throws upon the sureties of the executor to prove, by affirmative testimony, that an actual waste or loss occurred at some period anterior to the date of the 610 bond.

The Supreme Court of the United States say, in reference to a receiver's bond: "It matters not at what time the moneys had been received, if, after the appointment, they were held by the officer in trust for the United States, and so continued to be held at and after the date of the bond." 15 Peters' R., 208. From all that appeared in this case, the funds were in the hands of Love, as executor at and after the date of the bond; the first evidence of a devastavit is his omission to comply with the order of the judge to distribute the residuum in his hands.

The court below was evidently right in overruling this objection.

II.—As to the second point: that Gibson was compelled to pay the debt of which he now seeks contribution.

The fact of payment is not contested, but it is denied that he paid it under compulsion.

We hold it to be the law that the compulsion under which a surety acts, who pays the debt and seeks contribution from his co-surety, is not necessarily that of legal proceedings, such as a suit at law or in equity against him, perfected by judgment or decree, but may be upon a legal liability. Addison on Con., 228, 229. Lucas v. Curry, 2 Bailey, 403. 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 139, at top. Hamilton v. Cutts, 4 Mass., R., 351. Pitt v. Pursford, 2 M. & Welsby, 538, and American cases in note. Linn v. McLelland, 4 Dev. & Bat. L. R., 458. Goodall v. Wentworth, 20 Maine R., 324. Story on Contracts, sec. 885, 886.

If he pays without the compulsion of a suit at law or in equity, but on his mere legal liability, then, when he seeks contribution in an action against his co-surity, the onous would seem to rest on him of shewing such liability; and to this extent alone would the authority of Skillin v. Merrill, in 16 Mass. Reports, 40, cited by the other side, seem to go.

But if the surety who pays awaits a suit and defends it, and his co-surety has knowledge of such suit, or is notified of its institution and pendency, and did participate in its defence or might have done so, the co-surity is deemed and held a privy at law and is concluded by the judgment, unless he can prove it was suffered by the party by fraud and collusion with the plaintiff in the action. See 23 Smith's Leading Cases, 139, at top, citing Smith v. Compton, Eng. Common 611 Law Reps., 106. Duffield v. Scott, 3 T. R., 374, per Buller, Judge. See also Buford v. Buford, 4 Munf. R., 241. Blasdale v. Babcock, 1 Johns. R., 517. Kip v. Brigham, 6 Johns. R., 158. Cartwright v. Carpenter, 7 How. Miss. R., 328. Bond v. Ward, 1 Nott & McCords' R., 201. Burrill v. West, 2 N. Hampshire R., 190. Train v. Gold, 5 Pick. R., 386. State v. Colerick, 1 Ohio Cond. R., 638. 1 Greenl. E. V., sec. 116.

It appears from the sixth plea filed by appellant, that he had knowledge of the institution and pendency of the suit, and required the appellee to defend it. It appears also from the record, that the appellee did defend the suit, and paid the debt under compulsion of the judgment rendered against him.

This judgment we hold to be conclusive upon the appellant, unless he can impeach it for fraud and collusion—that it is not only evidence of recovery against Gibson, but also evidence of Gibson's liability and, consequently, of the appellant's legal liability to Gibson, for a moiety of the amount paid under it.

III.—The counsel for appellant insist, however, although no fraud or collusion is imputed by any of the pleadings, nor any question of it raised by the evidence, that the payment by Gibson, notwithstanding the judgment rendered against him ,was voluntary, inasmuch as he might have resisted and successfully defended the action brought against him, on the executor's bond of John C. Love.

1. It is alleged the County Court exceeded its jurisdiction in the order for distribution of the residuum, made on the settlement of the accounts of the executor,

For the jurisdiction of the County Courts of the late Territory of Florida, in relation to the estate of deceased persons, see Thompson's Digest, 195, sec. 1, ar. 1, and note (e).

2. It is alleged that the order is erroneous, in not ascertaining with precision the names of the persons entitled to the residuum, and the several proportions of each.

To this it is answered, it does not in any wise appear that the failure to pay over the surplus arose from any doubt or difficulty in this particular; if he was at any loss he should have applied to the court for its direction; but it is to be presumed, from the absence of any complaint, that the will was sufficiently explicit as to the parties and their respective interests. A similar order was held sufficient in the case of Lucas v. Curry, cited from 2 Bailey R., 403.

612 Neither does it appear that the failure to pay arose from the refusal to give a refunding bond—if one had been demanded and refused, the court would have protected the executor in his requisition. He has undoubtedly a right to have the bond before he pays over, but must refuse on the ground of its non-delivery. Chairman v. Mayo, 2 Hawk's R., 329.

3. It is also argued that in this case the County Court ought not to have taken jurisdiction, as there was an infant and a feme covert among the distributees, and the court had not power to protect their interests; they can only be protected in a court of equity.

It also appears that one was represented by guardian and the other by her husband, and no objection seems to have been made by the executor of any want of proper authority in either to receive, or any impropriety in their receiving the amounts.

The jurisdiction of our County Courts is stated in terms very similar to those employed in the constitution and laws of Mississippi, in the grant of powers to their probate courts, and there it has been held that the powers of their courts, in matters of distribution, are co-extensive with a court of equity. Carmichael v. Browder, 3 How. Miss. R., 252.

4. It is also contended that the order is not sufficient—that the executor should have been sued at law or in equity, and a devastavit fixed upon him by a regular suit, before the sureties can be called upon; and various authorities are cited, but they will be found, on examination, to refer to suits at the relation of a creditor.

Until judgment against the executor or administrator for the amount of the debt, and that he has assets to pay it, the demand of the creditor is against the estate. After a judgment of assets, &c., the executor or administrator becomes a trustee for the creditor for the application of the assets to the debt. It is then only that he assumes the character which he always bears to the legatees and next of kin, that of a fiduciary.

A recovery against an administrator is not a necessary preliminary to a suit by distributees against the sureties on the bond of such administrator. Owings v. Collinson, 3 Gill & Johns. R., 25. Williams v. Hicks, 1 Murphy's R., 437. Chairman v. Moore, 2 ibid., 22. Lucas v. Curry, 2 Bailey's R., 403.

5. It is also urged that the account taken at the instance of Love, the executor, is not binding upon his sureties.

Gibson vs. Love—Argument of Counsel.

It is certainly prima facie evidence of his indebtedness as against 613 his sureties, though they were not present at the time it was taken and the amount ascertained. See Treasurer v. Bates, 2 Bailey's R., 362. Lucas v. Curry, 2 Bailey's R., 403. Heard v. Lodge, 20 Pick. R., 53.

But we admit the sureties might impeach it by direct proof of errors, omissions, &c.; and in this case the appellant availed himself of the opportunity—went into an examination of the accounts, called witnesses, and in this bill of exceptions admits that he failed to show any errors therein, or to establish a devastavit prior to the date of the bond.

IV.—As to the exception to the introduction of the Hon. D. L. White to prove the contests of the petition of Love, executor, for a settlement of his accounts, (the loss of which was proved by the testimony of Gilchrist, the present Judge of Probate,) on the ground that a record cannot be proved by parol evidence.

It is laid down that, if a record is lost, after proof of its loss, its contents may be proved, like any other document, by any secondary evidence, when the case does not, from its nature, disclose the existence of other and better evidence. 1 Greenleaf's Ev., sec. 509.—1 Phillip's Ev., 386-7, and Cowen & Hill's notes, 1067. 2 Hayw. R., 243. Arg't of Haywood. 2 Murphy's R., 255.

V.—Appellant offered to give in evidence, in the court below, a mortgage executed by John C. Love to the appellee, on real and personal estate, to indemnify him against loss by reason of his suretyship; which, on the objection of appellee was rejected; and this is also assigned for error

The appellant did not offer any proof with it that anything had been realized by the appellee from this security, or that he might have done so without reasonable diligence. It is not indemnity to defeat this action until it has been effectual as such. The case cited at bar of Knight v. Hughes, from 3 Carr & Payne, 467, was one where the surety, who brought his action for contribution, had received money from the common principal to be applied to the debt.

If the appellant has any claim to share the fruits of this security, he should prefer it in a court of equity; and if a proper case was made before the court, it might, by injunction, restrain the appellee from proceeding on his judgment against appellant till the security was exhausted. But alone, it cannot defeat the appellee's action, or reduce the amount of his damages.

But there is another objection to its receipt as evidence. It is, if 614 it is to have any effect, matter in confession and avoidance, and, as such, by Reg. Gen. of January term, 1846, of the Supreme Court, should have been specially pleaded.

I have not noticed the error assigned in overruling and sustaining the demurrers to the pleadings particularly, nor have I entered into a critical examination of the various prayers for instruction refused, or of the charges given to the jury, because I feel satisfied, if I have maintained my position here assumed, they will be found to cover the whole case, and authorize an affirmance of the judgment of the court below.

VI.—Some exception was taken to the first or special count in the declaration, which, it was contended, was opened to the appellant by the demurrer to one of his special pleas.

The special count, is, I think, substantially good; but if found by the court to be defective, yet the count for money paid, laid out and expended by the plaintiff for the defendant, is sufficient without the general count. Upon this point, see Cowell, v. Edwards, 2 B. & P., 268. Pitt v. Pursford, 8 Meeson & Welsby's R., 538. Calton v Simpson, 8 Ad. & Ellis' R., 136.

VII.—It was also alleged that the appellee should have shown the insolvency of John C. Love, the principal in the bond, before he could resort to the co-surety for contribution. Held not necessary in Cowell v. Edwards, 2 Bros. & Pul., 268. Judah v. Micure, 5 Blackf. R., 171. Roberts v. Adams, 6 Porter's R., 361. Goodall v. Wentworth, 20 Maine R., 324. Olin v. Greenleaf, 3 N. Hamp. R., 270.

Upon the whole case the appellant seems to have had the benefit of every defence which he was entitled to, and that substantial justice has been done between the parties by the judgment of the court below.

Archer, in reply, contended:

1. That the bond upon which Gibson was sued was not a valid bond, and no recovery ought to have been had against him. It was taken contrary to the statute. The condition of it was so framed as to act retrospectively, and not prospectively, as required by statute.

2. There was no breach of the condition. The liability of sureties upon a bond of this character is to pay upon failure of the principal, unless there be something to the contrary expressed in the con-

Gibson vs. Love.—Opinion of Court.

615 dition. A refusal by the principal to pay is not a breach, because non constat he might be compelled to pay by suit. Before the surety can be made liable, the debt must be reduced to a personal liability on the part of the executor, or administrator, by showing waste—by establishing a devastavit—by proceedings at law, in chancery, or in the courts of ordinary, if the latter have equity powers. The County Courts, or Courts of Probate in this State do not possess such powers. They, therefore, cannot, by any proceedings authorized by law, ascertain whether there has been a failure of the principal or not. This failure must be ascertained before the surety can be made liable, and this was not done in this case.

3. The relators are not shown to be the proper persons to whom payment should have been made. The suit is by legatees, and yet neither does the pretended order of the County Court show the persons entitled, nor does the will any where show that the relators are residuary legatees—and if so, what were their respective interests.

HAWKINS, Justice, delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of assumpsit, brought by Gibson against Love, for contribution of this portion of the amount paid by him (Gibson) upon a judgment recovered in favor of Colson and others, upon an executor's bond. The fact of payment is shown upon the record, and is not contradicted.

It is not the intention of the court to take up seriatim all the errors assigned by appellant, but it will, in a general discussion, express its views and opinions to such extent as may be requisite to a decision of the case.

That the form of the action brought (count for money paid) is proper, there can be no doubt, and it is needless to cite authorities, but we refer to 1 Stephens, N. P., 324. 2 Greenleaf Ev., 93. 6 Meeson & Welsby, 168.

It is contended that the judgment against Gibson, introduced as evidence in the court below, was not at all conclusive upon Love, and that he had a right to make the same defences as if he had been primarily and originally sued.

It certainly is a rule that a verdict or judgment does not bind any person, unless he be a party to the suit, or be in privity with the party, or possess the power of making himself a party. The question here arises, is the judgment against Gibson to be deemed res adju- 616 dicata and conclusive against Love, owing to the facts and circumstances of the case, as shown by evidence, or exhibited by the pleadings.

Where the money sought to be recovered under the count for money paid, has been paid under a judgment against the plaintiff, the record of the judgment is always admissible to prove the fact of the judgment and the amount so recovered. 1 Phillips & A. on Ev., 507. 4 T. R., 589; and where the record only seeks to show as fact that the judgment was rendered, or the verdict given, it can never be considered as res inter alios acta. 1 Greenleaf Ev., sec. 538, p. 576.

It is not, however, to be considered as evidence of ulterior facts embraced in it, or of those facts on which the judgment is founded, unless the party against whom the action is brought had due notice of its pendency, and might have defended it; in which case the record is said to be conclusive as to all the material facts contained in it. 2 Greenleaf, sec. 116. The rule in relation to notice was laid down by Butler, J., in the case of Duffield v. Scott, et al., 3 T. R., 374, and has been adopted by able legal writers as a cardinal principle, settling the doctrine upon this matter, vide 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 139, 2 Greenleaf, sec. 116, and has also received the sanction of decisions of courts of the highest respectability. Justice Buller remarks: "The purpose of giving notice is not in order to give a ground of action; but if a demand be made, which the person indemnifying is bound to pay; and notice be given to him, and he refuse to defend the action, in consequence of which the person to be indemnified is obliged to pay the demand, that is equivalent to a judgment, and estops the other party from saying that the defendant in the first action is not bound to pay the money."

This principle is reiterated verbatim in the case of Smith v. Compton, 3 B. & Ad., 407, and is quoted as decisive authority in Kip v. Bingham, 6 Johnson R., 158. Swarthout v. Payne, 19 John., 296. 1 Wendell, 20.

The same principle is found in 4 Mass. R., 358, and in the case of Clark's executors v. Covington, 7 Cranch, 308, coupled with the proviso, that if the judgment is fairly and honestly obtained. In Bladsdale v. Babcock, 1 John. R., 517, a record having been offered in evidence, it was objected to, because the party defendant had received merely notice of the suit, and not notice also when the cause was actually tried. It was ruled by the court that the first notice to 617 defendant was sufficient, and he was bound to know all subsequent proceedings, without a special notice of the time every subsequent court was to be held.

In 13 Johnson, 226, no actual notice of pendency of former action was averred, but that the party was a witness in the former suit; this was deemed by Judge Spencer an averment of a fact tantamount. We have taken some pains to ascertain the true principle upon this subject of notice, for when correctly understood, the task becomes comparatively easy as to its application. The decisions we have quoted go to the effect to declare, that if notice in this suit has been given to Love, he stands virtually in privity with Gibson, as to the effect of the judgment rendered against Gibson, if that judgment was fairly obtained, and no collusion existed either between Gibson and the parties who recovered the judgment against him, or [illegible] principal obligor of the bond.

The defendant in his plea says: "And although true it is, that afterwards, to wit, at Spring Term, 1845, of Gadsden Superior Court, a suit was instituted against said plaintiff, as an obligor on said bond or writing obligatory, in the name of John Branch, Governor, &c., for use of John Colson and others, yet the said defendant in fact saith, that no valid breach of the condition of said writing obligatory was assigned in the declaration in said suit, and no legal cause of action therein set forth, and that the said plaintiff was then and there so advised by the said defendant, and was then and there, before the rendition of the judgment in said suit, called upon and requested by said defendant to resist the said suit by all legal ways and means, but that the said plaintiff to the contrary thereof failed, and neglected to make legal defence to said action, and permitted the judgment to be rendered therein, and hath since paid the amount thereof, though not legally compelled to pay the same."

Here is a clear admission by the defendant that he knew of the pendency of the suit, and that, too, in time sufficient to have put in pleas to the action. He says, indeed, that he advised Gibson that there was no valid breach of the condition of the bond assigned in the declaration, and no legal cause of action therein set forth; but does not this language indicate rather defects in the mode and manner of conducting the suit, than that no suit at all could be sustained? Why did he not, if he was so well aware himself of the illegality of the bond, say so in totidem verbis to Gibson? But he speaks in gene 618 ralities—he uses no definite language—points out no specific error, and gives no clue by which Gibson was to shape his defence.

The first case cited by us, (Duffield v. Scott, 3 T. R., 374,) was decided directly upon an admission in the pleadings. After Love had notice of the suit, and, as before remarked, it seems from his plea it was in time to plead, why did he not request to be permitted to join in the defence—unite in shaping the pleadings, and in fine, defend the action, although not a party to the record? What is the object of notice in these cases of co-sureties? It is to enable parties in interest to do these very things, if they should deem it requisite—and not, after the utterance of some general allegations of error, either to hold aloof altogether, or to stand passively by and await the termination of the suit; and then if, perchance, on being sued for contribution, plead a defence based upon an hypothesis, saying if the party had pleaded such and such pleas, judgment would not have gone against him.

If the surety has notice of the suit, and he does not choose to defend it, he thereby waives all the defences he might otherwise have to the introduction of the instrument to be introduced in evidence, and his right is gone to contest its validity in a collateral way in a suit brought by the co-surety for contribution, for it must be deemed res adjudicata.

If there was any thing to show that the judgment was not fairly obtained, the case would present a different aspect. But nothing of the sort appears upon the record. That the motives of Gibson were honest can scarcely be doubted, when he pays the whole debt, trusting to the contingencies of litigation to recover half only from a co-surety with himself. It is true, he had a mortgage, but this mortgage enured as much to the benefit of Love, after paying his portion, as to Gibson, the principle of substitution applying equally to cases between co-sureties and those between a surety and his principal.—Littledale v. Robinson, 2 Brock. R., 169.

The principal of contribution does not seem to have sprung from contract, but is based on a principle of justice and equity, that one person should not be singled out by the creator to pay the whole demand; and where this occurs, the law intervenes and places sureties relatively to each other in a state of equality as to the amount paid, and gives the party paying a remedy by action for contribution.

619 This right of action grows out of an implied agreement, that if one surety shall be compelled to pay the whole, or a disproportinate part of the debt, the other shall pay such a sum as shall render their common burden equal. On page 290 of 6th Wendell's Reports, the court remarked in relation to this subject: "The action on the money counts are resorted to as substitutes for bills in chancery, and ought to be encouraged, whenever the law affords no other remedy, and where a court of equity would compel the defendant to repay to the plaintiff a sum of money which the latter has been compelled to pay for his benefit."

It is said that there can be no recovery now, because the bond for which the original suit was brought is void, it not having been given in compliance with our statutes. In accordance with the views we have expressed, that instrument cannot be inquired into in this collateral manner; if there were objections to its illegality, they should have been brought forward in the suit against Gibson. It must be recollected that this bond is not sued upon in this case, but is introduced merely as a piece of evidence, showing the original undertaking and the liability of Love as a joint and several obligor. Nor was it necessary to the conclusiveness of the former judgment, that issue should have been taken upon the precise point, (for instance, the bond,) which was controverted in the present action; it is enough if that point was essential to the finding of the former verdict. 1 Greenleaf's Ev., 572—citing 2 Saunders, 159, note, (10.) 7 Pick., 341. Peake's Cases, 219. 4 Dallas, 436. Besides, the judgments of courts of competent jurisdiction are presumed to be well founded. "Res adjudicata pro veritate accipitur."

We feel ourselves supported in the position last taken by the cases cited by counsel for appellee, from Massachusetts and Alabama.—Ford v. Keith, 1 Massachusetts, 139. Carr v. Burns, 6 Ala., 780. In the first case, it was decided that a surety may recover of his principal, although the money was paid for him upon a usurious contract made by the principal, and which he might have avoided. In the second, it was held that where one surety has been compelled by suit to pay the joint engagement, it is not competent for a co-surety, when sued for contribution, to show that the note, as between the principal debtor and payee, was without consideration.

Besides these, there are other cases showing that, although the original contract was void, or illegal, or could not have been en-620 forced, if legally defended; yet, if the money sought to be recovered was paid in good faith, though technical defences were not pleaded, actions of assumpsit could be successfully maintained. See Firth v. Sprague, 14 Mass. R., 453. Here a party to a bond had paid on account of a breach of it by the principal, and brought assumpsit to recover the amount so paid. From the report of the case, it appeared that the bond was given in Turk's Island, and from the opinion of the court, it would seem that its legality was contested during the trial. The court say—"But the verdict was right, even if there was no law authorizing the requisition of the bond in this case. For admitting that requisition to have been wholly arbitrary on the part of the government of the Island, the surety who stepped in, in aid of the principal, has a right to indemnity, if he has been compelled to pay the penalty, without any fraud or negligence on his part." See, also, Riley and Wright v. Seymour, 1 Wendell, 143.—Swarthout v. Payne, 19 John. R., 296.

It is contended, also, that the payment by Gibson was a voluntary one, and that he was not compelled to pay.

The payment of debt by the surety, on the default of the principal, is not deemed a voluntary, but a compulsory payment. It is the legal liability that raises the presumption of a compulsory payment. Chitty on Contracts, 594. Thus, in 8 Mees. & Wels., 538, where one of two persons who, as sureties for a third, signed, together with the principal, a joint and several promissory note, on the note becoming due paid the amount although no demand was made, or action brought against him by the holder, it was held that such payment could not be deemed voluntary, and that he might sue his surety for contribution. 20 Maine Reports, 324. 3 N. H., 270. 5 Howard U. S. R., 103. Hale v. Smith. Judgments, too are presumed to be in invitum. In presumptione juris, judicium redditur in invitum." Coke Litt., 248.

A mortgage given by John C. Love, the principal obligor, to Gibson, and dated long posterior to the giving of the bond to indemnify Gibson as to his suretyship, was offered in evidence, but was ruled out by the court. What the party intended to show by its introduction, the record does not show—if to prove payments upon it was the object, and this appeared by the record, the court would have erred in its rejection, for Gibson would have been obliged to deduct any amount paid or reimbursed him, and he could only be entitled to contribution on the balance. Theobald on Pr. & Se., 267. But as 621 it does not appear by the record, that it was introduced to show payment, we cannot say that the court erred in ruling it out.

Upon a review of the whole case, applying those equitable principles of which we have spoken as being appropriate in this form of action, and being of opinion that the judgment against Gibson must be considered as res adjudicata, we think that Love is bound in conscience and in law to pay to Gibson the amount which he has advanced for his benefit.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Per curiam.

JAMES LANIER AND BENJAMIN C. WEST, APPELLANTS, vs. ELIZABETH CHAPPELL, AN INFANT, BY HER NEXT FRIEND, THOMAS MONROE, APPELLEE.

Where there was a contract to pay money to one, as guardian, by a company of which he was at the time a member, this was not such an union of the characters of debtor and creditor in the same person as to extinguish the debt—it merely suspended the remedy as to the guardian; though, in such case, the infant's remedy is not suspended, but he may sue by his prochein amie.

An infant, by her prochein amie, brought an action of indebitatus assumpsit for the work and labor of slaves. A note had been given to her guardian for the hire of the slaves, and the contract as to the time of the hire and labor was closed and executed. Held, notwithstanding the written contract that this form of action would lie.

Replication of infancy to a plea of the statute of limitations is good: and a rejoinder thereto that the infant had a guardian at the time the action accrued and long after, was held to be bad on demurrer.

Appeal from Gadsden Circuit Court.

The case was this: An action of assumpsit was brought by Elizabeth Chappell, a minor, by her next friend, Thomas Monroe, for the hire of certain slaves belonging to the estate of the said minor.—The declaration contained but one count in "indebitatus assumpsit" for the work and labor of the said slaves. To this count the defend- 622 ants who were sued as the surviving partners of a firm doing business under the name of the "Quincy Steam Saw Mill Company," pleaded—1. Non assumpsit. 2 Payment. 3. That defendants had delivered their promissory note in full satisfaction of the plaintiff's demand. 4. The statute of limitations.

On the plea of non assumpsit issue was joined by plaintiff. To the plea of payment plaintiff replied a denial, and issue was taken thereon.

To the plea of satisfaction by the delivery of defendant's promissory note, the plaintiff replied specially that the note fell due before the commencement of this action and never was paid, and that plaintiff was the legal holder thereof at that time. Upon which allegations issue was joined.

To the plea of the statute of limitations plaintiff replied "infancy." To this last replication defendants rejoined that plaintiff had a guardian. And to this rejoinder plaintiff demurred. The demurrer was sustained by the court and the defendants compelled to take issue.

Defendant's counsel praved the court to instruct the jury "That, if they believed from the evidence that the contract upon which this suit was brought was made by Lanier as the lawful guardian of Elizabeth Chappell, with the Quincy Steam Saw Mill Company, of which he was at the time a member, that the right to receive and the duty to pay united in the same person, and the debt became thereby extinguished."

The court refused to give the instruction and the jury found for the plaintiff.

The counsel for appellants assign the following errors:

1. The court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the rejoinder to the replication of "infancy."

2. In refusing to give the instruction asked by the defendants below.

Carmack, Stephens & Baker, for Appellants:

The record in this case presents the following questions:

1. Can this suit under the proof be maintained in the name of Elizabeth Chappell by her next friend, Thomas Monroe?

Elizabeth Chappell appears to be an infant, and the question occurs whether the contract upon which this suit is brought was made with her?

Lanier and West vs. Chappell.—Argument of Counsel.

623 The proof in the case shows that the only contract made was with Lanier, the former guardian of Elizabeth Chappell. If this be so, it follows that no other person than Lanier can sue upon the contract. If Lanier declines to sue, then the present guardian may sue in the name of Lanier for the use of the present guardian. The case of Moseley, Ex'r, &c., v. Williams, Florida Reports, 304, is in point.

2. No contract was made with the plaintiff. The contract was made by all the defendants with Lanier, at that time the guardian of Elizabeth Chappell, the plaintiff. He had the legal right to hire out the property of his ward, and to make such contract for that purpose as he chose. The right of the guardian must be exclusive.—If the ward may repudiate the contract thus made by the guardian for her benefit, then she can only elect to charge the guardian on his official bond with the true value of the hire.

The ward cannot repudiate the contract made, and set up another and different contract never made in fact. The defendants clearly made but one contract, and that was in writing with Lanier. The guardian and the other defendant cannot be bound by another.

They are bound by the real contract made, and the same can be enforced in a court of equity, if not in a court of law. This court cannot make contracts for parties, and therefore cannot treat as a nullity the contract made with the guardian and imply a contract made with a different person.

3. The court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the rejoinder.—The replication is "infancy." The rejoinder states that the infant, at the time the contract upon which suit is brought became due, had a lawful guardian, capable of suing upon the contract.

The replication is bad, because the action of assumpsit is not included in the saving clause of the statute of limitations in favor of infants. Thompson's Dig., 443, part 2.

4. The court erred in refusing to give the instructions asked for by defendant's attorneys.

Dupont and Thompson for Appellee:

The only point raised by the instruction prayed in the bill of exceptions is that "where the right to receive and the duty to pay unite in the same person, the debt becomes thereby extinguished," &c.—Whether the doctrine contended for in the prayer be true or not, it 624 is not material to enquire in this place. It will be sufficient for us to show that it is not applicable to the circumstances of this case, as developed by the evidence.

The evidence proves that James Lanier, one of the defendants, as guardian of the plaintiff, hired to the firm of which he was a member the negro slaves, compensation for whose services it is the object of this suit to recover. Now the doctrine above contended for will be found to be inapplicable in this, that "the duty to pay" was incurred by the copartnership firm of which James Lanier was a member, and not by him in his individual character. Indeed, he never took upon himself, in his individual character, "the duty to pay, nor could he have been made liable "to pay," but in virtue of his character as a copartner of the Quincy Steam Saw Mill Company. As to the "right to receive," this was also in his special and qualified character as guardian; and the duration of this "right to receive" was cotemporaneous only with the existence of his office as guardian. It is perfectly manifest, then that James Lanier who had incurred "the duty to pay," was a different character from the James Lanier whose right it was to receive this demand. If the doctrine contended for by the appellants be at all applicable to his case, it is so only to the extent of the "remedy" as presenting a technical difficulty in the maintainance of an action at law upon this demand by James Lanier; but certainly it does not operate to the extent contended for in the instruction prayed, to wit: to "the extinguishment of the debt."—Vide Bradford v. Williams, 4 Howard S. C. R., 587.

But supposing that, according to the technicality of legal proceedings, James Lanier in his two characters be considered as one and the same person, then we contend that "the right to receive" must be considered with reference to the date of the legal demand, to wit:—the time of the institution of the suit; at which period it is very evident from the testimony that James Lanier had no "right to receive" the demand, he having been previously dismissed from the guardianship of the plaintiff. Vide Richards v. Richards, 22 Eng. Comm. Law Rep., 119.

That the doctrine contended for is laid down too broadly in the instruction prayed will be made manifest by adverting to the very common case of a firm executing its note payable to one of its own members, or the stronger and not infrequent case of an individual drawing a note payable to himself. In these instances, it is true, that the technical difficulty of maintaining an action at law exists so 625 long as "the right to receive" and "the duty to pay" unite in the same person; and to this extent the "remedy" is affected. But it will not be seriously contended, that in the former case "the debt was extinguished," or in the latter that the note was absolutely "void;"—the utmost that can be contended for in these instances is that the debts are inchoate, and only requiring an assignment to impart to them full life and vigor.

In the instance just cited no action at law could be maintained so long as "the right to receive payment" remained in the payees of the note; but the moment that "the right to receive," passed out of the payees by assignment, and vested in a third party, the technical difficulty is removed and the action is maintainable; which conclusively demonstrates the correctness of our position that it is the remedy only, and not the debt, which is affected by the union of the character of creditor and debtor in the same person. Vide Chitty on Bills, 52. Ibid., 27, note b. 5 Cowen R., 711. 22 English Common Law Reports, 119.

The reasoning in the foregoing cases is much stronger when applied to the circumstances of the case at bar. It may be true that so long as James Lanier, one of the firm of the Quincy Steam Saw Mill Company, retained his office as guardian, he could not avail himself of the legal remedy to enforce the payment of this demand in favor of his ward, but the moment that his character as creditor was terminated by his dismissal from the guardianship, "the right to receive" vested in some other person and the technical difficulty was immediately removed. In order to show the strength of the argument as applied to the circumstances of this case, we contend that "the right to receive," or in other words the remedy was not exclusively with the guardian—the infant ward might, by leave of the court, have sued for this demand by "prochien amie," notwithstanding the existence of the guardianship; and we venture nothing in asserting that the court will never hesitate to grant its concurrence for the protection of the right of the ward, whenever it is made to appear that the guardian is derelict of his duty. 4 Iredell Eq., 117, 121. Vide 1 Black. Com. 386, margin 465. Thompson's Digest, page 326, paragraph 5.

It will be noted, in this connection, that this suit was prosecuted by "prochien amie," and that the plaintiff counted upon the original consideration, and not upon the promissory note which was given to 626 secure the payment for the hire of the slaves. The promissory note was introduced in evidence for two purposes, to wit: 1. to establish the value of the services of the slaves and 2, to sustain the replication that the note was still unpaid and in the possession of the plaintiff. Vide Chitty on Con., 593 to 599 and notes.

The propositions deducible from the foregoing argument and upon which we rely for an affirmance of the judgment are as follows:

I.—That the union of debtor and creditor in the same person, will operate an extinguishment of the debt only when that union has been effected by the act of the original parties to the contract; but that when that union is produced by operation of law, it does not extinguish the debt, but only suspends the remedy for the time being.—2 Williams on Ex'rs, 940. 1 Salk. R., 306—Wankford v. Wankford, by Holt, C. J.

II.—That in case of a guardian becoming a debtor to the estate of his ward, not even the remedy is suspended, for the minor may sue by "prochien amie," notwithstanding the existence of the guardianship. 1 Black. Com., 386, margin 465. Thompson's Digest, 326, paragraph 5.

But should the court be against us on these propositions, then we assume,

III.—That the point of law embraced in the instruction prayed and refused was not raised under any issue made by the pleadings, and, as an abstract or hypothetical question, the judge was not required to declare the law in reference thereto.

1. The point was not raised by the pleadings. Vide, Rules of Practice for the Circuit Courts, page 10, par. 3.

2. As a hypothetical question the judge was not required to declare the law in reference thereto. 1 Crauch, S. C. Reps., 309—Hamilton v. Russell.

From the nature of the evidence incorporated in the bill of exceptions, it is anticipated that an effort may be made to relieve the defendants from the obligations resulting from the general law governing "copartnerships," by an attempt to distinguish the company of which these defendants were members, from an ordinary trading company. Should this effort be made we then assume the following positions, viz:

1. That the "Quincy Steam Saw Mill Company" was a trading

627 company within the limits of its ostensible objects, to-wit: the sawing and vending of lumber. Vide Collier on Part., 657, citing 1 Swanst. 495—Crawshay v. Maule. Ibid., 518. 1 Jac. & Walk., 208—Jeffreys v. Smith.

In the authority above cited a mining company was held to come within the definition of a trading association, and we can perceive no good reason why the same character may not attach to a steam saw mill company.

2. That as to the power of each member of the company to bind the company by contracts, (even should this association be viewed as a joint stock company) the general law of partnership must prevail, there being in this case no deed of settlement, limiting the authority of the individual members of the company. Collier on Partnership 645, 652, 661.

3. As to the power of an individual partner to bind the firm, the general rule is, "that the act or agreement of one partner, with reference to and in the course of the partnership business and affairs, and the management thereof, is, in point of law the act or contract of the whole firm and binding on them, although it violate some private agreement between the parties." Chitty on Contracts, 200, 201. 4 Cowen Rep., 282—Reynolds v. Cleveland.

In the case at bar the subject of contract was the hiring of laborers to carry on and conduct the ostensible business of the company.

As to the saving in the statute of limitations see 15 Viner Abr., 104.

HAWKINS, Justice, delivered the opinion of the court:

Elizabeth Chappell, an infant, &c., brought an action of indebitatus assumpsit in the court below, against James Lanier and Benjamin C. West, the appellants. The declaration charges them as surviving partners of a concern, trading and doing business under the name, style and firm of the Quincy Steam Saw Mill Company, for the work and labor of the servants and slaves of the plaintiff done, performed and bestowed by them in and about the business of the defendants, at their special instance and request. The following note was attached to the declaration:

"On the first day of January next, we promise to pay James Lanier, guardian of Elizabeth Chappell, minor heir of Benjamin Chap-628 pell, deceased ,three hundred and thirty-five dollars, for the hire of two negro boys, named Edward and Henry.

JAMES LANIER,
Treasurer Steam Saw Mill Company.

January 1, 1841.

To this declaration the defendants in the court below pleaded—1. Payment. 2. That they delivered the plaintiff, before the commencement of the action, a promissory note for the amount sued for, signed by James Lanier, Treasurer Steam Saw Mill Company, and payable to James Lanier, guardian of Elizabeth Chappell, and that the same was taken in full satisfaction and discharge of the several promises in the declaration mentioned, and of all damages by the plaintiff sustained, by reason of the non-performance of the same, and was accepted of and from the defendants in full satisfaction and discharge of the promises and damages.

3. The statute of limitations.

To the first plea the plaintiff replied non-payment and tender of issue.

To the second plea, that the note at the time of the commencement of the action was and still is wholly due and unpaid, and that plaintiff is the holder thereof.

To the third plea, of the statute of limitations, the plaintiff replies infancy.

In the consideration of the case, we will, in the first place, notice the instruction asked for by the appellant, and refused by the court below, to-wit: "That if the jury shall believe from the evidence, that the contract upon which this suit is brought was made by James Lanier, as the lawful guardian of Elizabeth Chappell, with the Quincy Steam Saw Mill Company, of which he was at the time a member—that the right to receive and the duty to pay united in the same person, and the debt became thereby extinguished."

We cannot think that the court erred in declining to give this instruction. In such a case, we do not regard the debt extinguished, but merely the remedy, so far as respects the guardian, suspended. Of course, as long as the fiduciary character of Lanier existed, an action could not be brought upon the note, for the reasons assigned by the counsel for the appellee but to say that the debt itself became extinguished, owing to this temporary and fortuitous union of payee and promisor, would be, we think, as little in consonance 629 with justice as the rules of law.

As soon as Lanier ceased to be the guardian of Elizabeth Chappell, this peculiar character of Lanier, to wit, the right to receive and the duty to pay, underwent a radical change, and the duty to pay only remained. The books draw a clear and visible distinction between the acts of a party and the acts of law. For instance, where the debtor was appointed executor—this at common law was deemed a suspension of the remedy by the voluntary act of the creditor, and, therefore, the action was gone, but the effect was different, where the remedy was suspended by the act of the law. "Thus, if administration of the effects of a creditor be committed to the debtor, this, being by act of law, is only a temporary privation of the remedy.—Therefore, if the obligor of a bond takes out administration to the obligee, and dies, the administrator de bonis non of the obligee may maintain an action for such debt against the executor of the obligor." 2 Williams on Executors, 940. So, in the Commentaries on Equity, vol. 2, page 454, Judge Story remarks: "At law, a testator, by the appointment of his debtor to be his executor, extinguishes his debt, and it cannot be revived; although a debt due by an administrator would only be suspended. The reason of the difference is, that the one is the act of the law, and the other is the act of the party." 1 Atkins, 461—Hudson v. Hudson.

The note in this case was a valid one, and given upon a good and meritorious consideration, to wit, the services of the slaves of the plaintiff in and about the business of the defendants, and though the forms of legal proceedings precluded her for awhile from suing upon it, there is no reason, when these technical objections have ceased to exist, that it should not at least be considered as evidence of a contract.

There was here no voluntary act of the party, by which she was to be indefinitely bound. She had no option, no discretion to exercise, for all that was vested in the guardian; and inasmuch as he, by the act of law, could not sue, the remedy was suspended, until a new and different state of affairs arose.

Before closing this part of the subject, we will refer to the case of Richards v. Richards, 2 Barn. & Ad., 447, cited by counsel for appellee. In this case, a married woman being administratrix, received a sum of money in that character, and lent the same to her 631 It is admitted on the record and proven by evidence, that Lanier and West were partners, and after that fact is established, the act or declaration of either, relating to the subject-matter of partnership, is evidence as to the other. 2 Starkie on Ev., 44-5—1074. Gow. on Part., 63.

There is nothing upon the record to show that Lanier had not authority to bind the firm by his written admissions, or that there was any fraud practiced by Lanier in making these admissions. There is no new contract attempted to be set up by the plaintiff, and virtually it is the same as the written one. In any event there was a legal obligation on the part of the appellants to pay, arising from the consideration received, and to enforce this obligation, this suit is properly brought.

We do not think the court erred in sustaining the demurrer of the appellee to the appellant's rejoinder to the replication to the plea of the statute of limitations. We do not conceive that the plea of the statute of limitations is to operate against plaintiff, on account of the facts set forth in the rejoinder, viz: that Lanier was guardian at the time of the accruing of the action, and continued to act as such guardian, long after said action accrued to him. The remedy was suspended, as to action upon the note, so long as his character of guardian remained; but beside that, the suit is not brought upon the note—he certainly was not guardian at the time of bringing the action.

Although an infant may sue by prochien amie it is not a consequence that he must do so necessarily to save the statute. The right to sue and the privilege of availing himself of the statute are not incompatible. The law gives both. Besides, to say, that inasmuch as the infant could at any time sue, and not having sued therefore the statute cannot avail him, independent of depriving him of a positive right, it strikes us as a doctrine replete with the rankest injustice to a class of persons, whose interests the courts will go far to protect. Look at the results to grow out of such a doctrine. Suppose the guardian through negligence or dishonesty will not sue, or as in this case, could not sue, then, after the lapse of five years the debt would be barred according to this view. Such a doctrine we cannot countenance. In the case cited from Saunders, "It was said that the infant should have waited until his full age, because the six years had elapsed during his infancy, and therefore he could only 632 pursue his action according to the words of the saving clause of the statute, which is in six years (English act) after his full age, but this was not regarded by the court; and it seems to Saunders, that he may well pursue his action at any time within age, although the six years are elapsed. See for this case the case of non clarius in finis, 2 Inst. 519, Cotton's case." 182 Ballantine on Limitations. Our statute of limitations as to its proviso, or saving clause preventing its operation, is almost verbatim similar to that of 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, the only real difference between them being that our statute leaves out the clause "actions upon the case for words."

The same point taken here, that the word "trespass" in the saving clause of the statute did not embrace actions of assumpsit or upon the case, has been repeatedly decided that they were so embraced, as being within the equity of the statute.

In Chandler vs. Villet, Sid. 453, it was expressly adjudicated. An infant by his guardian brought action upon the case upon assumpsit; the defendant pleaded statute of limitations, and plaintiff demurred, and the question was upon this proviso, which saves to infants actions of trespass, &c., and it was urged that trespass upon the case is not mentioned in this saving. But the court were of opinion, that this saving extends to actions upon the case (as no doubt it was intended) for there is a saving of trespass generally, and all actions upon the case are trespasses (scilicet) trespass upon the case, and it shall be mischievous, if other construction shall be made." Same point also decided in 242, sec. 15, Viner, Ab. 104.

The case of Shandler v. Villet is reported at large in 2 Saunders' Rep. 120, where there is a citation of the case of Crosier v. Tomlinson, 2 Moad. Rep. 71. In the latter case the court said "that upon the whole frame of the act it was strong against the defendant, for it would be strange that the plaintiff might bring an action of debt and not of indebitatus assumpsit. Where the scope of the act appears to be in a general sense, the law looks to the meaning, and it is to be extended to particular cases within the same reason, and therefore they were of opinion, that actions of trespass mentioned in the statute are comprehensive of this action because it is a trespass upon the case, and the words of the proviso save the infant's right in actions of trespass." Fitz. 81, Ballantine on Limitations, 83, 185-6-7.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Per curiam.

Douglas, Ch. Justice, remarked: 633

That Judge Lancaster and himself, in order that their views, in regard to the first proposition discussed in the opinion pronounced in this case, may not be misapprehended or misunderstood, deem it proper to say that they have reconsidered the doctrine of extinguishment as laid down by Judge Lancaster in the opinion delivered by him at the last term of this court, in the case of Williams v. Moseley, 2 Florida Reps. 351 to 357, and find no cause to doubt its correctness, and therefore adhere to it; but that they do not consider the principles there asserted, as at all applicable to the facts of this case, which are very clearly, they think, distinguishable from those presented in the case of Williams v. Moseley. We have no doubt, continued the Chief Justice, of the plaintiff's right to recover in this case upon the second ground assumed. And indeed, we can see no good reason why she might not have maintained an action of indebitatus assumpsit at any time after the first of January A. D. 1842. On that day it appears that there was three hundred and thirty-five dollars due from the Quincy Steam Saw Mill Company for the hire of her two negroes. The contract was then fully executed. The authorities cited abundantly shew that, in such a case, indebitatus assumpsit will lie. And in Thomas v. Dyke 11 Vermont Reps. 273 it was held that "an infant may sue by prochien amie notwithstanding he has a guardian, if the guardian does not dissent;" and in Isaac v. Boyd, 5 Porter's Reps. 388, it was said that a prochien amie is one admitted by the court to prosecute for an infant, because otherwise the infant might be prejudiced by the refusal or neglect of his guardian. The court may control him as well as a guardian ad litem, and should permit or direct what is most for the interest of the infant." Longnecker vs. Greenwade, 6 Dana Reps. 516, 2 United States Digest 162, No. 111-163, Nos. 131, 142. The trust of a prochien amie (it is said, 10 Petersdorf 579) was first created by statute, though by long practice it may now be considered as one of the rights of an infant, and was intended to provide for those cases where the lawful guardian omitted to protect the rights and interests of his ward or was unable or unwilling to commence a suit in his behalf. 5 Porters' R., 394.

John S. Shepard, Plaintiff in Error, vs. William Kelly, 634
Defendant in Error.

The act of December 11th, 1824 in relation to the foreclosure of mortgages by proceedings in the courts of law, requires personal service of notice of the intention of the party to institute his suit. If a party acknowledges service of notice, or appears and pleas or confesses judgment, it is sufficient under this statute to give jurisdiction of the person of the defendant.

An agreement by a defendant, under his hand and seal to confess judgment is not a power of attorney to confess judgment and is not within the prohibition of the statute.

A decree or judgment of foreclosure need not contain any more specific description of the property than a reference to the deeds of mortgage filed with the petition, which specially set forth the property mortgaged.

A judgment or decree of foreclosure under the statute should not award execution against the specific property mortgaged. The law requires that execution shall issue thereon as in other cases.

The following statement of this case was made by the court before proceeding to announce its decision:

This was an action at law brought by Kelly for the foreclosure of two mortgages, which he held to secure to him payment of a debt or liability due to him from Shepard, the plaintiff in this court and defendant below, or at the time of making said mortgages, to become due, and be paid in two instalments as in the said mortgages expressed: one of said mortgages purporting and expressed to be cumulative to the other as security for the same debt or liability for the consideration of an abatement or remission of twenty per cent. of the liability for which the original mortgage was given. The petition sets forth that, when the first instalment on said mortgages became due and payable, the plaintiff instituted suit and obtained a judgment for principal and interest of said first instalment, and decree for foreclosure of all right and equity of redemption of or in the said mortgaged property—and in this suit he alleges the second and last instalment to be due, and prays judgment for that and a foreclosure of the equity of redemption in the mortgaged property mentioned in the said two mortgages.

Upon the petition filed in the court below by the said Kelly the plaintiff in that court, the following endorsement is made:

635 "In Leon Circuit Court. I, John S. Shepard, Mortgagor, defendant in this petition, do hereby acknowledge due and legal service of notice of intention of petitioner to institute this suit, consenting that said petition shall be filed as of the first day of the Spring Term, 1847, of Leon Circuit Court, and do hereby under my hand and seal confess judgment, and agree that decree of foreclosure be rendered at said Spring Term, 1847, of Leon Circuit Court, with a stay of execution till the first day of February A. D., 1848, eighteen hundred and forty-eight.

"Witness my hand and seal.

(Signed) "JOHN S. SHEPARD, Seal."

Upon this state of case the court, under and by authority of the act to authorize the foreclosure of mortgages in the courts of common law of Dec. 11th, 1824, Duval's laws, p. 38, gave judgment at law for the plaintiff, Kelly, for the sum of $9066.40, his principal and interest, and also for his costs, to be taxed by the clerk of the court, and also adjudged, ordered and decreed a foreclosure of the equity of redemption, against the defendant Shepard, mortgagor, and all persons claiming or to claim by, through, or under him of or in the mortgaged premises, in the said deeds of mortgage in said petition set forth and therewith exhibited, and that execution issue according to the statute in such case made and provided, with stay of execution until after the first day of February, 1848, according to the agreement to confess judgment. The following entry also appears in the record preceding the trial, judgment and decree above mentioned:

"Principal sum,	$7,727,06 1-4
"Interest from 1st Feby. 1845 "to May 1847, 2 y. 2 M. at "8 per c.,	1,339,34
"Due 1 May 1847, second instalment, Princ. and Int.	$9066,40.

"The above calculation I believe to be correct.

(Signed) "JOHN S. SHEPARD."

On 6th April, 1848, a motion was made to amend the decree entered in this case at the Spring Term, 1847, by inserting a particular description of the mortgaged property therein instead of the reference to the petition and mortgage, which motion was granted, and on the 636 7th day of the same month in open court an amended decree in said suit was made and placed of record nunc pro tunc, in which the mortgaged premises are specified. Upon which said proceedings, petition, consent and agreement of said defendant Shepard, final judgment, decree of foreclosure and amended decree, the defendant Shepard obtained a writ of error returnable before this court, and assigns his errors as follows:

First. The agreement to confess judgment is void under the statute.

Second. There is error in giving one foreclosure on two mortgages.

Third. There is error in the original judgment, because the property foreclosed is not mentioned.

Fourth. There is error in the judgment as amended, because it awards execution against the specific property only.

Fifth. The judgment is incomplete.

Sixth. It does not appear by the amended judgment how much of the original entry is meant to be retained, nor how much is meant to be abandoned.

Seventh. The judgment as it now stands is irregularly entered, and inconsistent in its several parts.

Eighth. The court had no jurisdiction under our statute to render judgment for the debt and foreclosure of the mortgage, because it appears from the petition that said mortgages had been foreclosed at a former term of the court, so that when this suit was instituted no mortgage existed to be foreclosed.

Archer, for plaintiff in error.

The judgment is entitled as by confession. This is error. The alleged confession, endorsed on the petition, was made before the petition was filed, and before suit instituted. This is proved by the endorsement of filing by the clerk, which is made in pursuance of the agreement, as a thing previous to the filing. A confession before suit is void under the statute, and the court erred in acting upon it as valid. The waiver or acknowledgement of notice is simultaneous with the alleged confession, but if it were prior in time, the suit cannot be said to have been instituted before the court by such notice, for the notice under the statute is not by judicial writ, but only by writing prepared and signed by the plaintiff, and is a notice not 637 of suit instituted, but of an intention to institute a suit in future.—This intention is carried out only by the filing of a petition according to the statute, and by such filing the court is first advised of the suit. From this latter date, therefore, the suit may be said to commence.

The agreement endorsed cannot conclude the plaintiff in error, so as to operate as a confession of judgment, or as a "general release of errors"—at all events, not as a "general release of errors," for these are the words of the statute. But if this agreement is no "general release of errors," then it can neither be a judgment by confession, or by agreement or consent—for there can be no such thing as a judgment by confession or consent, which is not "a release of errors." No appeal lies (where the court has jurisdiction) from a judgment by confession or consent, and, consequently, if the plaintiff's judgment is affirmed, on the ground that it is proper confession of judgment, and, consequently, a release of errors, then that is done which the statute prohibits, viz: the defendant is concluded from assigning errors in this court, by reason of an agreement made before suit. It is against the policy of the statute, that a defendant, before suit instituted, and before he has the benefit of advice of counsel, should be forestalled in his defence by injudicial consents, confessions, or releases.

2. The judgment is on two mortgages, which in the foreclosure are treated as one. Each mortgage is a separate security, and should be so recognized in the judgment, as well as petition. The decree should be in equity for the sale of the property first mortgaged—and if that was insufficient, of sufficient of the property last mortgaged to make up the deficiency. This is necessary to preserve regularity. Under the statute, I cannot understand how two mortgages can be foreclosed in one proceeding. A second mortgagee, holding a subsequent lien on the property in Kelly's second mortgage, would be entitled to redeem the property in second mortgage, by paying so much of Kelly's claim as the property in the first mortgage failed to pay. How could such subsequent mortgagee redeem, if the foreclosure were amalgamated, without being required to pay the whole debt, and discharge the property in the first mortgage? The irregularity in this respect is apparent, and can only be cured by separate proceedings on each mortgage, and as this cannot be done under the statutes without giving two judgments for the same debt, it would 638 follow that the foreclosure of one of the mortgages should have been had in equity. See the concluding paragraph of opinion of the Chief Justice, in the case of Parkhill's administrators v. Union Bank.

These objections apply to both the original and amended judgments. There is an additional objection to the original judgment, for which the judge in the court below quashed the execution in the first instance, and which gave rise to the amended judgment, viz: that the foreclosure does not name the property foreclosed, but refers to a paper, not part of the decree, for a specification of the property. This was clearly fatal. A judgment, to be regular and certain, should contain on its face, and not by reference, all the requisites of a judgment. For example, a judgment in favor of the heirs of A. B., would be invalid and erroneous, although it might be easily ascertained who were the parties entitled as such heirs. So a judgment "for the sum mentioned in the note appended to the declaration," would be erroneous for want of certainty.

There are also objections to the amended judgment:

1. It awards execution against the mortgaged property, and that alone, which is contrary to the statute, there being no "other cases" in which such execution is awarded or issued. Besides, this mode absolutely requires the sheriff to seize all the property, more than twice sufficient in value to pay the debt. But for the judgment authorizing it, such seizure would be a trespass, and certainly that judgment is erroneous which seeks to justify a trespass. Again: this process is an infringement of a right secured by statute to every defendant in execution, viz: the right to substitute other property in lieu of that levied on. Such substitution cannot be permitted under the process required by the judgment, because such process does not authorize the sale of any other than the mortgaged property.

2. The amended judgment is irregular—it is incomplete—it is but the conclusion of a judgment, and not only bad on that account, but it does not define how much of the original entry is retained, and how much repealed. Where is the point of junction, at which a union of the two entries takes place, is left uncertain. The judgment should have been entered as an amended judgment, complete, and entered nunc pro tunc in lieu of the original. For this defect, there is an uncertainty, which is fatal. The first requisite of a judgment is certainly, for by it the rights of the parties are finally settled.

Shepard vs. Kelly.—Argument of Counsel.

639 Thompson for defendant in error.

I.—It is alleged by the plaintiff in error, among other positions, that the court below had no jurisdiction of this cause, for the reason, as he contends, that the plaintiff had no existing mortgage to secure his debt when he filed his petition.

The counsel for the plaintiff in error and myself differ very widely on this point, for I contend that there was not only a valid and subsisting mortgage, but the question of "jurisdiction," as I understand the meaning of the term, does not arise in the cause.

1. As to the question of jurisdiction. This is truly said to be the power to hear and determine a cause. Now, whether the instrument sued upon is or is not a mortgage, is a question to be decided by the court when the parties come before it, upon the pleadings and proofs, and whether it decides affirmatively or negatively, it is the exercise of jurisdiction. So the very position assumed by counsel here could not have been maintained by the court below, if it had been urged there, except by the exercise of jurisdiction. 9 Bac. Abr. 245, tit. "statute," is cited to the point, that if a new remedy be given by statute in a particular case, this shall not be extended to alter the common law in any other case. I admit the principle, but deny its application to the case at bar. I do not contend that the statute of 1824, authorizing the foreclosure of mortgages by the courts of common law, alters the common law in any other case than that of mortgages; but in this respect I do contend, that it alters the common law in divers particulars, as will be hereafter shown. Nor do I consider the citations from the sup. U. S. Digest in anywise more favorable to the plaintiff in error, so far as I have been enabled to examine the Reports from which the notes are extracted. This is not a summary proceeding, nor does it profess to be, nor is it, in fact, so "stringent" a remedy as it is argued to be. The object of the statute evidently is to unite the powers of the law and equity courts in the application of a remedy—and while it would avoid multiplicity of suits, it favors the mortgagor, by greatly restricting, if not entirely abolishing, the old common law doctrine of foreclosure, which, in many instances, would bear rigorously upon the mortgagor. Instead of ordering the property to be delivered up to the mortgagee, and cutting off forever the power to redeem, it provides for a sale of the property under execution as in other cases, extending, ex debito, the privilege of redemption up to the time of sale, and giving him the 640 advantage of a sale, and the surplus, if any remained after the payment of the debt. By the common law, too, the mortgagee, after he obtained possession, and barred the redemption by his decree of foreclosure, might bring an action at law, and recover on his debt, whatever he could establish to the satisfaction of a jury the mortgaged premises were insufficient to satisfy. All this difficulty, and the vexation of the defence of a subsequent suit is avoided, by the equitable provision of a public sale to determine the value, and by a judgment rendered with the statute foreclosure for the mortgage debt.

The act under discussion is a remedial statute, and such construction ought to be put upon it as will tend to suppress the mischiefs intended to be remedied. 9 Bacon Abr. 257, tit. Statute.

The court is well aware of what the law was before the act—a comparison of this with the provisions of the act, will show clearly the intent of the Legislature, and the end to be attained by its enactment.

The case cited from 3 Humph. R. 313, arose under statute of Tennessee, which gave a summary and stringent remedy against a constable and his sureties, for a failure to pay over moneys collected, on a few days' notice to the constable only. Under this statute, a judgment was rendered against A. B., constable, and two other persons, not describing or averring them to be sureties, or to have had any notice of the proceeding. The Supreme Court very properly and justly reversed the order, the court below having no jurisdiction of the persons, by notice to them in fact, or constructively, qua securities. The two cases from 8 Porter R. pp. 99, 104, arose under a special statute of Alabama, which allowed the State Bank to recover of its debtors by motion, on ten days' notice, and in both these cases it did not appear that the parties were notified. The very summary, and I may add, penal character of these acts, authorized and demanded a most literal construction, and the decisions were doubtless right, but it is respectfully submited that they have no application to the case at bar. Assuming, then, that the counsel are in error in supposing the question of jurisdiction arises in the present case, I now proceed to discuss the other branch of his proposition, upon which he supposes the question to arise.

2. Is there a subsisting mortgage to be foreclosed? It is not denied that there was a large mortgage debt to be paid by instalments; but it is alleged that the mortgage, having been proceeded upon to recover the first instalment due, cannot now be enforced for the re- 641 covery of the other and remaining instalment.

The argument of the learned counsel in this court, it seems to me, is based upon an erroneous apprehension of the meaning of the term foreclosure in the act of 1824. Foreclosure, at common law, means the shutting out or exclusion of the equity of redemption of a mortgage—but this meaning is consistent with the provisons of the statute. A mortgage being held by the strict rules of the ancient common law to be a sale and conveyance of the thing mortgaged, upon condition—when the condition was broken, the estate became absolute in the mortgagee, and the mortgagor could not force the mortgagee to allow redemption, except in a court of equity; and if the mortgagee desired to cut off and debar him of his right, he might do so by his suit in equity, and, when decree of foreclosure passed, all right and all equity of redemption was forever gone. These strict common law doctrines have been departed from in most of the States of the Union—some by legislative interposition, and some by the action of the courts. The common law is believed to prevail with the most strictness in the New England States, Does foreclosure by our statute have any such effect? Certainly not; for although a formal decree of foreclosure is directed by the court, yet it is in fact but nominal. Execution is to issue upon the judgment for the debt rendered, with the decree of foreclosure, as in other cases. Until a sale actually takes place, the property, possession and legal right of redemption is not barred. If the mortgagor pay the execution to the sheriff, he defeats the foreclosure, and he has a legal right to pay. If the sheriff, by direction of the mortgagee, should refuse to accept the payment, a legal tender would be of equal force to defeat and vacate the decree of foreclosure. That the common law in this respect is altered cannot be denied. Even under the common law as it prevails in the New England States, payment and acceptance of the debt, or even a part of it, opens the foreclosure. 8 Vermont R., 164, 6 N. Hamp., 12, 5 Pickering R., 418, 4 Greenleaf, R., 495—showing that there the act of the parties may defeat a foreclosure.

Now, in the case at bar, if the decree had been rendered conformably to the ancient law, for a foreclosure of the first instalment, and the mortgagor had subsequently paid it, and the payment had been accepted, would it not defeat the foreclosure here, and open and vacate the decree? But it was rendered under the statute—in 642 which the judgment for the debt and the decree must be co-existent, and are dependent upon each other. The statute is imperative, that the mortgagor must set forth and show in his petition the amount actually due he must prove it by the production of his evidence of debt, and further verify it by affidavit—the court awards judgment for the debt thus shown to be actually due—the decree of foreclosure is, in effect, but a direction that the mortgaged property is the primary fund for its discharge, and execution by the statute is awarded as in other cases. In New York, there is a statute providing that the court may, in bills to foreclose, direct the sale of the whole property where part of the debt only is due, and apply the proceeds to the whole debt, with a rebate of interest for such part as is not due; and under this act the courts have held that they will so decree only in cases where the mortgaged property is incapable of division. 2 Johns. Ch., 486, 487. 4 Johns. Ch., 534. 5 Paige, 38. We have no statute upon the subject. Indeed, our statute of 1824, for the foreclosure of mortgages, does not provide for any order of sale; it directs execution to issue as in other cases, and which authorizes the officer executing to sell only so much of the property as will satisfy the debt. In New York, there is provision by law for a summary foreclosure and sale by advertisement; and, under this act, it has been held, in the case of a mortgage payable by instalments, if the whole mortgaged property is foreclosed and sold to satisfy the first instalment, subject, however, to the lien of the future instalments, the property is, in the hands of the purchaser in equity, the primary fund for the payment of the future instalments. Cox v. Wheeler, 7 Paige's Ch. R., 248.

In Alabama, where the power to foreclose mortgages is yet confined to the equity courts, they have held, that on the first default, a decree of foreclosure shall be rendered, and a sale ordered to satisfy the sum due, and other sales ordered as the future instalments fall due, until the debt is paid, or the property exhausted; and so in Maryland. But these are chancery courts, and the property is sold by order of the court, and it is the duty of the court to prescribe to its officer the mode in which the decrees are to be executed. In Florida, it is sold under executions as in other cases, and the general law directs the officer in the execution of the process.

If the counsel for the plaintiff in error are right in giving to the 643 foreclosure, under the statute, the force and effect of a common law foreclosure, then it would seem that the estate of Mr. Kelly, the mortgagee, is absolute at law and in equity, and he has the right to the immediate possession, with a demand for rents, issues and profits, since the date of the decree. If I am right, Mr. Shepard, the mortgagor, is still the owner of the mortgaged property, subject to the lien or incumbrance of the second instalment of the debt, which is now due, and the property may, by the statute, be applied to the satisfaction of the execution issued on the judgment.

The court will observe, that this question was not presented in the court below—that the judgment and decree was rendered by the consent and agreement of the party, and no opportunity was afforded of showing the vacation of the former decree, if, in law and under our statute, such a decree for the recovery of the first instalment, would bar and preclude the recovery of the remaining sum secured by the same instrument. It is not pretended that any portion of the mortgaged property has been executed or in any wise applied to the satisfaction of the former decree; but the claim to revise this, rests on the simple ground, that you have proceeded to recover the first moiety of your mortgage debt, and that proceeding concludes and debars you from the recovery of the remaining moiety, although the property on which it is secured remains untouched.

If there is anything in this objection, it is of the most technical character I have ever heard urged in a court of justice, and I have yet to learn that a court will give a strict and technical construction to a statute, which is remedial in its whole effect, to defeat a just claim. The defendant in error is entitled to every just and reasonable intendment, and, if necessary to support the judgment, the court will construe the consent and agreement endorsed on the petition, as a vacation of the former decree and judgment by the act of the parties.

II.—But this decree and judgment has been rendered by consent and agreement of the parties, endorsed upon the petition, and will the court go behind it for the purpose of reversing the judgment upon purely technical grounds? Various objections have been presented to this consent and agreement, and I will proceed to notice them.

1. It is said, the consent cannot give jurisdiction. This I have already noticed in my argument to show that the question of jurisdiction does not arise in the case.

644 2. By referring to the "consent," which is incorporated into the record, the court will have no difficulty in seeing that its object was the ease and favor of the present plaintiff in error. Its effect is—1. To acknowledge that he had received due notice of the institution of the suit, which is a waiver of the four months' notice which he is entitled to by the statute. 2. To agree that the petition to foreclosure should be filed that day as duly filed, which is a waiver of the filing four months before that day. Both these provisions of the statute are for the benefit and advantage of the mortgagor, and to enable him to have time for his defence, if he has any to make. Surely, a party at any time may waive a right or privilege which he has in law Can it be denied? But it is said he waived the notice; he did not waive the filing. Look at the consent: it "confesses judgment and agrees that decree of foreclosure may be entered at the same spring term, 1847," at which it is to be filed. He is to be presumed to know the law, and to know also when he is asked to consent, it is because the other party cannot enforce the act to be done. But is it without a surrender of some right on the part of the petitioner? Is it without a consideration? Clearly not. The petitioner, on his part, consents that execution of such judgment and decree shall be stayed till the first day of February, 1348. The whole arrangement shows it to have been the result of mutual agreement and concession. The transaction occurred at the spring term of the Circuit Court which was held in April and May, 1847. If this arrangement had not been made, the mortgagor had not consented to waive the requisition of notice and filing petition four months previous to the term, why, the mortgagee, it is presumed, would have given the notice and filed his petition in time to have had his judgment at the fall term of 1847, which occurred in the month of November; ten days after the judgment, his execution would have issued as a matter of course; and by the first of December, he would have been prepared to execute his judgment. Now, by the consent rule, he stayed his execution till the first day of February, 1848, thus giving to the defendant, the mortgagor, till the first Monday of March, the sale day, to pay off the execution, and thereby satisfy the judgment and vacate the decree of foreclosure. There is no pretence of a defence upon the merits, and the whole agreement shows that the defendant surrenders no actual right thereby, but it was, in fact, a favorable arrangement for him.

Shepard vs. Kelly.—Argument of Counsel.

But it is said the agreement to confess judgment, or the confession 645 included within the consent, is bad, for two other seasons: 1. It does not state in whose favor the judgment is to be confessed: 2. There is no sum mentioned for which judgment is confessed. It will be recollected that this consent, agreement, or confession, is endorsed upon the petition, which fully states the plaintiff's name, the amount claimed, and all other facts of the case. The consent being endorsed upon it, is to be held, taken, and construed as a part of the consent or confession, and is incorporated in it, and, therefore, complies substantially with the requisition, and shows the objections are not well founded.

The learned counsel, in conclusion, abandoning his design of restricting the consideration of this consent rule, according to its very letter, and without reference to the petition on which it is endorsed, next endeavors, by enlarging its meaning, to bring it within the objection of the statute against powers of attorney to confess judgment, and general releases of error before the suit brought. And the process is this: It is a confession of judgment—a confession of judgment bars a writ of error; therefore, it is a general release of error. The writing which but a few paragraphs before could not, by any possibility, be available as a confession, is now, by force of argument, transformed from a confession of judgment into a general release of error, and so obnoxious to the statute. The position is very forcibly illustrated by the story of the quack doctor, who undertook to cure an attack of fever, by turning it into fits—here, finding his argument not conclusive to himself, he changes his attack, and proposes by argument to turn it into a "general release of error," and then, says he, I can kill it by force of statute. The last effort, I trust, will be as futile as the others.

It is void, say the counsel, because the consent was made before suit brought. Now, as to time, if that be material to the validity, the testimony of the record is, that it was a simultaneous and concurrent act with the commencement of the suit, and was not before it.

III.—Another ground assigned for error is, that an agreement to confess judgment is void under the statute, and Thomp. Digest, 350, is cited. On reference to the statute, it will be found to be directed against powers of attorney, and general releases of error. It does not apply to the case at bar.

IV. Another ground assigned is, that there is error in giving one foreclosure on two mortgages. It appears from the record, that after 646 the original mortgage was due, the mortgagee consented to a depreciation of the amount or sum of money claimed thereon, and to a further postponement of the debt, and its division into two instalments, and the mortgagor executed a second mortgage, on other property, as additional security for the debt. The agreement is recited in the second mortgage. The debt was the same debt as in the first mortgage, and is is conceived that but one judgment was necessary. No authority has been cited on this point, to show its error.

V.—Another ground assigned is, that there is error in the original judgment, because the property foreclosed is not mentioned.

The decree mentions the property by reference to the original petition and mortgages filed in the cause. On reference to the books of practice and forms in the Courts of Chancery in England, the property is never otherwise described than as "the mortgaged premises in question;" but that it is argued ought not to be sufficient here, where the proceedings are not recorded after final decree—especially where the decree of foreclosure creates a legal state in the mortgagee. The counsel has just reversed the order of things in England—the decree of foreclosure is the evidence of a title in the mortgage, not defeasible at law or in equity by the mortgagor, and there a simple reference to the property as the 'mortgaged premises in question,' is deemed sufficient; while in Florida, the foreclosure so called gives the mortgagee no estate in the property mortgaged, but it is to be sold under an execution issued as in other cases, under ordinary judgments, and the purchaser takes the property by virtue of the sale under the execution. If the mortgagee obtains the property, it is by virtue of the sale, in the character of purchaser, and not in the capacity of mortgagee. No authority has been cited on this point, nor have I been able to find any.

VI.—Another ground assigned, is, that there is error in the judgment as amended, because it awards execution against the mortgaged property. In this, the plaintiff in error is mistaken. It awards execution against "the mortgaged property according to the statute." The judgment is, therefore, controlled by law; and if the law gives a recourse over, after the mortgaged property is exhausted, against the other real and personal estate for any deficiency, it may be had under this decree. The effect of the decree is to di-647 rect the execution primarily against the fund provided by the express covenant and deed of the debtor.

But if the counsel on the other side are right in supposing that the execution is, by the decree, restricted to the mortgaged property, it is still within the authority of the law, upon the maxim, omne major in se continet minus, it being within the power of the court. An act or judgment may be void for exceeding the authority given to do or pronounce it, when the excess cannot be separated from that portion which is within the authority; but no act or judgment has ever been declared void for not having gone so far as it might have done. Neither can it be declared to be error on the complaint of a party who is not injured thereby. The restriction is against the plaintiff or mortgagee, and he is the injured party, if any one is injured. If it is error, it is an error in favor of the party complaining.

VII.—Another ground assigned for error is, that the amended judgment is incomplete. In compliance with the intimation of the Judge below, the petitioners' counsel amended the judgment by adding thereto a specific description of the property contained in the mortgage, with the appropriate introduction, &c., and to which the court will be pleased to refer. It is contended that a full and complete entry should have been made as the amendment. In this objection, I apprehend there is no force.

VIII.—Another ground assigned for error is, that it does not appear by the amended judgment how much of the original entry is retained, and how much is meant to be abandoned.

The answer to this is, that from reference to the entries, it will appear most fully, that nothing was intended to be abandoned.

IX.—Another, and the last ground assigned for error is, that the judgment, as it now stands is irregularly entered, and inconsistent in its several parts. For the answer to this objection, I crave reference by the court to the judgment as it stands; the irregularities complained of in this assignment are not pointed out, neither is the inconsistency in its several parts shown by specification of the particulars. To the intelligence and justice of the court is it submitted by the defendants in error.

It appears to me that the several errors complained of, viewed in the most favorable aspect for the plaintiff in error, are of the most technical character—that no injury has been done to him, and that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

648 Long & Walker, for plaintiff in error:

1. The last error assigned (by leave of the court, and not discussed in the opening argument,) may, with propriety, be first considered, viz: That the court had no jurisdiction in this cause, because the plaintiff or petitioner had no existing mortgage to secure his debt when he filed his petition. The statute under which this proceeding was attempted, gives a court of law a very special jurisdiction, not only to render a judgment for the mortgage debt, but also to foreclose the mortgage. It is plain that the statute does not authorize the court upon petition, at the first term, to foreclose a mortgage, as is done in equity, and merely order the mortgaged property sold; nor does the statute authorize a judgment to be rendered for the debt merely, as at law, without a foreclosure of the mortgage. This is plain. In order to give the court jurisdiction at law to render a judgment for the debt, and foreclose the mortgagor of his equity or right of redemption by petition, at the first term of the court after the filing the petition, it is plain that the petitioner must not only have a debt due him, but he must also have a valid subsisting mortgage. This will not be denied. Now, it is equally plain from the face of the petition, that the mortgages filed with this petition had been regularly and formally foreclosed about one year before the institution of this suit. The petition states that the mortgages were due by two instalments, and that, for the first instalment, a petition was filed in Leon Circuit Court, a judgment was rendered on the 2d day of May, 1846, "and decree of foreclosure of all right and equity of redemption of or in the said mortgaged property," &c. If then, "all right or equity of redemption of and in the said mortgaged property" had, by "decree of foreclosure," been already barred and cut off, we think it beyond dispute that there was no existing mortgage. There remained no right or equity of redemption to bar or foreclosure in May, 1847, if it had all been "foreclosed by decree" in May, 1846. The only answer which has been made to this point is, that this decree of foreclosure of 1846, recited in the petition, was only as to the first instalment. This answer, we reply, is a mere matter of fact, for the language is, that "all right or equity of redemption of or in the said mortgaged property." Language cannot be more plain. No part of the property is reserved from this decree of foreclosure, nor any part of the right to redeem. In other words, all the right or equity of redemption of every part of the property is specially barred and foreclosed. From this view, it follows that, as petitioner had no mortgage, he had no place in court, and the court had no jurisdiction to render a judgment for his debt, in the summary and peculiar mode adopted. And here we may remark, that if the court had no jurisdiction of the cause, consent of defendant could not confer it, even if he had consented. The whole proceeding becomes simply and absolutely void. It is scarcely deemed necessary to cite authorities to prove that when a special, summary and stringent remedy is given to the courts by statute, it must be strictly pursued, in order to give the court jurisdiction. "If a new remedy be given by a statute in a particular case, this shall not be extended to alter the common law in any other case." 9 Bacon's Ap., title "statute," page 245. "Every fact necessary to give the court jurisdiction in a summary proceeding, must appear of record, to give the judgment validity; if they do not appear, the judgment is coram non judice and void." 3 Yer., 355. 3 Hump., 313—cited 2 supplement to U. S. Digest, page 253, par. 137. Bates v. Merchants' Bank, 8 Porter R., 99. Leverett v. Pl. and Mer. Bank, 8 Porter R., 104. Webb v. Brown, 3 Pike's (Ark.) Rep., 488. 649

2. But it is contended by defendant in error, that this judgment cannot be now reversed, because it is a judgment by confession, &c. Two answers exist to this position, either of which is deemed sufficient. In the first place, if we are correct in the first position assumed, that the court had no jurisdiction, because the petition showed upon its face that the petitioner had no existing mortgage, then it is sufficient to refer to the familiar principle, that consent cannot confer jurisdiction.

But, if the language of the supposed consent and confession of judgment is examined, it will be found to fall very far short of consenting to what was done by the court. This alleged agreement or consent is in the record stated to have been endorsed on the petition, and is without date. The record states that the petition was filed on the first day of the Spring term, 1847, of the court. It was, then, certainly so written and endorsed on the petition that day, or some previous day. It clearly is not any manner of pleading, for the only pleading allowed under our statute for the "foreclosure of mortgages at common law," is declared to be "objections," which must be filed fifteen days before court. It is no confession of judgment, for that must be ore tenus, in the presence of the court, and addressed to it. This supposed confession of judgment could not be made to the petitioner, for he could make no use of it, or make it a matter of record. It must be, then, a mere agreement between the plaintiff and defendant, before the filing of the petition, or at that time, and an admission of certain facts. Now, what is thus admitted and agreed to?—In the first place, he acknowledges "due and legal service of notice of intention of petitioner to institute this suit"—that is, he had been notified for four months of this intention. In the next place, he is "consenting that said petition (no petition having been previously mentioned) shall be filed as of the first day of the Spring Term, 1847, of Leon Circuit Court"—that is, he agreed that petitioner might that day file his petition—a thing he had as good a right to do before as after this agreement, so far as we can perceive. "And I do hereby, under my hand and seal, confess judgment, and agree that decree of foreclosure be rendered at said Spring Term, 1847, of Leon Circuit Court, with a stay of execution till the 1st day of February, A. D., 1848." Now, if this confession had been made to the Court, as it must have been to be of any force, and as it clearly was not in fact, it is to be observed that he does not also confess foreclosure, but only agrees that a decree for that purpose may be rendered at the Spring Term, 1847. Now, does all this give the court jurisdiction? The petition was only filed on the first day of the term, and Shepard only admits that fact. It should have been filed four months before that time. This is admitted by the counsel for defendant in error, for he contends that that must be inferred from the language of the statute, and from the provision that defendant must, if he defends at all, file his objections fifteen days before court. On this point the language of the statute is imperative, and not merely directory, viz: "And the said petition, together with the original mortgage, shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the court to which the application for foreclosure shall be made, at least four months when the foreclosure is to be of real property, and two months when it is to be of slaves, or other personal property, before the term of the court at which the judgment of foreclosure shall or can be demanded or rendered." Thomp. Dig. 376. Now the judgment is to be rendered by the court, and the terms shall or can as strictly apply to its action, to wit: the rendering of judgment, as to the action of petitioner, to wit: the demanding a judgment. Leave out the word "demanded" and the sentence would read that the petition, &c., shall be filed four months 650

651 before the judgment "shall or can be rendered." Is not all distinction destroyed between summary and special remedies by statute, and matters of ordinary common law jurisdiction, if the court may or can render judgment under this statute when the petition has not been filed the length of time prescribed by its express terms? Has Shepard waived this irregularity? Surely not. The courts, as we have before remarked, can only get jurisdiction in pursuance of the statute—that is by having the petition filed four months before court, with notice to defendant. The notice is admitted, but not the filing according to law.

We will barely suggest, what must be too apparent to need illustration, that a judgment cannot be confessed under hand and seal—the thing is absurd, and without meaning. "The rendering a judgment is a judicial act, to be done by the court only." Mathews v. Moore, 2 Mur., 181. It is plain this endorsement on the back of the petition is the cause of the rendition of this judgment, and that the same is and was not a legal sufficient cause therefor. It is plain that the recital in the face of the decree that the petition had been 'duly filed,' is contradicted by other parts of the record, which show it was not filed four months before court, but only on the first day thereof.

Again: This pretended confession of judgment is bad for two reasons not yet mentioned. First, it does not state in whose favor the judgment is so confessed. The name of the petitioner is neither stated in the caption nor in the body of the instrument. If this is a confession that somebody may have judgment, it does not say who, and no one will pretend that a court can do more than record the confession as made, whether in writing or verbally. Secondly there is no sum mentioned for which judgment is so confessed under hand and seal. This point has been expressly ruled by the Supreme Court of New York, where it is laid down that "a confession of judgment ought to be for a certain and specified sum." Nicholas vs. Hewett, 4 John Rep., 423. In that case, pending its trial in the court below, the parties referred the same to arbitrators. Before the award was known or punished, the court inquired whether the judgment should be confessed, according to the award when made. To this both parties agreed, and shortly thereafter the award came into court, and was entered accordingly for one of the parties. This judgment was reversed on error, upon the express ground that the confession of judgment was for no particular sum.

652 Again: But, if for the sake of argument, this could be construed into a confession of judgment, and consequent waiver of errors, the record does plainly show that the same was made before suit brought, and it is therefore void by our statute. Thompson's Dig., 350. This statute not only makes void all powers of attorney for confessing or suffering judgments to pass, &c., made before action brought, but also expressly makes void "all general releases of error." If this be a release of error at all, it is only so because it is a confession of judgment, and therefore sufficiently general to be embraced within the terms of this statute. The question of fact then only remains: was it made before or after "action brought?" If this action was ever legally brought at all, and this is questionable, it certainly was not until the petition was filed. Now upon examination of the record, it will abundantly appear that this endorsement was upon the petition when handed to the clerk and filed. The clerk would not have permitted a record to be so endorsed, after it was filed, and the record expressly sets it forth as an endorsement on the petition. No process had issued from nor any paper filed in the court before, and Shepard had only been notified of an intention to institute the suit. From this view of the subject it becomes apparent that if it be possible to confess a valid judgment in a suit before it is instituted, a thing little short of absurd, still such a confession, under our statute, does not operate a general release of error, as in other cases of confession of judgment. It cannot be said that this release of error is not meant by our statute, as it is only a release implied by law from the fact of confessing the judgment—assuming that a judgment can be confessed before action brought—because the words of the statute are "all general releases of error." "All" includes implied releases as well as express.

It is contended by counsel for defendant in error, that in fact the amended decree does not restrict the execution to be issued thereon from issuing as "in other cases," viz: against the goods and chattels, lands, and tenements of defendant. It is also admitted that if this error does exist in fact, it is well assigned if it and all other errors were not waived by confessing judgment, &c. That it is not waived, we have endeavored to show, and will only refer to the language of the decree to prove that it exists in fact. Petitioner is to have execution against "said mortgaged property according to the statute," &c. The mortgaged property and no other is mentioned of which execution shall be had—whether such execution is to be 653

according to statute or otherwise. But does this reference to the statute help the matter? Is the Clerk to judge what statute is referred to; and then judge what the statute requires? This would be too uncertain. This has been expressly decided in the case of Harman v. Childress, 3 Yerger, 426.

To recapitulate briefly:

1. The judgment is void, for want of jurisdiction in the court. 1. Because the petitioner had no valid existing deed of mortgage, the same having been foreclosed a year before; and 2. Because the petition under our statute had not been filed four months before the term of the court at which the judgment was rendered—and if this be true, consent, if given, cannot confer jurisdiction.

2. The judgment is erroneous, if not void. 1. Because the endorsement of Shepard upon the petition, which is relied upon to justify the rendition of the same, was made before the filing of petition or institution of the suit. 2. Because the pretended confession of judgment does not mention the person in whose favor the confession is made. 3. Because no sum or amount is named, for which judgment is confessed. We will not add to the argument of our colleague (Mr. Archer) upon the other errors assigned.

The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded with instructions to dismiss the petition.

LANCASTER, Justice, delivered the opinion of the court.

The last assignment of error is first noticed in the briefs of counsel, and will, therefore, be first disposed of by this court. It alleges the court had no jurisdiction, under the statute, to render judgment for the debt, and foreclosure of the mortgages, because from the petition, it appears the mortgages had been foreclosed at a former term of the court, when judgment was rendered for an instalment due on them, and therefore, there remained no mortgages now to foreclose. Admitting the facts to be correct, it is difficult to see how they affect the jurisdiction of the court. Jurisdiction consists in authority to try the subject-matter of the suit, and over the person of the defendant. These two requisites attaching, it would be difficult, if not impracticable, successfully to assail the jurisdiction even of a court of special powers. But that the Circuit Courts of this State are courts of general original jurisdiction, will be abundantly manifest 654 to every one who reads the 6th clause of the 5th article of our State Constitution: "The Circuit Courts shall have original jurisdiction in all matters, civil and criminal, within this State, not otherwise excepted in this Constitution;" and by the 8th clause of the same article, they are invested with the original equity jurisdiction, until the General Assembly shall establish and organize a separate equity court or courts with that jurisdiction. That has not yet been done, and it is not known that the Constitution makes any other exception to the original jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts.

The Circuit Court was then a court of general original jurisdiction, and having jurisdiction of the foreclosure of mortgages, this suit was brought to foreclose the mortgages therein set forth, as well as for judgments for the sum alleged to be secured by them, as owing and due from defendant to plaintiff in the action. This was the subject-matter of the suit, and we apprehend no one will seriously deny the jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts over such a subject-matter. But that the jurisdiction may properly attach to render judgment, it is necessary also for the court to have jurisdiction of the party defendant. The ordinary mode to acquire this jurisdiction over the party defendant is by summons ad respondendum, admonishing him to appear in court and defend against the suit. By law this summons should be served on the defendant by the officer of the court, at least ten days before the first day of the term; yet an acknowledgment of service endorsed on the writ by the defendant, or an appearance in court and plea to the merits, or confession of judgment, will be sufficient evidence of the court's jurisdiction over the person of the defendant, and so, it is believed, has been the uniform practice in the courts, from the date of the act to regulate judicial proceedings.

These proceedings were instituted under the act of December 11th, 1824, before referred to, which authorizes courts of law, in addition to the power before possessed, of rendering judgment for the debt due plaintiff by defendant, to foreclose a mortgage given to secure its payment, and to issue execution as in other cases. But in this particular case, the law requires personal service of notice of the intention of the party to institute his suit, and that service of this notice shall be made by the officer appointed to serve writs issuing out of and returnable to said court, four months, when the foreclosure is to be of real property, before the term of the court at which judg-

Shepard vs. Kelly.—Opinion of Court.

655 ment shall be rendered. It also requires that the petition for judgment and foreclosure, together with the original mortgage, shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the court, at least four months before the term of the court, at which judgment of foreclosure of real estate shall or can be demanded or rendered.

These provisions are clearly intended for the benefit and protection of the defendant, and he has an undoubted right to insist upon their literal and full performance, before a valid judgment and foreclosure on a mortgage can be rendered against him, unless he thinks proper to waive them.

The former was intended, perhaps, partly to afford him time to redeem, as well as time to prepare for his defence; the latter that he might understand and inspect the demand against him, as well as afford him time to mould that defence. If it was shown the subject matter of this suit was not comprehended by the statute of 1824, or it was doubtfully comprehended, or that a prior judgment at law had been given upon the identical demand for which this suit was instituted, according to the decisions of this court, in 1 Flor. R., 182, the statute affording a new remedy should be rigidly construed, so as not to take jurisdiction in any doubtful case. The requirement of a statute for bringing a party defendant before the court is never so rigidly, but only substantially observed. The act of 1828, regulating judicial proceedings, provides for issuing process at the commencement of actions at law, (different from the common law writ of capias ad respondendum,) which, by the act, is to be served by the officer at least ten days before the first day of the term to which it is returnable. By the common law, it is required to have the body of the defendant in custody, to give the court jurisdiction of the person; yet here a summons, regularly served, as required by the act of 1828, gives the court jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. This act greatly modifies, in many respects, the practice as at common law, yet no one has thought or claimed that it should be construed strictly. The courts in practice have held, if a party acknowledges services on the back of the writ, it is good. If a party file a declaration, and the defendant plead thereto by confession of judgment, without writ issued or served, it is good Yet the statute no where by express enactment provides for these cases, but they have been continually held to be within the reason of the act; and this practice, upon a sound construction of the statute, it is not doubted 656 is correct. The court can discern no good reason why the statute of 1824, to regulate the foreclosure of mortgages at common law, so far as respects the mode of summoning the defendant into court, or the time of filing the petition for foreclosure, should not be subjected to the same rule of construction. "An acknowledgment by the defendant of service of the writ, and a waiver of a particular entry required in the case, is sufficient to give jurisdiction of the person, and every thing consistent with the record will be intended to sustain the judgment." 9th Porter's R., 291.

The reason assigned in this case against the jurisditcion of the court, appear rather to be such as might have been made in the court below to the court or petition, and to the writ. But, according to logical reasoning and logical practice, they were waived by a consent of judgment. Had no written acknowledgment or consent been executed, the court certainly would not have proceeded to judgment or foreclosure until notice had been served on defendant, and petition filed acording to the requirements of the statute—assuming that these objections could be only properly addressed to the court, and the writ would be an admission of the jurisdiction of the court.

But it is urged that petitioner showed by his petition he had no existing mortgage to secure his debt at the time of filing it, and, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction. This objection, it seems to the court, would best be made by way of plea in bar to the action, and that plea would admit the jurisdiction of the court. Yet we cannot see how in any shape it should avail the defendant, who, upon the back of the very petition in which this allegation is contained, confesses judgment for the sum therein alleged to be due, and agrees that a decree of foreclosure shall be rendered on the mortgages therein set forth and sought to be foreclosed, at the Spring Term of the court in 1847. Is it asked of this court to decide there was no existing mortgage in favor of petitioner against the defendant, Shepard, when he, Shepard, under his hand and seal, agrees there is, and that it may be foreclosed, and this agreement, too, made, in consideration of a stay of execution?

The rule of law, that where the court has not jurisdiction of the subject-matter of a suit, consent cannot give it jurisdiction, is, without doubt, correct; but as to the person of the defendant, the formal service of the process, or the time of filing the declaration or petition, though necessary steps, are rendered unnecessary, if the defendant 657 appears and pleads issuably, or confesses judgment—and having done so, he ought not afterwards to be permitted to take advantage of irregularities in those respects. We think, therefore, the court had jurisdiction of the suit, by having jurisdiction of both of the subject matter of the suit, and by the defendant's acknowledgement of due service of process, of the filing the petition on the first day of the term, and consenting that judgment might be rendered at the said term and foreclosure decreed, with a stay of execution, &c. This assignment of errors is, therefore, overruled.

The first error assigned, and next to be considered is this: The agreement to confess judgment is void under the statute, which enacts, "All powers of attorney for confession or suffering judgment to pass by default or otherwise, and all general releases of error made or to be made by any person or persons whatsoever within this State before action brought, shall be, and are hereby declared to be, absolutely null and void." Thomp. D., 350. Upon this assignment of error, it will sufficiently express the views of the court to say, the agreement of the defendant, under his hand and seal to confess judgment, is not a power of attorney to confess judgment, and is not within the prohibition of the statute. Neither does it appear from a careful examination of that agreement, written on the back of the plaintiff's petition, that it was made before action brought. They appear rather to have been done simultaneously, and if necessary to give effect to an agreement made on a valuable consideration, to wit: a delay of payment. The court will understand it to be admitted that notice of the intention of the plaintiff to bring his suit (which notice is the intention of the suit) was given before the defendant, Shepard, signed any agreement on the back of the petition. We think this assignment of error should be overruled.

The second error assigned, is, "there is error in giving one foreclosure on two mortgages."

The debt, which the two mortgages were given to secure, was one debt, due from defendant, Shepard, to the plaintiff, Kelly. The last mortgage was cumulative or additional security on the first, and both were but security for one debt. If the debt had been paid, which they had been made to secure, that act would have discharged both mortgages; if it became necessary to push that debt to judgment, no good reason is perceived why the equity of redemption should not be foreclosed on all the property mortgaged to secure its pay- 658 ment; and this, we think, within the equity of the statute, the court had power to do. This assignment of error is, therefore, we think, not well taken, and is overruled.

Third error assigned, "there is error in the original judgment, because the property foreclosed is not mentioned."

So much of the original decree as is material in this assignment of error, is in these words: "And it is further adjudged, ordered and decreed, that the said John S. Shepard, mortgagor, and all persons claiming or to claim by, through, or under him, shall be, and they are hereby forever foreclosed and barred of, and from all right and equity of redemption of or in the property mortgaged by the said deeds of mortgage in said petition set forth, and therewith exhibited, and every part thereof, and that execution issue according to the statute in such case made and provided, after the first day of February, Anno Domini, one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, until which date execution will be stayed according to the agreement before stated." It is perceived that, by this original decree, the equity of redemption of or in the property mortgaged by the said deeds of mortgage exhibited with the petition and therein set forth, is foreclosed. Id. certum est quod certum reddi potest. And so far as can be collected from the forms in the Courts of Chancery in England, it is believed no more specific or certain description of the property is contained in the decree of foreclosure than the mortgaged premises in question. It is argued if such a decree be good in England, it ought not to prevail here, because the exhibits are not recorded after final judgment. By legal intendment, the files of the court are as secure as the records, and if this were not so, the law requires mortgages to be recorded when or soon after they are executed. This, by the petition and exhibits, appears to have been done, and admitting the files of the court should be lost or destroyed, it is fairly presumable, the record of these mortgages is as safe as the record of the judgment. We think the property, intended to be foreclosed, is sufficiently designated by reference to the mortgages in which it is specified, and a specific statement of it in the decree of foreclosure, is immaterial and unnecessary. The third error assigned is therefore, in our opinion, not well grounded, and is overruled.

The fourth error is, "There is error in the judgment as amended, because it awards execution against specific property."

659 The 8th sec. of the act of 1824, Thompson's Digest, 377, is in the words following: "The judgment of the court on the foreclosure of a mortgage, shall in all cases be entered up and filed, and execution shall issue thereon as in other cases." By the law applicable to other cases, execution goes against the lands and tenements, goods and chattels of the defendants in execution. The amended decree, after specifying the mortgaged property, adds, "and that said petitioner have execution against said mortgaged property, according to the statute in such case made and provided." It is contended if this be error, it is in favor of the plaintiff in error, and unless he is injured by it, he cannot take advantage of it. Without contravening the force of this objection, or without stopping to enquire narrowly, whether a party might not be injured by subjecting a specific fund (if a favorite fund) to execution, when the law requires that execution shall be against the lands and tenements, goods and chattels of the defendant, upon an examination of the original judgment and decree entered in this cause, it seems to the court that said judgment and decree is good and valid in law; and that the amended judgment and decree entered on Friday, the 7th day of April, A. D. 1848, is, for the reasons set forth in the fourth assignment of errors, erroneous: wherefore, the said assignment of error, so far as applicable to said amended decree, is allowed and sustained.

The fifth, sixth and seventh errors assigned, having reference to the judgment as amended, that amended judgment being to be reversed and vacated, it is deemed unnecessary to examine.

It is, therefore, ordered, adjudged and decreed that the original judgment and decree of foreclosure, rendered in this cause at the Spring Term, eighteen hundred and forty-seven, be in all things affirmed, and that execution issue thereon according to law; and that the amended decree of foreclosure, rendered nunc pro tunc in said cause on the 7th day of April, A. D. 1848, be set aside and reversed, and that the appellant recover his costs, &c.

660 UNION BANK OF FLORIDA vs. PARKHILL'S ADMINISTRATORS de bonis non.

S. PARKHILL'S ADMINISTRATORS de bonis non vs. UNION BANK OF FLORIDA.

The Bonds made by the late Territory, payable to the Union Bank of Florida, are, under the charter of that institution, the property of the Bank, and the funds arising from the sale of them, the funds of the Bank.

Shares in the Union Bank, are the mortgage securities given for stock, and a pledge of shares is a pledge of those mortgage securities.

The mortgage given by the stockholders to the Bank was executed for the purpose, 1st. as provided by the 8th sec. of the charter, of securing payment by the Bank, of the principal and interest of the bonds. 2d. Of securing payment by the stockholder to the Bank, of his stock note or obligation and interest, if he fails to renew the note and pay interest as provided in the 29th section.

When a stockholder of the Union Bank fails to renew his note, and pay up the interest, if the Bank shall file for cancellation with any officer of the government whose duty it may be to receive them for cancellation, or with the Clerk of the Court in which the suit is pending, as many Territorial Bonds as were issued on the faith and value of the mortgage securities of such defaulting stockholder, the Bank, upon judgment rendered and execution issued, may of right levy upon and sell the mortgaged premises of such defaulting stockholder, to be applied to the extinguishment of the judgment rendered on his stock note debt together with interest due and costs accrued.

A stockholder has a right to a continuance of the credit or loan which the charter gives him only upon his renewing his note and paying up the interest annually—and the taking of interest in advance is not a violation of the charter.

Under the plea of plene administravit, an administrator cannot be allowed to offer in evidence a receipt for the payment of money by him which payment has been rejected and disallowed by the probate court. Before any right attaches to offer any evidence of expenditures made by the administrator under this plea, such expenditures must have been allowed by the court of probate. The action of that court in regard to accounts of executors, &c., is conclusive, unless appealed from.

On the 31st March, 1846, the Union Bank of Florida instituted suit in Leon Circuit Court against Martha Ann Manly, administratrix, (and Hiram Manly, in right of his wife, administrator,) and William

D. Moseley, administrator de bonis non of Samuel Parkhill, deceased 661 to recover the amount of a sealed note of defendant's intestate, of which the following is a copy:

"Dolls. 94,182 22-100. Tallahassee, Dec. 9, 1840.

"Six months after date I promise to pay to the Union Bank of Florida at their Banking house in the City of Tallahassee, ninety four thousand one hundred and eighty two 22-100 Dollars, for value received, for securing payment whereof I do hereby pledge my shares in the capital stock of said Bank.

SAMUEL PARKHILL, [SEAL.]

The declaration is in debt, and contains a special count on the note, and common count for money had and received.

The defendants filed various pleas as follows:

And the said defendants, as administrators and administratrix de bonis non as aforesaid, by J. T. Archer, their attorney, come and defend the wrong and injury when, &c., and as to the first count in the declaration say, that the said supposed writing obligatory is not the deed of the said Samuel Parkhill, deceased, and of this they put themselves upon the country, &c.

And for further plea in this behalf, the said defendants as administrators and administratrix de bonis non as aforesaid, say actionem non, &c., as to the second count in the declaration, because they say that the said Samuel, in his life time, was not indebted to the said plaintiff, in manner and form as in the said second count is alleged, and of this they put themselves upon the country, &c.

And for further plea in this behalf, the said defendants, as administrators and administratrix de bonis non as aforesaid, say actio non, &c., as to the first count in the said declaration mentioned, because they say that, before the institution of this suit, to wit, on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand, eight hundred and forty-four, to wit, at the county of Leon aforesaid, Martha Ann Manly, administratrix, and Hiram Manly, administrator, in right of his wife, said Martha, of the estate of said Samuel, which remained at his death, paid to the said plaintiff the said sum of ninety-four thousand dollars, in the said writing obligatory mentioned, together with all interest then due thereon, according to the form and effect of the said writing obligatory and this the said defendants, as administrators and administratrix de bonis non as aforesaid, are ready to verify; wherefore, they pray judgment whether the said plaintiff ought to have or maintain their aforesaid action thereof against them, &c., 662 by reason of any thing in the first count mentioned.

And for further plea in this behalf, the said defendants say actionem non, &c., because they say that the said plaintiff before and at the time of the commencement of this suit, to wit, at the county aforesaid, was and still is indebted to the said defendants, as administrators and administratrix de bonis non as aforesaid, in a large sum of money, to wit, in the sum of three hundred thousand dollars, for the proceeds of the sale by the said plaintiff of one thousand four hundred and twenty-eight shares of capital stock in the Union Bank of Florida of the said Samuel deceased, before that time sold by the said plaintiff, on account of the said Martha Ann, as administratrix, and that said Hiram, as administrator, in right of his wife, said Martha, of the estate of said Samuel which remained at his death, which said sum of money has never been paid by the said plaintiff to the said Martha Ann and Hiram, as administratrix and administrator as foresaid, or to these defendants, as administrators and administratrix de bonis non as aforesaid. And the said defendants further say that the said plaintiff, at the time of the commencement of this suit, to wit, at the county aforesaid, was and still is indebted to the said defendants, as administrators de bonis non, &c. as aforesaid, in the further sum of three hundred thousand dollars, for divers goods, wares and merchandizes sold and delivered to the said plaintiff, and at the request of the said plaintiff, by the said Martha Ann and Hiram Manly, administratrix and administrator as aforesaid, of the estate of said Samuel which remained at his death; and for money by the said Martha Ann and Hiram, as administratrix and administrator as last aforesaid, before that time lent and advanced to, and paid, laid out and expended for the said plaintiff, and at the request of the said plaintiff; and for money by the said plaintiff before that time had and received, to and for the use of the said Martha Ann and Hiram Manly, as administratrix and administrator as aforesaid; and for money due and owing from the said plaintiff to the said Martha Ann and Hiram Manly, as administratrix and administrator as last aforesaid, upon an account stated between them; and the said defendants further saith that the said plaintiff before and at the time of the commencement of this suit, to wit, at the county aforesaid, was and still is indebted to the said defendants, as administrators and administratrix de bonis non as aforesaid and the further sum of three hundred

Union Bank vs. Parkhill's Admr's—cross writs of error.—Statement of Case..

663 thousand dollars, for money by the said defendants, as administrators and administratrix de bonis non as aforesaid, before that time lent and advanced to, and paid out and expended for the said plaintiff, and at the request of the said plaintiff; and for money by the said plaintiff before that time had and received, to and for the use of the said defendants, as administrators de bonis non as aforesaid; and for money due and owing from the said plaintiff to the said defendants, as administrators and administratrix de bonis non as aforesaid, upon account stated by them; which said sums of money so due and owing to the said defendants, as administrators and administratrix de bonis non as aforesaid, exceed the debt and damages in the plaintiff's declaration mentioned, and out of which said sums due as aforesaid, the said defendants, as administrators and administratrix de bonis non as aforesaid, are ready and willing and hereby offer to set off and allow to the said plaintiff the full amount of the said debt and damages, and this the said defendants are ready to verify: wherefore they pray judgment that so much of the said several sums of money above mentioned, as exceed the debt and damages in favor of the said plaintiff, be allowed to these defendants, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

And for further plea in this behalf, the said defendants say actionem non, &c., because they say they have fully administered all and singular the goods and chattels, rights and credits, lands and tenements, which were of the said Samuel Parkhill, deceased, at the time of his death, and which ever came to the hands of these defendants, as administrators and administratrix de bonis non as aforesaid, to be administered, to wit, at the county aforesaid; and that they, the said defendants, have not nor on the day of the commencement of this suit, or at any time since, had they any goods or chattels, lands or tenements, which were of the said Samuel Parkhill, deceased, at the time of his death, in the hands of these defendants, as administrators and administratrix de bonis non. to be administered, and this the said defendants are ready to verify: wherefore, they pray judgment whether the said plaintiff its action thereof against them ought to have or maintain, &c.

And for further plea in this behalf, the said defendants say actio non, &c., because they say that heretofore and before the grant of letters of administration de bonis non to these defendants, and before the marriage of the said Hiram Manly and Martha Ann Manly, and 664 before the institution of the suit, to wit, on the fourth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, in the county aforesaid, one Henry Bond impleaded the said Martha Ann Manly, (then Parkhill) as administratrix of the estate of said Samuel which remained at his death, before the Superior Court of the Middle District of the Territory of Florida in and for the county of Leon, in an action of trespass on the case on promises for and on account of certain promises and assumptions by the said Samuel Parkhill in his life time, made to the said Henry Bond, and proceedings were so far had therein that afterwards and before the marriage with said Hiram Manly by said Martha Ann Parkhill, and before the commencement of this suit to-wit, on the fifth day of May, in the year last aforesaid at the spring term of the Superior Court aforesaid, to-wit, at the county aforesaid, the said Henry Bond, by the consideration and judgment of the said court recovered against the said Marthat Ann Manly (then Parkhill) as administratrix, as aforesaid, the sum of twelve thousand four hundred and forty six dollars and fourteen cents for his damages which he had sustained by occasion of the non-performance by said Samuel in his life time, and said Martha Ann as administratrix as aforesaid, after his death, of the said promises and undertakings, so by the said Samuel in his life time made to the said Henry Bond, to be levied of the goods and chattels, slaves, lands, and tenements of said Samuel Parkhill, deceased, in the hands of the said Martha Ann Manly, (then Parkhill), to be administered, whereof the said Martha Ann, as Administratrix as aforesaid, was convicted, as by the record and proceedings thereof, remaining in the Circuit Court of the Middle Circuit of the State of Florida in and for the County of Leon, more fully and at large appears, which said judgment against said Martha Ann, as administratrix, as aforesaid, is still of force, and not paid, satisfied, vacated, cancelled or reversed, and the said defendants as administrators and administratrix de bonis non, as aforesaid, further say, that they have fully administered all and singular the goods and chattels, rights and credits, lands and tenements, which were of the said Samuel at the time of his death, and which ever came to the hands of these defendants, as administrators de bonis non, as aforesaid, to be administered, to-wit, at the county aforesaid except goods and chattels of small value, to wit, of the value of five dollars; and that they, the said defendants, as administrators and administratrix de bonis non, as aforesaid, have not, nor on the day of the commencement of this suit, or at any time since, had they any 665 goods or chattels, lands or tenements, which were of the said Samuel, deceased, at the time of his death, in their hands as administrators and administratrix de bonis non, as aforesaid, to be administered, except goods and chattels, of the value aforesaid, and which are not sufficient to satisfy the judgment aforesaid and are liable for the payment of the same: And this they are ready to verify. Wherefore they pray judgment whether the said plaintiff ought to have or maintain their action aforesaid against the said defendants as administrators and administratrix de bonis non as aforesaid, &c.

And for further plea in this behalf, the said defendants say actionem non, &c., as to first count, because they say that the sole consideration for which the said writing obligatory was given by the said Samuel, was the loan by the said plaintiff to the said Samuel, of ninety thousand, one hundred and seventy seven 34-100 dollars, in notes of the Union Bank, calling for that sum, but then greatly depreciated, and that thereby the said plaintiff did knowingly, wilfully take and receive, and insist upon a greater rate of interest than eight per centum per annum, contrary to and in violation of the provisions of charter of the said Union Bank: And this the said defendants are ready to verify, &c. Wherefore they pray judgment whether the said plaintiff ought to have or maintain its action thereof against these defendants as administrators and administratrix de bonis non, as aforesaid, by reason of any thing in the first count mentioned.

The plaintiff moved to strike out the first plea of the defendants, but afterwards joined issue thereon.

To the second plea, the plaintiff demurred, but afterwards joined issue thereon.

To the third, fourth, and fifth pleas, the plaintiff tendered issue upon the facts, which was joined by the defendants.

To the sixth plea the plaintiff filed a replication as follows:

And the said plaintiff, as to the said plea of the said defendants by them sixthly above pleaded, saith that he the said plaintiff, by reason of anything in the said plea alleged, ought not to be barred from having and maintaining his aforesaid action thereof against him, because he says that the said judgment in the said plea mentioned was claimed against the original administrator and administratrix of Samuel Parkhill, deceased, and that the same is in no wise binding upon the said defendants in this present suit, administrators and administratrix de bonis non of the said Samuel, and that the said defen- 666
dants, administrators and administratrix de bonis non of the said Samuel, have not fully administered all and singular the goods and chattels which were of the said Samuel Parkhill, deceased, at the time of his death, and which came to their hands to be administered, but that they the said defendants, at the commencement of this suit administrators and administratrix de bonis non, as aforesaid, had goods in their hands to be administered, of the estate of said Samuel, over and above the said amount admitted in the said plea, and more than sufficient to pay and satisfy the debt of the said plaintiff above declared, and the damages on the same, and wherewith the said defendants might and could have satisfied the same: And this the said plaintiff prays may be enquired of by the country, &c.

The defendants joined the issue tendered by this replication. To the seventh and last plea, the plaintiff demurred, but by leave of the court the defendants were permitted to amend the last plea, and did so amend by filing in lieu thereof on the 29th June, 1847, the following amended plea:

And for further plea, &c., said defendants come and defend, &c., when, &c., and say actio non, &c., because they say that the said supposed writing obligatory is not the act and deed of their intestate the said Samuel, in his life time, but the same is and was when the same was made, sealed and delivered to the said Union Bank of Florida, wholly null, illegal and void, and is and hath been at all times since, wholly illegal, null and void, because the same was made and delivered for the sole and only consideration of a loan of money from said Union Bank of Florida to said Samuel in his life time, (he being then and there a stockholder, and the same being on a pledge of his stock) and that upon the said loan the said Bank wilfully and knowingly reserved and took more than the lawful rate of interest allowed to said Bank to take upon such loans, to wit, the sum of one hundredth of one per cent. interest per annum beyond the amount allowed by said charter and law upon the said loan of and from said Samuel in his life-time, contrary to the form of the statute in the case of the Union Bank, made and provided, and against the form and letter of its charter and powers, and transcending and going beyond and violating the same, to-wit: at the time and place of the delivery of the bond in the declaration mentioned: And this they are ready to verify.

667 Wherefore they pray judgment whether the said plaintiff ought to have or maintain its action aforesaid against these defendants.

On the same day the plaintiff demurred to the amended plea, and after argument, the demurrer was sustained by the court.

The cause was afterwards tried before His Honor, Judge BALTZELL, upon the issues joined, which were submitted to a jury duly empanneled for this purpose. On the 13th July, 1847, a verdict was returned and judgment entered, as follows:

The jury empannelled in this cause this day returned into court, and upon their oath do say: "We the jury find for the plaintiff $143,782 81-100, and no assets in the hands of the administrators." Therefore it is considered by the court, that the plaintiff recover against the defendants $188,364, 44-100, the debt in the declaration mentioned, and its costs by it about its suit in this behalf expended, to be levied of the goods and chattels, slaves, lands and tenements of the defendant's intestate, when assets sufficient therefor shall come to the hands of the said defendants. But this judgment is to be discharged by the payment of the sum of one hundred and forty-three thousand seven hundred and eighty-two dollars and eighty-one cents, ascertained by the jury as aforesaid and the costs, and the said defendants in mercy, &c.

At the trial of this cause, the plaintiff excepted to various rulings of the court, which exceptions were noted in the following bill of exceptions filed by the plaintiff:

Be it remembered, that on this 13th day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-seven, this cause came on to be tried upon the issues joined, and thereupon the plaintiff offered in evidence to the jury the bond sued upon, to-wit:

Dolls. 94,182 22-100. Tallahassee, Dec. 9th, 1840.

Six months after date I promise to pay to the Union Bank of Florida at their Banking House in the City of Tallahassee, Ninety-four thousand one hundred and eighty-two 22-100 dollars for value received: for securing payment whereof I do hereby pledge my shares in the capital stock of said Bank. Witness my hand and seal.

SAMUEL PARKHILL, [L. S.]

which was read to the jury without objection. It was admitted by the plaintiff's counsel that the instrument was a Stock Bond evidencing a loan made under the 29th section of the charter or act of incorporation of the said plaintiff.

668 The charter of the Union Bank and the several amendments thereto, were offered in evidence by the said plaintiff: And it was expressly admitted by defendant's counsel that the requisition of the act of incorporation had been complied with, and that the Bank had gone into operation under authority thereof.

The said plaintiff, further to maintain the issues joined, offered to the jury the inventories and appraisement filed by the defendant Moseley, in the office of the Judge of Probate for Leon County.

These inventions and appraisements, were read to the jury, and embrace items as follows:

Slaves, - - - - - - - -	$75,925
Bonds, - - - - - - - -	3,142 60
Cash, - - - - - - - -	373 47
	$79,441 07

The said plaintiff also introduced and offered in evidence the audit by the Judge of Probate of Leon County, of the account of the defendant, William D. Moseley, up to 1st April, 1846, to wit:

Judge of Probates.

JULY 2, 1847.

Which was read in evidence to the jury, and here the plaintiff rested his cause.

Defendants by their counsel then offered in evidence the entry of judgment in favor of the Union Bank of Florida against Martha Ann Manly, and Hiram Manly, in right of his wife, administrators of Samuel Parkhill, deceased, which judgment was founded upon the same cause of action as the present case—the execution issued thereon, and the report of the sale made under said execution, by John G. Camp, Marshal of the Middle District; and plaintiff admitted that the slaves so sold by Camp, Marshal, were to that extent, the identical slaves in the inventory mentioned—which judgment, execution, levy and report of sale are in these words, to-wit:

At a Circuit Court for the County of Leon, continued and held at the Court House in the City of Tallahassee, on Saturday, the 1st day of March, A. D., 1845. Present, the Honorable SAMUEL J. DOUGLAS, Judge.

The Union Bank of Florida, plaintiff, vs.
Martha Ann Manly, late Parkhill, and Hiram Manly in right of his wife, Martha Ann, administrator of Samuel Parkhill, deceased, defendants. } In debt.

This day came the parties by their attorneys, and the plaintiff by his attorney filed his special demurrer to the defendant's rejoinder to the plaintiff's replication filed herein, to the defendant's amended plea puis darrien continuance, filed by leave of the court, on the 24th February last, in which demurrer the defendants joined: whereupon the matters of law arising upon the plaintiff's demurrer to the said rejoinder being argued, it seems to the court here, that the said rejoinder and the matters and things therein alleged are not sufficient in law to bar or preclude the plaintiff from having and maintaining its action aforesaid against the said defendants. Therefore it is considered by the court, that the said plaintiff recover against the said defendant, the sum of $94,182 22-100, parcel of the debt in the declaration mentioned,and the sum of $27,982 65-100, 672 its damages, making together the sum of one-hundred and twenty-two-thousand one hundred and sixty-four dollars and eighty-seven cents, and its cost by it about its suit in this behalf expended, to be levied of the goods and chattels, slaves, lands and tenements of the said intestate, Samuel Parkhill, deceased, in the hands of the defendants to be administered, and the said defendants in mercy, &c.

THE TERRITORY OF FLORIDA.

To all and singular the Marshals of said Territory—Greeting.

We command you that of the goods and chattels, slaves, lands and tenements of Samuel Parkhill, deceased, in the hands of Martha Ann Manly, late Parkhill, and Hiram Manly, in right of his wife, said Martha Ann, administrators of Samuel Parkhill, deceased, remaining to be administered, you cause to be made the sum of ninety-four thousand one hundred and eighty-two dollars and twenty-two cents, its debt, and also twenty-seven thousand nine hundred and eighty-two dollars and sixty-five cents, its interest and damages, making together the sum of one hundred and twenty-two thousand one hundred and sixty-four dollars and eighty-seven cents, which the Union Bank of Florida lately, on the 1st day of March, 1845, recovered in our Superior Court for the County of Lee, in the Middle District, as well for its debts as its damages occasioned by the detention of said debt; and likewise the sum of seven dollars and eighty-two cents, which to the said Union Bank of Florida in the same court adjudged for its costs by it in that behalf expended, together with lawful interest on said damages, from the rendition of said judgment till paid, and the costs of this writ and of your proceedings herein; and that you have the said sums of money before the judge of our said court, at Tallahassee, when satisfied, to render the said Union Bank of Florida the sums aforesaid, and have then and there this writ. Witness Richard T. Birchett, clerk of our said court at Tallahassee aforesaid, this 20th day of March, A. D., 1845, and of the independence of the United States the sixty-ninth year.

[SEAL] R. T. BIRCHETT, Clerk.

Came to hand 20th March, 1845, and levied on the following slaves:

[Here follows a list of slaves levied on, and a statement of the sale thereof by the marshal, for the net sum of $55,173 64.]

To the admission of which evidence, the plaintiff, by his counsel, objected, but the court overruled the objection and permitted the same to be read in evidence; to which decision the plaintiff, by its 673 counsel, excepted.

The said defendants, by their counsel, then offered in evidence nine mortgages executed by Samuel Parkhill in his life time, to the Union Bank of Florida, to secure his subscription of shares in the said bank, to wit:

Union Bank of Florida, 15th July, 1847.

C. G. ENGLISH,
Solicitor Union Bank.

To the admission of which evidence the plaintiff, by its counsel, objected, but the court overruled the objection and allowed the same to be read in evidence, to which decision, the plaintiff excepted.

The said defendants, by their counsel, then offered in evidence a deed of mortgage of certain slaves named in said inventories and appraisement,, executed by said Samuel in his life time, dated the —— day of —— A. D. 18 and proved that said mortgage was in suit 676 for foreclosure in this court, plaintiff's and counsel admitted that the same was assigned and in fact belonged to other persons thar the Bank, which deed of mortgage is in these words:

This Indenture, made and entered into 19th day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty, between Samuel Parkhill of the county of Leon in the Territory of Florida, of the first part and the Union Bank of Florida, of the second part: Whereas the said Samuel Parkhill is justly indebted to the said Union Bank of Florida, in several sums of money as follows, to wit:

1. In a certain Bill of exchange dated 29th August, 1839, payable at ninety days after the fourth day of November, 1839, drawn on Hamilton & Co. of New York, in favor of William H. Brodie, for twenty-five thousand dollars, which bill, at request of said Parkhill, was not forwarded for acceptance and payment; and on which there is endorsed a payment of nine thousand three hundred and fifty dollars, as on the 22d February, 1840.

2. Also a certain note payable to order of John Parkhill, Esq., Cashier, dated 28th August, 1839, and payable at ninety days from the 24th October, 1839, for twenty thousand dollars, upon which note there is endorsed, July, 18, 1840, a payment of three thousand nine hundred and twenty-three 58-100 dollars.

3. Also a bill of exchange dated 8th February 1837, drawn on Hamilton and Cole, of New York, by William H. Brodie, in favor of and endorsed by said Samuel Parkhill, for the sum of ten thousand five hundred dollars, payable six months after date, which bill was accepted by said Hamilton & Cole, and protested for non-payment.

4. Also one other note dated 24th April 1839, for fifteen thousand dollars, signed by said Saml. Parkhill, and endorsed by William P. Craig, and payable eight months after date, upon which said note, the following payments are endorsed, to wit: on 21st January, 1840, the sum of ten thousand dollars, and on the 1st January, 1840, the sum of one thousand and ninety nine 35-100 dollars.

5. Also a bill of exchange dated 22d March, 1837, drawn by Wm. P. Craig in favor of, and endorsed by, Saml. Parkhill, upon Maitland, Kennedy, & Co., at four months after date, for five thousand two hundred dollars, which bill was protested for non-payment.

6. Also a certain promissory note dated January 4th 1840, payable to, and endorsed by R. H. Berry, payable ninety days after date, for fourteen hundred and forty three 58-100 dollars.

Union Bank vs. Parkhill's Admr's—cross writs of error.—Statement of Case..

7. Also a certain note dated January 10th, 1840, payable to, and 677 endorsed by, John Parkhill, payable ninety days after date, for the sum of six thousand dollars.

8. Also a certain other note dated 18th March, 1840, payable sixty days after date to the order of William P. Craig, and endorsed by him for the sum of ten thousand dollars.

9. Also a certain other note signed by said Samuel Parkhill, dated January 19th, 1840, payable ninety days after date, to the order of and endorsed by John Parkhill for the sum of five thousand dollars.

10. Also a certain other note signed by said Samuel Parkhill, dated February 1st, 1840, payable ninety days after date, to the order of, and endorsed by John Parkhill for five thousand dollars.

11. Also one other note dated October 19th, 1840, and payable to the Union Bank of Florida, or its assigns on demand, for the sum of thirteen thousand, two hundred dollars.

And whereas, the said Samuel Parkhill is desirous of installing the payment of said debts, notes and bills of exchange, so as to pay thereof twenty-five thousand dollars on or before the first day of April in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, and to pay annually thereafter, on or before the first day of April in each succeeding year, the further sum of fifteen thousand dollars, until the whole of said debts with the interest thereon, shall have been duly paid and discharged. And whereas, the said Samuel Parkhill is desirous to secure the payment of said notes, bills and debts, at the times and in the sums before stated. Now this Indenture witnesseth that for and in consideration of the premises and in further consideration of the sum of one dollar to him in hand paid by the said Union Bank of Florida, the receipt whereof at and before the sealing and delivery of these presents, is hereby acknowledged, the said Samuel Parkhill hath granted, bargained, sold and transferred, and by these presents doth grant, bargain, sell and transfer unto the said Union Bank of Florida, and to its assigns, the following slaves, together with the future increase of the females thereof, to wit: Prisley, 40 years; Lucy, 45; Mary, 17; Asia, 40; Henry, 10; Susannah, 35; Nancy Eppes, 17; Nancy Dowdy, 18; Ailsey, 28; Francis Smith, 17; Melinda, 16; Lucy, 18; Priscilla, 12; Ann Eliza, 16; Rosetta, 14; Rachel, 16; Martha, 8; Phillis, 25, and child; Dick, 30; which before named slaves were mortgaged to the said Union Bank of Florida on the 6th November, 1839, to secure the payment of the first described bill of exchange, for twenty five thousand dollars. Also 678 the following other slaves and the future increase of the females thereof, to wit: Diana Clark, 24; Little William, 10; Martha, 9; Webb, 18; Irven, 18; Dick Petersburg, 17; Becky, 20; Edmund, 40; Patsey, 18; William Cary, 15; Henry, 11; Sarah Dawes, 15; Willis, 15; Jerry, 18; Henry, 18; Diana Brooks, 20, a daughter of Diana, 8; Black Ellen, 12; Smart, 35; Little Rosetta, 12; Gabriel, 12; Daniel, 12: To have and to hold the said slaves, unto the said Union Bank of Florida, and to its assigns forever: Yet upon this condition, that if the said Samuel Parkhill, his heirs, &c., shall well and truly pay the debts herein before described by payment of the several instalments described, at the times when the same shall become due and payable, then this indenture shall be null, void, and of no effect, else shall remain in full force and virtue. In witness whereof the said Samuel Parkhill hath hereunto set his hand and affixed his seal on the day and year first above written.

SAMUEL PARKHILL, [Seal.]

Signed, Sealed, and delivered in presence of HENRY L. RUTGERS,
J. RICHARDSON, JR.

To the admission of which evidence the plaintiff by its counsel objected, but the court overruled the objection and allowed the same to be read in evidence to the jury; to which decision the plaintiff excepted.

The said defendants then called James T. Archer, who, being duly sworn in this behalf, deposed as follows, viz:

In consequence of an advertisement in the month of November, 1843, attended a sale before the banking house of the plaintiff, of (1428) fourteen hundred and twenty-eight shares of stock sold by the Union Bank of Florida—it was sold as the property of Samuel Parkhill, deceased, and was bid off by Col. John G. Gamble at one cent per share, premium; some directions were given at the sale, but does not distinctly recollect what they were. Being cross-examined, said, does not know whether the sale was ever completed or not, does not know what was done after that. Does not recollect the terms of the sale which were announced; it was cried by Henry L. Rutgers, an officer of the bank. Being re-examined, says, he was the attorney for the estate of Parkhill, and attended said sale as such, in

Union Bank vs. Parkhill's Admr's—cross writs of error.—Statement of Case..

679 consequence of seeing the advertisement—does not know whether any credit was given to the estate on account of the stock

Defendants then called Charles G. English, who being duly sworn in this behalf, deposed as follows: This statement which I have prepared as a statement of the original discounts for Samuel Parkhill on account of loans on pledge of stock, and the renewals of the same, of which the bond in suit is the last renewal, to wit:

682 Interest was always required to be paid in advance, but it was not always so paid in advance. Samuel Parkhills stock notes frequently lay over, as will be seen from the statement. Where a note would lie over for some time, and then be renewed, interest would be calculated from the maturity of the old note to the time of renewal, and then in advance upon the renewal for as long a period not more than twelve months, as the stockholder desired. Cross-examined. By this operation, the bank would lose the profit upon the interest so deferred. Discount is the counting off the interest, and there is a difference between interest paid in advance, and interest paid after the lapse of the time. The bank would lose by the operation upon the interest. Re-examined. Proves resolution declaring Parkhill's stock forfeited, to wit: . Copy of Resolution adopted by the Board of Directors of the Union Bank of Florida at their meeting 1st November 1843: Resolved that the shares of stock standing in the name of Samuel Parkhill on the books of the bank are forfeited by non-payment of interest, and that the same be advertised and sold as directed in the amendment of the charter of the bank passed, approved on the 1st March 1839, and subsequently accepted by the stockkholders. Says that Rowlett's tables were always used by the bank; by those tables, the days less than a month are calculated at 360 days to the year, the year is composed of three hundred and sixty-five days, and the months are aliquot parts of the year.

Defendants then called Henry L. Rutgers, who being duly sworn, deposed as follows: He has attended to the business in bank of renewing stock notes—the bank required the interest to be paid in advance, and so took it whenever it could get it—stock notes frequently lay over —when such was the case, the interest was paid from the time the note fell due, to the time of renewal, and as much interest in advance as the party was willing to pay, not exceeding twelve months interest.

Interest is always calculated in bank, for convenience, by Rowlett's tables; by these tables, interest for days less than a month, is calculated at 360 days to the year. This is the only peculiarity. Does not recollect a case of an executor or administrator renewing a note in bank; if any such had been offered, would have applied to the President for instruction—stock notes or bonds are discounted, and the interest taken in advance whenever the bank could get it. Cross-examined. Says the notes of Samuel Parkhill frequently lay 683 over for some time—that pursuant to an advertisement, and under the amended charter of 1839, on the 18th November, 1843, the stock of Samuel Parkhill, consisting of thirteen hundred and eighty-three shares, was offered for sale, and knocked off to John G. Gamble, at one per cent. per share, he having thereby the privilege to secure the shares, which was never done. The stock still continues to stand at the credit of Samuel Parkhill on the books of the bank—Colonel Gamble, who bid off the shares, did not pay the one per cent. per share, neither did he secure the stock according to the requisitions of the charter: in other words, he did not complete the purchase. Witness produced copy of the advertisement, to wit:

UNION BANK SHARES.

By order of the Board of Directors of the Union Bank of Florida, the following shares in the capital stock of said bank will be offered for sale at public auction, to the highest bidder, before the front door of the banking house of said bank, in the City of Tallahassee, between the hours of 11 o'clock, A. M. and 3 o'clock, P. M. on Saturday, the 18th day of November, 1843, said shares being forfeited under the amended charter of said bank, for non-payment of interest upon stock notes, viz: Samuel Parkhill, 1,428 shares.

JOHN G. GAMBLE, President.

Tallahassee, Nov. 2, (7,) 1843.

Re-examined.—Said there were forty-five (45) shares of cash stock which were not offered for sale—they still remain at the credit of Samuel Parkhill—the bank had loaned forty-five hundred dollars, the full nominal value on them. The stock offered for sale was bid off at one per cent. per share. Being asked if he had never said the bidding was for one cent. per share premium, answered he had, and by which he meant one cent per share, for the privilege of securing the nominal amount of the share by mortgage on lands and slaves. Being asked by defendant's counsel, if he had bid one cent per share for the shares, would be entitled to a transfer of the shares, on payment of the one per cent. per share bid, he answered no—he would have to pay the one per cent. share, and also secure the nominal amount of the shares by mortgage on lands and slaves, or pay the one hundred dollars per share, besides the one cent. That stock had been sold bona fide at 25 per cent. premium at sales by individuals, and sales on forfeiture by the bank—that in all the stock notes days of grace were added and the interest calculated, and as for four 684 days, and then were calculated by days. If the cash stock had been sold at one cent per share premium, the purchaser would have had to pay one hundred dollars, and one cent per share.

Again cross-examined.—Said the board of stockholders kept a record or minutes of their proceedings—the proceedings of each meeting were signed by the chairman and countersigned by the secretary. The book shown him is the record book, or minutes of the stockholders proceedings. Reads to jury the minutes or record of a meeting held 4th January, 1840, accepting the amendment of the charter, passed in 1839, to wit:

At a meeting of the stockholders of the Union Bank of Florida, held on the 4th day of February, 1840, pursuant to adjournment, Mr. James Gadsden submitted the following resolution: Resolved, That the stockholders do approve and accept as part of their charter the amendment thereof, passed by the Legislative Council, and approved by the Governor of Florida, in the following words, viz:

An act to amend an act entitled an act to incorporate the subscribers to the Union Bank of Florida, approved 1st March, 1839.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Governor and Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, That, if any stockholder who has heretofore or may hereafter obtain a loan upon the pledge of stock, as is contemplated in the twenty-ninth section of the act to which this is an amendment, shall neglect to renew or pay up his stock note, for the space of thirty days after the same shall have become due, the shares so pledged shall be forfeited to the bank, and any premium that may be received from the sale thereof shall accrue and be added to the surplus profits of the bank.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Board of Directors, when any share may be forfeited as aforesaid, to proceed to sell the same at public outcry to the highest bidder, before the banking house in the City of Tallahassee, after giving ten days notice, by publication in all the papers published in Tallahassee, of the time and place of sale, and the purchaser shall, within ten days thereafter, execute to the bank the bonds and mortgages necessary to constitute him a stockholder, and be subject to the same rules, regulations and restrictions, and to be entitled to the same rights, privileges and immunities as are guaranteed to an original stockholder: Provided, That the sale and forfeiture of shares shall not operate to divest the bank of any lien which it may have had on the property of the defaulting stockholder, but the same shall remain 685 bound for the security of any debt he may owe the bank, whether as payer, endorser, or surety, until the same shall have been fully satisfied.

On this resolution, much debate ensued—after which, Mr. Richard H. Long called for the ayes and noes on its passage, when the following vote was taken:

Ayes—Messrs. R. W. Alston, R. C. Allen, J. G. Anderson, H. W. Braden, T. A. Bradford, R. H. Bradford, Edward Bradford, E. E. Blackburn, S. J. Baker, Wm. Bailey, T. M. Bush, Bruton & Zeigler, T. P. Chaires, W. P. Craig, John A. Craig, J. W. Dabney, C. H. Dupont, A. F. Duval, F. Eppes, F. Fitzgerald, J. G. Gamble, Robert Gamble, James Gadsden, A. M. Gatlin, S. Parkhill, C. Rouse, H. V. Snell, J. B. Taylor, Richard VanBrunt, T. B. Watson, George T. Ward, J. M. Gilchrist, I. R. Harris, A. F. Holmes, John Judge, J. W. Lea, Thomas Livingston, J. H. T. Lorimer, Banks Meacham, J. C. McGehee, John Miller, J. C. McMillan, B. K. West, D. C. Wilson, W. Wyatt, A. Myrick, B. F. Whitner, Robert W. Williams.

Noes—Thomas Brown, R. Hayward, L. G. Lamb, Richard H. Long, M. C. Livingston, John N. Partridge, and Jacob Robinson, who voted in this our right as stockholders, and in virtue of their premises, the vote stood 10,027 votes for the resolution, and 353 votes against it.

Mr. Richard H. Long asked leave to file a protest against the resolution, which was granted.

Defendants then offered and introduced in evidence a judgment and execution in favor of Henry Bond, against Martha Ann Parkhill, administratrix of the estate of Samuel Parkhill, to wit:

At a Superior Court for the county of Leon, continued and held at the Court House in the City of Tallahassee, on Thursday, the 5th day of May, A. D., 1842. Present, the Honorable SAMUEL J. DOUGLAS, Judge.

Henry Bond, plaintiff,
vs.
Martha Ann Parkhill, administratrix of S. Parkhill, deceased, defendant. In assumpsit.

This day came the plaintiff by his attorney, and the defendant being solemnly called came not: therefore it is considered by the court, that the plaintiff recover against the defendant the sum of 686 twelve thousand four hundred and forty-six and 14-100 dollars, the damages which the plaintiff has sustained by occasion of the defendant's intestate's non-performance of the promises and assumptions in the declaration mentioned, to be levied of the lands and tenements, goods and chattels of Samuel Parkhill, deceased, in the hands of the defendant to be administered, and his costs by him about his suit in this behalf expended, and the said defendant in mercy, &c.

[Copy fi. fa.]

THE TERRITORY OF FLORIDA.

To all and singular the Marshals of said Territory—Greeting:

We command you, as oftentimes before we have commanded, that of the goods and chattels, slaves, lands and tenements of Samuel Parkhill, deceased, in the hands of Martha Ann Parkhill, administratrix, to be administered, you cause to be made the sum of twelve thousand four hundred and forty-six dollars and fourteen cents, which Henry Bond lately, on the 5th day of May, 1842, recovered in our Superior Court for the county of Leon, in the Middle District, as well for his damages which he hath sustained by the occasion of the non-performance of certain promises and assumptions by the said Samuel Parkhill in his life time to the said Henry Bond lately made, and likewise the sum of ——— ———, which to the said Henry Bond in the same court adjudged, for his costs by him in that behalf expended, together with lawful interest on said damages, from the rendition of said judgment until paid, and the costs of this writ and of your proceedings hereon; and that you have the said sums of money before the judge of our said court, at Tallahassee, within 120 days from date, to render the said H. Bond the sums aforesaid, and have then and there this writ. Witness Richard T. Birchett, clerk of our said court at Tallahassee aforesaid, this 28th day of October, A. D., 1843, and of the independence of the United States the sixty-eighth year.

[SEAL.] R. T. BIRCHETT, Clerk.

[Endorsed.]

MEM.—This execution is entitled to a credit of seven thousand four hundred and ninety-two 46-100 dollars, as appears by the return on the alis fi. fa. returned to this office.

Test: R. T. B., Clerk.

By virtue of this execution, I have this day, 30th October, 1843, 687 levied on one hundred and two negro slaves, the property of defendant, a schedule of which is attached to execution No. 2,115.

J. G. CAMP, Marshal.

By A. A. FISHER, Deputy Marshal.

Defendants also called James E. Broome, Judge of Probate, who, being duly sworn, deposed that the commissions due defendant, Moseley, on the account of his administration, excluding the 184 slaves sold by John G. Camp was $377. 76—if those slaves are to be considered as administered upon, then he will be entitled to commissions to the sum of $3,799 74. If all the property contained in the inventories is to be considered as chargeable for commissions, then the sum will be assessed at $4,807 26.

Defendants counsel then asked the plaintiff's counsel for an admission that the one hundred and eighty-four slaves sold by Camp were included in the inventories and appraisements exhibited, and also in the stock mortgages heretofore introduced—to which, with the additional fact that the defendants herein are now suing the purchasers for the same slaves, is assented to by both parties, and these facts to be considered as proved.

Defendant's counsel then moved to introduce the vouchers rejected by the Judge of Probate, viz: two receipts for payments made to Mrs. Martha Ann Manly, on account of her dower interest, and on account of James T. Archer, and to have allowance therefor, to wit:

Received, Tallahassee, 27th March, 1846, of W. D. Moseley, administrator de bonis non on the estate of Samuel Parkhill, deceased, five-hundred and sixty 24-100 dollars, on account of my wife's dower in said estate for the year 1845. H. MANLY.

Received of W. D. Moseley, administrator de bonis non of the estate of Samuel Parkhill, the following notes in part payment of my wife's dower out of said estate, to wit: Edward Houstoun, R. A. Shine, J. S. Bond's note for $352, with a credit by J. G. Gamble, of $129; L. H. Branch, Joseph Branch and E. Bradford's note for $80; credit by 9 90-100 dollars; Thomas Lang, John Hardin and W. S. Murray's note for $54, credited with $8; R. A. Shine, Edward Houstoun, and J. B. Bull's note for $176; R. W. Alston, Minor Walker and Thomas Gordon's note for 144 dollars, credited with 94 60-100 dollars; H. Bond, J. W. Argyle and W. F. Lloyd's note for $64; T. A. Bradford, E. Bradford and L. H. Branch's note for $20.

H. MANLY.

688 Received of William D. Moseley, administrator de bonis non of the estate of Samuel Parkhill, the sum of fifty one dollars on account of moneys paid by me to the clerk of Leon Circuit Court, for expenses and costs on appeals taken by the administrators to the Supreme Court of the State, 28th February, A. D. 1846.

JAMES T. ARCHER.

To the introduction and allowance of the payments made to Mrs. Manly, widow of said Parkhill, the plaintiff, by its counsel, objected because her allowance or share in the personal estate of said Samuel Parkhill had not been allotted and set apart to her as provided by law, but the court overruled the objection, and allowed the receipts to be read in evidence to the jury: to which the plaintiff, by its counsel, excepted.

Defendant's counsel then moved to introduce evidence under the said issue of plene administravit of the liability of defendants for counsel fees and expenses of the administration on the ground of a right of retainer to that extent, to the admission of which evidence the plaintiff, by its counsel, objected; but the court overruled the objection and ordered the evidence to be admitted; to which decision the plaintiff excepted.

And thereupon, under said decision, the defendants introduced Medicus A. Long, who being duly sworn deposed, says he is aware of the services rendered the administrators by their counsel, in the following suits, to wit: The foreclosure suit brought by the bank against Mrs. Manly and her husband; was present at the trials in the Superior and Supreme Courts. He also knows of the detinue suits now pending brought by the administrators of Parkhill, said to be some twenty in number, for all which and other services he thinks the sum of three thousand or thirty-five hundred dollars, including the present suit, a reasonable charge.

Also Simon Towle, a witness duly sworn in this behalf, who deposed that certain suits for slaves had been brought in Louisiana, fifteen slaves in number, there were two purchasers of these slaves. Defendants are liable for costs of suits there, if they fail, and also for counsel fees; no sum of the latter has been agreed upon, would probably be some three or four hundred dollars if unsuccessful—if successful, it may amount to seven or eight hundred dollars.

Also John B. Keen, who deposed that the Clerk's office of the Circuit Court had claims for fees against defendants as administrators—two hundred dollars would cover the amount.

Union Bank vs. Parkhill's Admr's—cross writs of error.—Statement of Case..

Also recalled Judge Broome, who deposed that the defendants as 689 administrators of Parkhill, were indebted to his office from two hundred to two hundred and twenty dollars; it is for fees in the audit of accounts.

And here the defendants rested their cause.

Plaintiff, by its counsel, then introduced the mandate of the Supreme Court reversing the judgment of the Union Bank of Florida, against Manly and wife, administrators of S. Parkhill, to wit:

STATE OF FLORIDA.

To the Honorable the Judge of the Circuit Court of the Middle Circuit of Florida in and for Leon County—Greeting.

Whereas, lately in the Superior Court of the Middle District of Florida in and for the county of Leon, before you in a cause between the Union Bank of Florida, plaintiff, and Martha Ann Manly and Hiram Manly in right of his wife, said Martha, administrators of Samuel Parkhill, deceased, defendants, the judgment of said Superior Court was in the following words, to wit: This day came the parcial demurrer to the defendant's rejoinder to the plaintiff's replication ties, by their attorneys, and the plaintiff, by its attorney, filed its special demurrer to the defendant's amended plea puis darrien con- which demurrer the defendant's joined: Whereupon the matters of law arising upon the plaintiff's demurrer to the said rejoinder being argued, it seems to the court here, that the said rejoinder and the matters and things therein alleged, are not sufficient in law to bar or preclude the plaintiff from having and maintaining its action aforesaid against the defendants. Therefore it is considered by the court, that the said plaintiff recover against the said defendant, the sum of $94,182 22-100 parcel of the debt in the declaration mentioned and the sum of $27,982 65-100 its damages, making together the sum of one hundred and twenty-two thousand one hundred and sixty-four dollars and eighty-seven cents, and its costs by it about its suit in this behalf expended, to be levied of the goods and chattels, slaves, lands, and tenements, of the said intestate Samuel Parkhill, deceased, in the hands of the defendants to be administered, and the said defendant in mercy, &c., as by inspection of the transcript of the record of the said Superior Court which was brought into the Supreme Court of the State of Florida, by virtue of a writ of error, agreeably to the act of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, continued in force in this State by the Constitution of this State in such 690 case made and provided, fully and at large appears: And whereas, at the January term, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-six, the said cause came on to be heard before the said Supreme Court on the said transcript of the record, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof it was considered by said Supreme Court,, that the said judgment of the Superior Court for Leon county, to be reversed, annulled, and set aside, and that the plaintiffs in error recover against the said Union Bank of Florida, the defendant in error, their costs by them about this suit in this behalf expended, which costs amount to the sum of $25 89-100.

You therefore, are hereby commanded, that such proceedings be had in said cause as according to right and justice and the laws of the State of Florida, ought to be had, the said writ of error notwithstanding. Witness the Honorable Thomas Douglas, Chief Justice of said Supreme Court, at Tallahassee, this fourth day of May, A. D. 1846.

[Seal.] M. D. PAPY,
Clerk Supreme Court.

Also the judgment of the Circuit Court and dismissal of suit therein to wit: At a Circuit Court for the county of Leon, continued and held at the Court House in the City of Tallahassee, on Saturday the 9th day of May, A. D. 1846: Present the Honorable George W. Macrae, Judge, &c

The Union Bank of Florida, plaintiff,
vs.
Martha Ann Manly, and Hiram Manly, in right of his wife, said Martha, administrators of Samuel Parkhill, deceased, defendant } In debt.

This day came the defendants by their attorney, and presented to the court here, the mandate of the Supreme Court of this State, to which an appeal had been taken by the defendants from a judgment heretofore rendered in this cause, by which mandate it appears that the judgment heretofore rendered in this cause was reversed, annulled and set aside, and that the cause be ordered to be remanded to the Circuit Court for Leon county, with directions to that court that such proceedings be had in said cause, as according to right and justice and to the laws of Florida ought to be had. It is, therefore, ordered that the judgment heretofore rendered in this cause in the Su-

Union Bank vs. Parkhill's Admr's—cross writs of error.—Statement of Case..

691 perior court for the county of Leon be annulled and set aside, and that the said defendants, as administrators as aforesaid, recover against the said Union Bank of Florida their costs by them about their defence in this behalf expended, as well in the said Supreme Court, as in the said Superior and Circuit Courts, to be taxed by the clerk of this court.

The said plaintiff offered in evidence sixty-nine bonds of the Territory of Florida, issued and negotiated by the Union Bank of Florida, under its act or charter of incorporation, amounting to the sum of sixty-nine thousand dollars, being the amount for which the slaves of Samuel Parkhill, in the said nine stock mortgages, were held and bound; for the purpose of showing that the plaintiff had, by taking up the said bonds of the territory, relieved the property from any lien, real or pretended, of the said Territory of Florida upon the mortgages in question, or so much of the property specified and conveyed therein. The plaintiff admitting that the security on all lands and negroes in the mortgage mentioned was in solido and attached to all and every part of the same, and that the bonds offered were not the property of the bank, but held in trust by it for a creditor of the bank. But the court refused to allow said evidence to go to the jury—to which refusal, the plaintiff by its counsel excepts.

This being all the evidence introduced, and the cause having been fully argued to the jury, the said plaintiff by its counsel prayed the court to instruct the jury—

That the Union Bank, for itself, and as trustee, a depository of the territory, and for the security of the territory itself, hath, by virtue of the stock mortgages offered in evidence in this case, and of the act of incorporation of the Union Bank, and the acts amendatory thereto, a lien on the mortgaged property covered by the stock mortgages of Samuel Parkhill, not only for the nominal amount of the mortgages for stock, but also for the amount of the stock note or loan of two-thirds, made to the stockholder, Parkhill, on pledge of stock, and which is sued upon in this action, with interest on such stock loan, and, therefore, the property contained in the inventory, and included in the said stock mortgages, are assets in the hands of defendant Moseley, applicable to the discharge of the plaintiff's debt demanded in this action.

Which instruction the court refused to give, and the court instructed the jury as follows, to-wit:

692 1. That the capital of the Union Bank of Florida was raised through means of the territorial bonds—that these, though in form the obligation of the territorial Government, were in effect and actually bonds of the stockholders, the obligation by the Territorial Government being assumed as a means to effect their negotiation in the foreign market.

2. That the said bond and mortgage executed to the bank by the stockholder, are by the 8th section of the charter, intended to secure payment of the principal and interest of the bonds issued by the territory, and are in contemplation of law as if both bond and mortgage had been originally made and executed to the capitalist, or holder of the territorial bonds, by the stockholder. That so soon as the money was raised by sale of the bonds, the stockholder became debtor and bondholder, or capitalist, the creditor, the debt being secured primarily by the bond and mortgage of the stockholder, and again by the endorsement of the bank, and by the engagement of the territory.

3. That the bond and mortgage of the stockholder being payable to the bank, constituted the bank as agent and trustee to see principal and interest paid agreeably to the terms of the bond and mortgage. That so soon as the bank received the money, through the sale of the bonds at par, eo instanti the shares of stock were paid in full.

4. That the bank cannot, through a judgment and execution in its favor, divert the mortgaged property from the purposes and objects designed by the mortgage and the charter of the bank, and that a sale thereunder is in violation of its trust and illegal.

5. That the debt on which the present suit is founded is for a loan and though secured, like every other debt of a stockholder, by his shares, is not secured, either directly or indirectly, by the mortgage of the stockholder.

6. That an assignment of the bond and mortgage of the stockholder by the bank, in payment of territorial bonds, will entitle the assignee to coerce payment through a sale of the property, on the terms prescribed by the mortgage, and that the bank itself may enforce sale thereof in such manner and for such purpose, but that said property may not, except by consent of all parties, interested, be sold by the said bank in any other manner.

To all which said several decisions, rulings, judgments, instructions and refusals to instruct the jury, as prayed for by plaintiff 693 the said plaintiff by its counsel excepts; and forasmuch as the said several decisions, rulings, judgments, instructions and refusals to instruct, do not appear of record, the said plaintiff by its counsel tenders this his bill of exceptions, and prays that the same may be signed, sealed and made part of the record, and it is done accordingly.

[SEAL.] THOMAS BALTZELL, Judge.

The defendants by their attorneys also excepted to various rulings f the court, which exceptions were noted in the following bill of exceptions filed by defendants:

On the trial of this cause, the evidence was offered and admitted or refused, and other proceedings had, in all respects as set forth in plaintiff's bill of exceptions, to which bill of exceptions reference is here made by consent, to avoid useless repetition.

Upon which state of facts and the pleadings, the court gave the following instructions, to which the defendants by counsel excepted, save the second:

1. That it is competent for a person obtaining a loan (on stock) to pay the interest in advance at the time of the loan, and such an arrangement freely and fairly made is not condemned or prohibited by the laws of usury, or by the charter of the bank.

2. That the stockholder under the 29th section was entitled to a loan equal to two-thirds the amount of his shares—in other words, was entitled to the entire sum, without a deduction of interest, at the time of the loan.

3. That it was competent for the stockholder, however, to waive his privilege of taking the entire two-thirds, and pay the interest in advance, as provided under the 28th section, and that such an arrangement is not illegal.

4. That if the jury are of opinion that such an arrangement was made with the mutual consent and approbation of the officers of the bank, and the stockholders, and became a custom and usage of the bank, thereby asserting and fixing such a construction that defendants are precluded by it, and cannot now complain of it.

5. There being no pretence that more than ten per cent. interest was taken under this contract, or that there was any corrupt or wilful design to take more than the amount allowed by the charter, there is no forfeiture of the interest, as provided by the law of usury, or of the principal and interest, as contended by the defendants.

6. That the taking interest in advance on the note sued on, except 694 in pursuance of such wilful and corrupt design, was not illegal, and was not improper in this case.

11. That there was no disposition or sale of the stock by the bank, as provided by the charter, and defendant is not entitled to a set off therefor.

12. That if there was neglect of duty in making a sale as provided, it was matter for suit, and to be compensated in damages, and not the subject of set off or payment.

13. That the sale of shares by the bank was a cumulative remedy, and that it might elect either a suit on the note, or sell after forfeiture, and until satisfaction by one of the means, the note was not extinguished.

14. If the jury are of opinion that the arrangement of reserving interest in advance on the stock note, was not with assent and free accord of said Parkhill, but coerced from him by the bank, and submitted to as the only means of securing his rights under the charter, then the arrangement was illegal, so far as the exaction of interest was received in advance.

Defendants by counsel then moved the court to instruct the jury, as follows:

1. That plaintiff had not power in loans under the 29th section of its charter, being stock loans to stockholders, to deduct interest in advance, or discount bonds or notes; which was refused by the court.

2. That plaintiff had no power by its whole charter, and the general law of the land in force, pending the whole of its stock loan transactions with defendant's intestate, to take more than at the rate of eight per centum per annum interest in any case or in any manner, whether taken in advance or paid subsequently; which was refused by the court.

3. That interest on loans under the 29th section of the charter, could only be required to be annually paid up; which was granted.

4. That in calculating the interest due annually upon the stock loan of each stockholder, it was lawful only to calculate interest by the year, or proportions of a year; and if the jury believe from the evidence that at any time, at any of said stock loans or renewals for any number of days, or in discounting for days of grace, that interest was calculated by reckoning a day as the 360th part of a year, and

Union Bank vs. Parkhill's Admr's—cross writs of error.—Statement of Case..

695 interest was so taken or deducted in the loan or transacted, that such calculation and taking or deducting was illegal; which was refused by the court, who gave in lieu thereof, "that in such case the excess of interest was illegal, and should be deducted."

5. That if the jury believe from the evidence that the bank, by taking interest in advance, upon any of the original stock loans which have resulted in and been consolidated in the paper now in suit, or by calculating a year at 360 days, took more than the rate of eight per centum per annum interest, that the plaintiff had no right by charter so to do, and cannot recover in this action; which was refused.

6. That the plaintiff's charter, is an enabling charter, and only gives power to do that which is expressly granted or necessarily implied in the granted powers. That plaintiff can do nothing which is prohibited, so as to give itself any right thereby; and that in all things done or attempted to be done by the plaintiff, which are prohibited by the charter, or power to do which is withheld or not given, either expressly or by necessary implication, such acts or attempts are without law or authority, and as to them there is no charter or corporation, and out of such acts or attempts no contract or cause of action can arise, and as to the same there is no party on the side of the corporation, capable of contracting or of bringing an action for violation of contract, and no suit can be instituted or recovery had, on any such act or attempt beyond the law of its existence and nature. And that there is no express grant and no necessarily implied power to take interest in advance upon stock loans, or in any wise or mode on such loans, to take more than at the rate of eight per centum per annum interest in the charter of the plaintiff; and on the contrary the taking of more than the rate of eight per cent. per annum is expressly prohibited.

Which was refused by the court.

7. That though by the general law in force pending these transactions, natural persons might take more than the rate of eight per cent. per annum, by expressing the same in the contract, yet in this case there is no evidence of any express agreement to give or take more than eight per cent. per annum yet the bank being entirely a creature of legislation, and expressly prohibited, could not take in any case, more than at the rate of eight per centum interest, and any attempts so to do could create no contract.

8. That any contract by the bank under the 29th section, taking 696 or reserving more than at the rate of eight per centum per annum, is usurious, and by the charter, each stockholder is entitled to a credit or loan fully equal to two-thirds the amount of his shares, and Parkhill's administrators are entitled to have a credit for all monies paid or withheld upon pretence of interest in advance, or beyond the rate of eight per centum per annum, together with interest on the same at the rate of eight per cent. from the time of such payment or withholding, and the same may be allowed either by way or recoupment under the plea of judgment or money had and received in the plea of set-off; which was refused by the court.

9. That by the 29th section of the charter, Parkhill, and his representatives after his death, were entitled to a loan equal to two-thirds the amount of his shares, to continue pending the existing of the bank, subject only to the proviso, that the note or obligation should be annually renewed, and the interest paid up: That this proviso does not make a condition precedent or subsequent to defeat the loan and render the same payable or recoverable by action thereon, upon the stock obligation, but is simply directory to the officers of the bank and the stockholder, and further operates as an agreement or covenant to pay interest by the stockholder annually, and in default thereof gives a right of action for such interest only or to sell stock.

Which was refused by the court.

10. The 9th being refused, counsel further prayed the court to instruct the jury—That if the proviso is to be considered as a condition, it could only be a condition subsequent to defeat the continuance of the loan, and if so, there were two conditions required, 1st—giving a note or obligation annually, 2d—paying up interest annually, and that the continuance of the loan could not in this case be defeated by failure to give an obligation annually, because that is rendered impossible by the act of God, in the death of Samuel Parkhill, and act of law, which renders his representatives incapable of giving a new obligation of a character to bind the estate, or constitute a proper legal renewal of Parkhills obligation. And that if the jury believe that at any time more than the rate of eight per cent. per annum has been intentionally taken by the bank upon this loan, or any part of it, embraced in the note in suit, then all interest is void and irrecoverable, and all obligation to pay interest by Parkhill or his representatives is done away with, by the act of the other party, and so there is in the case supposed no condition broken in this case to the continuance of the loan, and it cannot be recovered; which was re- 697 fused by the court.

11. That, if there has been a valid sale of Parkhill's stock, his representatives would in this action be entitled to recover its value as sold—and if there has been no valid sale, and Parkhill's representatives are still the owners of the stock, the bank cannot recover in this action upon the stock note, because the administrators could not renew the note, and upon payment of interest would be entitled to keep the loan—and to give a judgment for the principal would be to give judgment against them to recover that which they have a right to keep, the interest only being due to the bank; which was refused by the court.

12. That, by the second section of the amended charter, March 1, 1839, it became the duty of the bank to sell, on ten days' notice, the shares of any stockholder, which became forfeited under the first section of that act, and that the bank must show a compliance with this duty and the amount of sale, before it can sue on the stock note, and that the amount of such sale (except the premium) must be credited to the owner of the stock; which was refused by the court.

13. That the bank, after lawfully declaring Parkhill's stock forfeited, and advertising and selling to the highest bidder, (if the jury believe such was the fact,) diverted all interest of Parkhill or his representatives at the moment of such sale, and they were in no manner responsible for the conduct of such purchaser, and could not, either by his failure or compliance with the charter, become re-invested, without their own express consent, with the ownership of said stock, or responsible for any conduct of the purchaser, or bound to enquire into the same, but had a right to treat the said sale as legal, and to insist upon all legal consequences therefrom arising; which was refused by the court.

14. That, upon forfeiture, the bank was bound to sell, on ten days' notice, and if it failed so to do, was responsible in this action for the highest rate at which sales had been made, or at least the par value of the stock, unless they proved it to be then worth less than par; which was refused by the court.

15. That the restriction in the 28th section of the charter to the bank, not to exceed the rate of eight per cent. per annum, is the "expression" of the rate of interest which the bank could not exceed, when no other rate is mentioned, and as a part of every contract (as a limit) the bank might make—and if it is not such an ex- 698 pression in this case, then no rate of interest is expressed, and the rate of eight per cent. could not be exceeded by the general interest law then in force; and if the jury believe this has been exceeded intentionally, (not by miscalculation or mistake,) then the defendants are entitled to recover all the interest paid since such excess was first taken; which was refused by the court.

To which refusals, the defendants by counsel excepted, and prayed that this their bill of exceptions might be signed and sealed by the court, and made a part of the record, which is done accordingly.

[SEAL.] THOMAS BALTZELL, Judge.

The plaintiff prosecuted a writ of error in this court, to reverse the judgment rendered in the Circuit Court, and assigned errors in conformity with the exceptions taken in the plaintiff's bill of exceptions.

The defendants also prosecuted a writ of error in this court to reverse the judgment, and assigned errors in conformity with the exceptions taken by them at the trial, and specified in their bill of exceptions.

The questions arising on the errors assigned by the bank, were first argued.

Thompson, in support of the errors assigned.

Archer, contra, contended—

That inasmuch as the verdict and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff (the bank), except as to the question of assets in the hands of the defendants, the only error assignable by the plaintiff is, that upon the pleadings and proofs in this case, the judgment should have been rendered for assets in hand, and not for assets quando acciderint. That all the other points raised in argument upon this assignment of errors, are irrelevant, and therefore, require no response.

2. That the lands and slaves mortgaged by Samuel Parkhill to secure his subscription for stock to the Union Bank, were by the charter secured to the possession of the stockholder, (Samuel Parkhill,) until the maturity of the mortgages, to be held as a fund to redeem the outstanding obligations of the Territory issued to accommodate the bank, and upon faith and pledge of these mortgages, and the property therein contained—That to allow these slaves and lands to be sold by the bank under judgment and execution based upon the stock note or any accommodation paper, would be a diversion of this fund and a destruction of the indemnity secured to the territory of Florida—That therefore these lands and slaves, if in the possession of the defendants, are not assets in their hands liable for the payment of the stock note.

3. That the shares of stock pledged for the payment of the stock note cannot be construed to embrace the lands and slaves mortgaged by the stockholder to secure the ultimate payment of his subscriptions to the bank—That upon failure of the stockholder to pay his annual interest on the stock note, the charter contemplated a sale of his shares of stock, not of his lands and slaves—That according to the testimony, such sale of the shares was made in this case, and a premium bid for the stock.

4. That the amendment of the charter, (1839,) on which the plaintiff mainly relies to establish that the property mortgaged for subscriptions of stock, is liable to sale under judgment on the stock note, is not obligatory upon the stockholders—That the original charter is a contract, and contains no provision for its amendment or alteration and cannot be amended or altered by the Legislature, except by the unanimous consent of the stockholders—That unless there be authority in the original charter for amendments, no subsequent amendment can bind any stockholder who rejects the amendment; and if any reject it, it cannot bind the others, for it cannot be the law of the corporation unless it binds all.

5. That the deposit of sixty-nine Territorial Bonds in the registry of the court calling for $69,000, does not relieve the incumbrance upon these lands or slaves, created by the stock mortgages.—It is admitted that the lands and slaves are thus mortgaged in solido for about double that sum—if these incumbrances can be relieved in this mode so as to make the property subject to execution, based upon the stock note—Territorial Bonds to the whole amount should have been deposited.

6. That upon the proofs in this case, the finding of the jury as to the question of assets, was correct, and that by reason of any thing in the plaintiff's exceptions, the judgment ought not to be reversed.

Randall, for the Bank, in reply:

The object and purpose of the creation of this corporation were to promote certain ends, deemed beneficial to the public, viz:

I. The introduction of foreign capital into the country, and as consequences to result—700 1. Greater extension and facilities to business.

2 Diminution of the rate of interest.

3. Increased facility to the State, of the power of taxation. These benefits were realized to the extent anticipated.

II. The "bonus" secured to the State by the 23d section of the charter. This last benefit, it is admitted, has not been realized—nevertheless, its promise was a part consideration to the territory for the franchise granted.

Principles of law applicable to this and other corporations. "It possesses only those properties which the charter of its creation confers upon it, either expressly, or as incidental to its very existence. These are such as are supposed best calculated to effect the object for which it was created." Opinion of Ch. J. Marshall, in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Con. R., 544.

These objects "are such universally as the government wishes to promote. They are deemed beneficial to the country, and this benefit constitutes the consideration for the grant." Ibid.

Distinctive character of this bank, as compared with ordinary banks of discount and deposit—

First and great distinction. The stockholders paid in no money, on account of their subscription for stock. The capital of the bank was borrowed on faith bonds of the Territory of Florida, payable to and endorsed by the bank, on the sale of which the fund was raised. Bonds and mortgages by the stockholders on their lands and slaves were made payable to the bank, to cover the amounts of their subscription, and to an amount equal to that for which the territory issued its bonds. See 1st and 10th sections of Charter, Thompson's Digest, 284, 287.

By 11th section of the charter, Thomp. D., 288, the bank, and not the territory, was primarily to pay—although by the terms of the bond, the territory was absolutely bound to the bondholders. See 13th and 14th sections of the charter.

Second. Another provision distinguishing this Union Bank was, that the stockholders, on the faith of their subscription thus secured, were entitled to a loan of two-thirds of their stock shares. 29th section of Charter.

From a review of the whole charter it results—

1. That, though the faith of the State was pledged to raise the capital of the bank, yet the loan, which brought this capital into the vaults of the bank, was negotiated and made by the bank, and its 701 proceeds to be subject to the management of the bank, under the terms of its charter, and is resulting negatively.

II. The loan was not made to the State, nor to the stockholders of the bank individually, but to the corporation aggregate, the bank alone. See 1st, 10th, and 11th sections of the Charter.

III. That all mortgage securities taken by the bank, under terms of its charter, and contracts made in pursuance thereof, belong to the bank exclusively, in every legal sense.

1. Such pledges were taken to the bank alone.

2. They were to remain in custody and possession of the bank, by 9th section of charter.

3. By same 9th section, the bank could transfer, release and discharge them, substituting others—releasing old stockholders and their property and receiving new ones.

Thus, then, the bank had full control of these securities, with no power reserved to the State to direct its action. If there was any equity in the State to control or interfere with the subject, it was a latent equity, to be called into action by a suitable remedy, and not to be collaterally invoked by third parties.

If the bank was a trustee, it was a trustee coupled with an interest and free to act, unless controlled by a court of equity acting directly on the subject, and at the instance of proper parties.

But if it were possible that the mortgagors had any thing to do with the application of the trust fund, (if trust fund it is to be considered,) then finally we reply, that payment, or tender to pay, must precede the application.

Let the present defendants make payment, and its application will go, as they contend it should go, to the bondholders of the bank, and to the release and indemnity of the State.

The exhibition in court in this case of sixty-nine bonds, adequate to cover all the mortgaged property, and their tender in release of and indemnity to the State, prove this intended application.

The case before the court exhibits beyond question, that defendant's intestate was largely indebted to the bank on his stock loan, and for arrears of interest for many years—with an enormous floating debt, and only partially secured, on accommodation paper.

How is this large debt to be collected? By the forfeiture and sale of his shares of stock—say defendants—the only remedy secured to the bank, according to their agreement.

But the facts of this case, and the whole history of the bank, prove 702 that this is no remedy at all. The shares now and for years, have been nothing worth—cannot be sold, on the terms of the charter. They could only be sold on the condition of a new stockholder substituting other mortgaged property of equal value in place of the retiring stockholder. None such can now be met with—for it would be incurring a burden, a liability, with no prospect of advantage or safety. Even the loan of two-thirds of the amount of stock could not now be secured to the new stockholder, if he was willing to take it—for that yet remains with the defaulting stockholder, not collected, and not collectible, say defendants, until the expiration of the charter.

We say that the forfeiture and sale of the "shares," provided for in the 29th section of the old charter, and by the amendment of 1839, necessarily involves and carries with it the forfeiture of the property, real and personal, mortgaged to secure these shares.

This amendment of 1839 is said not to be valid or binding, although accepted by a large majority of the corporation, at general meeting of the stockholders. On principle and authority we affirm the contrary. The powers previously imparted to the company made it a legal being, an equity and a unit—acting not through the agency of its individual corporators, but in its aggregate and corporate capacity.

Its consent then to the amendment being expressed in the mode pointed out in the charter, binds and concludes as well as those assenting to, as those dissenting from, the amendment.

Samuel Parkhill, defendant's intestate, in his life time voted with the majority to accept this amendment. Angel & Ames on Corp. p. 280, and cases cited. Witshul v. Gaither, 6 T. R. 388. Ex parte Rogers, 7 Cowen, 530, note.

And now the main question which I have to discuss, properly arises, and that is:

Whether on failure of any stockholder, to renew his note or bond for his stock loan, and to pay the interest due thereon—and after a judgment at law upon said bond or note, it is competent for the bank to subject the mortgaged premises to execution in satisfaction thereof?

1. We hold that such a resort is indispensable to preserve the very existence of the bank, to enable it to observe its faith and obligations to the State, to its bondholders and general creditors. It is only necessary to sustain the negative of this proposition, in the present

705 case, and in two or three more even of less magnitude, to wind up and close the institution in bankruptcy and ruin.

The very end and object of its creation would be defeated by such a principle of construction. For unless the bank can collect its debts, it is obvious it cannot discharge its liabilities. Invoking here the principles announced by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dartmouth College case—quoted in the outset—as applicable to the construction of charters,

2. We proceed to the special facts and law of this case.

The bond in suit is for a loan obtained by defendant, Parkhill, in his life time, under the 29th section of the charter—and "on a pledge of his shares of stock." And now what does this pledge mean?

In ordinary banks, a pledge and forfeiture and sale of "shares of stock," when those shares represented money paid, would insure a full satisfaction of the debt.

In the Union Bank, unless the term "shares of stock," carry with it and involve also, "the property pledged" to secure those shares, the forfeiture and sale of the shares simply and alone, as was attempted in this case, secure to the bank no return whatever.

That surely was not the design of the charter. By the 29th section, the stockholder can only obtain a loan by giving and renewing his notes, &c., "for the repayment of the money annually, and having paid the interest up."

If he do not pay the interest up, he cannot renew his note or bond. At maturity if not renewed, is it not due and payable—principal as well as interest? How can this result be avoided? But on the other side, it is said the loan is permanent to the end of the charter.

Now this we deny—and we challenge the production of a line or word in the charter which can sustain such an assertion.

The 29th section speaks no such language—imports no such privilege.

The loan is not to exceed one year. It is then limited. It is to be made upon condition precedent of renewing note and paying up interest.

It is then not absolute—the right—but conditional. Being then a loan for one year, when past due and not renewed or paid, what is to become of it? May it not be sued for and recovered? So the court below decided and gave us a judgment. But how is it to be satisfied?

It is in evidence in this cause, that except the property mortgaged to this bank, Parkhill's estate has none other, is utterly insolvent.

704 Why then may not the plaintiff, the judgment creditor, holding this very property mortgaged to secure this very debt, apply it to its satisfaction?

We know of no principle of law or equity without the charter, to prevent it.

If it is right to do so, be kept in abeyance, be suspended to the end of the charter, its final resort will be utterly valueless.

And now looking to the terms of the charter in this connection, and particularly of the 9th section, we confidently assert:

1. That at their own creation "the shares of stock" and "the mortgaged property," which secured them, were intimately blended, and formed one subject of property, were in fact convertible terms.

2. That when loaned on the terms and conditions of that section, by the substitution of money—of cash for property—the loan contracted on the faith of this subject, attached not to the "shares" alone, but to the "property." The words "such loans as may have been made on the faith of it," refer for their antecedent to the word "property" in the line above—the word "property" is the only antecedent.

This 9th section preceding the other sections which bear upon this point, furnishes the cardinal rule of construction to them all, and to be made sensible, they must be made consistent therewith.

Now refer to the 22d section and it will be seen that to secure any remedy for the debt of the retiring stockholder, this same identity of "shares" and "property mortgaged," must be maintained; we see by that section that while the shares pass to the new stockholder, the lien for the debt attaches to the property pledged by the old or retiring stockholder.

See next the 26th section and note the terms "mortgages for loans" as there used. They are said to be "for loans given by virtue of this act." Then the "mortgage" is by the very terms of the act, to secure the "loan" as well as the "stock or bond."

How utterly does this reading repudiate the notion on the other side, that the mortgage was given only to secure the latter, the stock bond or note—while the "shares" alone were held to secure the loan.

The 27th section sustains our construction also. "Any individual who shall have obtained from said bank 'a loan,' secured by mortgage," &c. The term "loan" here is generally used, and applies as well to "stock loans" as others.

In answer to the position advanced on the other side, that until 705 the expiration of the charter, the interest only, and not the principal of the loan can be collected by the bank, let the 22d section be again referred to; and it will be seen that, in cases of default of payment, "the debt," the whole debt, and not mere "interest" is recoverable, and that upon "failure of payment," and not at the end of the charter.

This critical analysis of the charter, then, leads to the same conclusion, that an inquiry into the spirit and object of the institution, and the means essential to its successful operation, if not to its very existence, would conduct us; and we respectfully suggest to the court, that convinced, as they must be, of the necessity of the resort to secure payment, for which we contend, the judicial eye of the court should be directed to the charter, with a view favorable to the construction for which we contend. But we ask for no strained or forced construction, but that their ordinary meaning be given to ordinary terms.

An objection has been made to the use by the bank of Rowlett's tables for the computation of interest. A full and satisfactory answer to that objection will be furnished by my associate counsel, Mr. Thompson.

Another objection and ground of defence has been taken to our recovery, on the ground of the practice of the bank in exacting interest in advance, or by way of discount, as in this case, on stock loans. That objection, too, will be more fully considered and answered by Mr. Thompson. But I may here briefly state, that the only section in the charter which regulates the rate of interest, the 28th section, gives the power to the bank of deducting the interest in advance, both upon "loans and discounts."

Moreover the uniform practice from the beginning of the bank—the acquiescence of all parties, and the fact that it was adopted in good faith, being a provision against the interest of stockholders, and in favor of the territory and creditors of the bank—make it a matter of public policy to sustain the usage if possible. Nay, to allow one of the corporators to escape from his debt on this ground, would be to offer him a premium for his own error or misconduct, and at the expense of honest creditors.

This cause was further argued on the questions arising upon the errors assigned by the defendants.

Brockenbrough, for the administrators: 706

1. To prove the plaintiff's case, it must show a grant.

The corporation is extinct. This bank was incorporated by the act of the Governor and Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, on the 13th February, 1833—amended on the 14th February, 1835—again in 1836, and March 1, 1839.

By the 15th section of the act, 1833, it is created a body politic and corporate, for and during the term of forty years from the passage of that act.

By act of Congress, 3d of March, 1845, Florida was declared to be a State of the United States of America, and thereby admitted into the Union on equal footing with the original States "in all respects whatsoever."

The question is, whether the corporation did not perish on the 3d of March, 1845, notwithstanding its forty years' grant? To determine this, we must look to the power of the grantor.

The grant was made by the Governor and Legislative Council.—The first act of the establishment of a Territorial Government, March 30, 1822—3 Story's Laws, 1828—invests the power of legislation over all rightful subjects of legislation—not violating the laws or constitution of the United States, or the right to religious freedom—in a Governor and thirteen discreet persons, to be appointed annually by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate.

The act of 3d March, 1823—3d Story, 1902—made no alteration in this respect.

The act of May 15th, 1826—3 Story, 2025—only altered this system so far as to make the council elected by the people, instead of the President and Senate; and all subsequent acts have not changed the investiture of the powers, but only added to the numbers of the council, and erected it into two houses, and in all, the unlimited power of repeal is reserved to Congress.

The question will not be made, whether this legislative power could grant a charter to a bank, to be valid during the Territorial Government. But the power to make such a grant, to exceed the territorial life, is denied, as a general proposition, and specially with regard to Florida.

Assuming this power to be as great as the power of Congress over Florida, (and it could not be greater)—let us suppose that this grant has been made by the same charter, directly by act of Congress

707 with or without the power of repeal, which was reserved over all acts of the Legislative Council, the act or grant must be held repealed and annulled, by the admission of the State upon an equal footing with the original states—or in other words, the grant of forty years must always have had the implied and necessary limitation going with it, "provided the territory shall so long continue"—because, in addition to the great questions of right and of constitutional law, the whole charter shows that the existence of the territory is incorporated with its own existence in every fibre, and is absolutely necessary to it. The one could not be destroyed without the other. The 25th section, providing for exemption from taxation, manifestly considers the existence of the territory and continuance of the charter as co-terminous.

Apart from all reserved and implied power of repeal or implied limitation in the grant, the very act of admission must annul the grant. States cannot be admitted, except on an equal footing with the old States. Congress has power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States—and conceding that this gives control over all rightful subjecs of legislation it does not follow that that power and right extends over a sovereign State, and that sovereign power can be exercised and franchises and privileges granted away, which belong to the people, for a longer time than the power over the Territorial Governments continue. Congress cannot grant such a privilege in the body of a single State, therefore it cannot grant such a privilege in a territory, to continue over after the State becomes sovereign and is admitted. If so, the States would not be on equal footing. If this franchise could have been validly granted in Florida, to continue now, why might not all the privileges, and franchises and rights of the people have been granted away—and if for forty years, why not forever? If the hands of the people, or their legislature when sovereign, can be tied by contracts of Congress, made whilst they were in pupilage and had no right to consent, in any one paricular, why not in all?—where is the line of limitation? They considered these franchises important in the State constitution, and were very strict with the State legislature in regard to them.

In Permoli v. First Municipality, 3 Howard, 610. in which it was contended that religious liberty, secured by the ordinance of 1787, extended by Congress to Louisiana, was violated by laws and ordi-708 nances of the First Municipality of New Orleans, it was held by the Court, that those acts were in no further force than part of the territorial law of Orleans—and so far as they conferred political or civil and religious rights, the laws of Congress were all superseded by the State Constitution, and none of them were in force, only so far as the constitution adopted them as laws of the State. Can this grant be in force in Florida, then?—or are all acts of Congress only null, which called to aid the political rights of the citizens, but omnipotent, when granting away their franchises?

In Polard's lessee v. Hagan, et al., 3 Howard, 228-'9 the Supreme Court United States says: "Alabama is, therefore, entitled to the sovereignty and jurisidction over all the territory within her limits, subject to the common law to the same extent as Georgia was, &c. To maintain any other doctrine, is to deny that Alabama has been admitted into the Union on equal footing with the original States, the constitution, laws and compact to the contrary notwithstanding."

In the same case, 223-'4, after showing that Alabama, on her admission, succeeded to all the rights of sovereignty, jurisdiction and eminent domain, which belonged to Georgia before the cession, and that by agreement the United States retained nothing but the public lands—and that if an express agreement and stipulation had been inserted, granting the municipal right of sovereignty and eminent domain to the United States, such stipulation would have been inoperative and void, because the United States has no authority to take or exercise municipal jurisdiction, sovereignty, or eminent domain within the limits of a state or elsewhere, except when expressly granted by the constitution of the United States, the court concludes thus: "The right of Alabama and every other new State to exercise all the powers of government which belong to and may be exercised by the original States of the Union, must be admitted and remain unquestioned, except so far as they are temporarily deprived of control over the public lands." That case decides, in the face of the compact, giving all waste and unappropriated lands to the United States, that the soils and shores of navigable rivers belong to the State, in virtue of its eminent domain and municipal sovereignty.—To whom, then, shall the franchises of the people, which they have never conveyed away, belong?

If an express stipulation could not confer upon Congress the power of municipal legislation, or to grant away the common property of 709 the people within the body of a State, how can it make such a grant without stipulation?

But independent of any general reasoning upon this subject, applicable to all territories, Congress could not grant away any of the franchises of the people of Florida for a longer term than its own temporary powers of government. It is inhibited by the supreme law of the land, the treaty of 1819, from so doing.

It is true that, by the 2d article of that treaty, His Catholic Majesty cedes the Floridas in full property and sovereignty. But this is of course subject to the subsequent stipulations in the treaty, which show that though the property and sovereignty was full, it was temporary in its nature, and upon condition of its being made a State as soon as possible, and in conformity with the principles of the Federal Constitution.

The 6th article, 1 Elliott's Diplomatic Code, 420, (on the Spanish side, which is very different from the English side, but which Spanish side is the correct one, to look to, to see what the United States engaged to do in behalf of the subjects of Spain then transferred, and being the language of the party granting, is to be taken most strongly againt the grantor,) stipulates that the inhabitants of the territory which His Catholic Majesty cedes by the treaty to the United States, "shall be incorporated into the union of the same States as soon as possible, according to [or in conformity with 'legus,] the principles of the Federal Constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights and immunities which the citizens of the other States enjoy." The Spanish side makes admission as soon as possible, and applies the principles of the Federal Constitution to the terms of admission, not the time, as in the English side.

This admission as soon as possible in conformity to the principles of that constitution, must mean as that constitution requires upon an equal footing with original States—and especially when coupled with the subsequent part of the same article, which not only secures admission of the State upon an equal footing, but that the inhabitants each and all shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights, privileges and immunities which the citizens of the other States enjoy.

Can this claim be complied with, if a portion of their rights and privileges are previously ceded away by Congress, or its agent, the 710
Territorial Government? The other States are privileged—have immunities, which secure them from such grants by Congress—has Florida, if this grant still continues?

But it follows, also, from this article, that the government of Congress was temporary—it never had perpetual power. It in the act of taking, guaranteed full State's sovereignty unimpaired to the people of Florida, and the full privileges of the people, as soon as possible. Could they in 1833, fourteen years afterwards, cede away those privileges for forty years? It was a violation of the obligation of contracts, of the treaty with Spain, and the constitution of the United States, if such result was intended. That treaty was supreme law. Florida could not violate it in her constitution—could the Territorial Legislature do more than a sovereign State?

This charter was a grant—a contract executed—all the cases in the Supreme Court have gone upon that position, and because they were grants, they have been held inviolable and unsusceptible of repeal. If such was the case, and this grant extended bevond the 3d of March, by virtue of the acts of Congress and the territorial grant, it follows now that it cannot be repealed, or altered, or modified by any power, for its whole term of forty years; for Congress has lost all power of repeal, and the State never has acquired it, if this charter exists by right paramount to the State Constitution and laws.

All these franchises, privileges, immunities granted are property, and have been held inviolable by a State, when validly granted, because they were property. However shadowy may have been the interest of the grantee, though a mere naked trustee, without the slightest beneficiary interest, these franchises have been held to be property, and where valid, contracts irrevocable.

The franchise and privilege in question was one, existing in Florida, to be exercised in Florida, it is carried out of the mass of the privileges of the people of Florida and ceded away—whose property, then, was it that was given away?—not the property of the United States, but of the people of Florida. Their rights, privileges, and immunities were ceded to certain persons.

It matters not for this argument how omnipotent may have been the powers of Congress, they were but temporary. This power to grant was either a part of the sovereign power of the State, with which Congress cannot be invested by treaty with Spain, or other-

711 wise, or it was not. If it was not, then the grant was void now that the State exists, because none but a sovereign power can grant away the privileges of the people and create corporations. If it was one of those sovereign powers of the State, it belongs to the State the instant it is formed and in full perfection, and the grants of the temporary government cannot continue a moment, because if they could then Congress might make such a grant in the body of a State, which is absurd.

If the United States succeeded to all the rights of the King of Spain, that power was but temporary, and could not be exercised beyond the limited time, without violation of the treaty.

But in Pollard's lessee v. Hagan, et al., 3 Howard, 225, it is said "it cannot be admitted that the King of Spain could, by treaty or otherwise, impart to the United States any of his royal prerogatives, and much less can it be admitted that they could have capacity to receive or power to exercise them." Every nation acquiring territory, by treaty or otherwise, must hold it subject to the constitution and laws of its own government, and not according to those of the government ceding it. See Vattel's Law of Nations. And the Court declared a grant invalid, made by the Union ,in Alabama, because the sovereign powers of the King went to that State, and not to the Union.

Suppose this grant for forty years, made on the 2d of March, the day before the admission, it would have been held by all invalid and a fraud upon the right of the State. A person who has an estate for life, or other uncertain interest, may make a grant for years, be cause it is a lesser estate, but it is only valid during the continuance of the uncertain estate.

If this charter had been granted on the 2d of March, and could have been therefore valid on the 5th, why might it not have been granted on the fifth; and what difference can there be in a grant made to take effect in a State which you are bound by treaty to admit untrammelled, and in a State already admitted.

It is stated by Kent, (1 Com., 384,) in a note in his commentaries, that it was decided in the State v. New Orleans Navigation Company, 11 Martin, 309, that a territory could grant a charter binding on the State. No such proposition seems to have been made or decided. The positions were, that Congress had no right to establish a Territorial Government, and if so, that such government could not 712 grant such a charter, and that the charter in that case was void, because repugnant to the acts of Congress—all of which the court decided in the negative. But the position that Congress could not make such a grant, to exist beyond the Territorial Government by its own powers, has never been decided.

Chancellor Kent also refers to Williams v. Bank of Michigan, 9 Wendell, 540, 566, as deciding the territories may incorporate a bank, but it decides nothing more—the question for how long is not settled.

The power was given in that case to adopt such laws of the original States as in their judgment were necessary and suitable to the circumstances of the district, and it was decided they might make similar laws.

It is contended upon these grounds, that the grant necessarily terminated ipso facto by the admission of Florida. If this doctrine be correct, it follows that, on the 3d of March, 1845, the bank expired—that it could live no longer by virtue of its original grant, and it is, therefore, incumbent on the bank to show some new power perpetuating its existence—some authority from the State preserving its life, and this must be something more than a mere implication, it must be equal to the positive grant. There is no such grant to be found in the constitution or laws of the State, and every inference to be drawn from them is the other way.

The only clauses which have ever been quoted as continuing this corporation, as a grant, is the 14th section of the XIIth article of the constitution, which gives the General Assembly power, at its first session, to regulate, restrain and control all associations claiming to exercise corporate privileges in the State, so as to guard, protect and secure the interests of the people of the State, not violating vested rights, or impairing the obligations of contracts. This is utterly inconsistent with the idea of a previous grant, which could not be disturbed in any particular, without consent of the grantees. It is also not a grant itself.

The only legitimate construction of this article is, that the Legislature may, at its first session, make such disposition as it may think proper, concerning "associations claiming to exercise, &c.," necessary to protect the interest of the State, not violating rights and property and contracts previously vested in such corporations. But this is no enactment or grant or any particular corporation, or acknowledgement of the existence of any one.

Union Bank vs. Parkhill's Admr's—cross writs of error.—Arg'nt of Counsel.

The next clause quoted to sustain this bank, as a grant, is the last 713 clause of section 1 of Article XVII, which declares that nothing in this constitution shall impair the obligation of contracts, or violate vested rights, either of individuals, or of associations claiming to exercise corporate privileges in the State." This, doubtless, relates to contracts with corporations and rights vested in them, which it was necessary to save, because the corporations themselves, the franchises, were to go by the board, by the act of admission. At all events, they are not words of grant—they give away none of the privileges of the people, or the state.

They do not continue alive contracts terminated, rights before divested, and corporations already dead. They only declare that the constitution shall not violate contracts, and which it does not. But neither does it preserve alive grants which expired the moment it came into existence; but it is held by some, in despair of fixing this charter upon the State, as a contract, that it is a law, and that it is in force by virtue of the first part of the 1st section of the XVIIth article of the constitution, which declares "that all laws and parts of laws now in force, or which may be hereafter passed by the Governor and Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, not repugnant to the provisions of this constitution, shall continue in force until by operation of their provisions and limitations, the same shall cease to be in force, or until the General Assembly of this state shall alter or repeal the same."

If it is a law, it has been always and always would continue to be subject to repeal. As a law, it is repealed by the act of Congress which admits Florida upon the same footing as the original States. As a law, it is not in force by its own provisions and limitations almost every one of which require the continuance of the Territorial Government.

As a law, it is not in force, because repugnant to the Constitution. Almost every clause of the 13th article entitled "Banks and other Corporations," is wholly repugnant to this bank, and seem in effect to have been aimed at it, and intended to provide expressly against the existence of such an institution in the State, and now the same instrument is invoked as a new grant of the same charter. The 6th section alone of Article XIII is wholly repugnant to the charter of this bank—"Capital shall be created by actual payment of specie therein, and no bank shall borrow money to create or add to its capital, or to conduct its business, and no loans shall be made on stock." 714
The whole capital here, is borrowed and the very life of the bank is loans upon stock. Again, the whole charter absolutely requires the existence of the Territory; the State cannot substitute itself, if it is a contract, and has not done so if it is a law. But the bank cannot live without the territory which is incorporated as a part of it—and an essential part, without which it cannot exist. See King v. Possmore, 8 Tenn., 241-242-3-245-248. Charter U. Bank, Sec. 16 & 30. Duval's Compilation. When any integral part of a corporation is gone, it is dissolved—a corporation dissolved is dead, and treated in court as a dead man. Morrison v. the Potomac Co., 8 Peters, 208.

Mr. Brockenbrough further argued that under proper constructions of the charter of the bank, and under the facts in this case, the instructions asked by defendants, and refused by the court, as set forth in defendant's bill of exceptions, should have been given the jury.

Thompson for the Bank:

1. The first position assumed by counsel of plaintiff in error, and which it is claimed arises upon the judgment of the court below sustaining the demurrer to the seventh plea, is this:—That there is no such corporation as the Union Bank of Florida now existing and capable of suing.

It is admitted that the act of incorporation passed by the Governor and Legislative Council of the Territory, in 1833, was a valid exercise of power, and that it continued legal and valid up to the 3d March, 1845, when it is contended it expired with the power which called it into existence. The Territorial government it is contended. was a power dependent on Congress and existed but for temporary purposes, and could not make a grant to survive and continue beyond the period of its own existence. That the admission of Florida into the Union operated as a constructive repeal of the charter.

It seems to me that when the power of the territorial government to make the grant is conceded, the question of the existence of the corporation beyond the period of the existence of the government is conceded with it.

The Territorial government was but temporary, it is true; still it was to continue until, by the terms of the treaty with Spain, of 1819,

Union Bank vs. Parkhill's Admr's—cross writs of error.—Arg'nt of Counsel.

715 it was admitted into the Union of the States. Its duration was indefinite, too, yet while it continued it must have possessed the ordinary powers of a government to have made the grant; and if contracts grow up under the government, surely a change in its mere form, or the person of the ruler, will not work an abrogation and destruction of such contracts.

That a grant of the powers of incorporation forms a contract is fully maintained in the Supreme Court of the United States, (Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Peters' Cond. Rep., 547-8.) And it is also maintained in that case that the American Revolution did not at all affect the grant of the powers of incorporation to the College made by the British Crown. See pp. 552, 583, 584.

If such be the rule in case of a revolution, in which the former government is put down and abolished by force, surely it cannot be contended that a mere change of government, when the essential form of the State remains unchanged, can have a more injurious effect upon rights acquired under a former government.

The case of Permoli v. the First Municipality of New Orleans, 3 Howard's Sup. Court Rep., 609, decides only that the laws of Congress organizing the Territory of Orleans were repealed by the act of admission of the State of Louisiana. This is not doubted. So, also the laws of Congress organizing the Territorial government of Florida were repealed by the act admitting Florida into the Union, passed 3d March, 1845; yet no contracts or rights which became vested under those laws were destroyed by the repeal.

The case of the State v. the New Orleans Navigation Company it seems to me does go further than the counsel for plaintiff in error was willing to admit. The company was chartered by the Territorial Legislature and, after the admission of the State into the Union, it directed a scire facias against the company and sought to deprive it of its rights. It is true that the principal ground assumed was that the former government had no power to make the grant, yet if there had been any force in the point now made it could not have escaped the notice of the able counsel and court there. At any rate the Supreme Court of Louisana maintained that it was a valid and existing grant at the time of decision. See 2 Condensed Louisiana Reports, 203.

But it is contended that there is a difference between the Constitutions of the two States, that of Louisiana providing for the validity 716 of contracts of the State as well as of individuals under the Territorial government. Our Constitution is fully as broad, as we contend, for it provides for "all contracts;" and it is, also, careful in excluding the idea of the violation of any right by the provision of the 1st section of the 17th article: "And nothing in this Constitution shall impair the obligation of contracts or violate vested rights, either of individuals or associations claiming to exercise corporate privileges in this State." See Thompson's Digest, 8. This, it seems, should be conclusive. The form of government was changed by the Constitution, and that instrument was not to impair contracts or violate rights of individuals or corporations.

Under this head a second objection was taken. It is contended that, as no appointment of government directors has been made since 1845, the corporation has ceased to exist.

The 16th section provides, first, for the election of seven directors by the stockholders on the first Monday of February; it also provides for the appointment of five directors on the part of the Territory to be made on the 4th Monday of January annually. It also contains a provision that if such election and appointment shall not be made on the days limited and appointed it may be made at any other time, and those in office shall continue until a new election or appointment, and the board is empowered to fill vacancies by death, resignation or removal from office. These provisions are, it seems, a full answer to the objection. If the State does not make the appointment of government directors, those last in office continue until a new appointment; if they die, resign, or are removed from office, the Board can fill the vacancy. No omissions, therefore, of duty on the part of the State government can work the destruction of the corporation.—The provisions of the charter are ample and cover all contingencies which can arise on this subject. The authorities cited by the counsels for the plaintiffs in error do not apply to such a case.

II. A second point made is as to the right of the bank to sue for the principal sum mentioned in the bond. Although this is a loan under the 29th section of the charter which a stockholder of the bank has a right to require, yet we contend the continuation of the loan is dependent upon the payment of interest at least once a year, and renewal of the obligation by the borrower. But it is argued that when the sum so borrowed is sued for because of the failure to pay interest, and recovered and paid into the vaults of the bank, the stockholder of the bank has a right to put in his note or obligation and 717 take it out again on loan, and therefore, it is an act of absurdity to sue for and recover the principal. This bank is one of peculiar features and differs from ordinary banks. It was to borrow its capital upon the Territorial bonds and to pay interest semi-annually upon the amount so borrowed, and two-thirds of its capital was to be lent to the shareholders. The utmost punctuality on the part of this class of its debtors was vitally important to the successful operation of the institution. Therefore we say that payment of interest at least once a year was interposed as a condition, the non-performance of which defeated it. I have no doubt but the bank would have been justified by a court of equity or of law in refusing to renew a loan where the party had failed to pay the interest and forced the bank to the vexation and expense of a law suit. It was a forfeiture which the party must excuse for some good reason, before he should be restored to his original rights. If the bank has to sue each and every stockholder for the annual interest, the delay and expense would materially cripple the bank in its ability to meet its engagements and preserve the credit of the Territory which had been pledged for its accommodation.

By the amendatory act of 1839 it was provided that the omission to renew the note and pay interest for thirty days should work a forfeiture, and the bank should proceed to sell the stock and receive from the purchaser a bond and mortgage on property of the value of the stock, and such new stockholder should be entitled to all the rights and privileges of an original stockholder.—(See Thompson's Digest, 296, sec. 43.) The effect of this was to cut off, as an useless member of the body corporate, one who should fail to perform his obligations, and obtain a new and useful one in his place. This provision would have been effectual, and probably was about the time of its passage, in enforcing the performance by this class of debtors of their obligations, but unfortunately it was applied too late. The bank had extended itself too far—had lent too much money—had got into difficulties and embarrassments and its notes were becoming depreciated, and the bank could not sell the stock. The prudent who were already in were anxious to get out, and the prudent who were out were determined to keep so. The visionary and speculative and those embarrassed, who were anxious to obtain money at any price might have purchased, but such were not the men who were calculated to save the institution on the verge of ruin. This 718 was an ancillary remedy, provided by the Legislature to ensure the performance of the obligations of the shareholders; but from the causes I have mentioned, and the depression of values of every species of property which commenced shortly afterwards, has rendered it inoperative. It is, however, useful, as showing the views and intentions of the Legislature, and is, I contend, explanatory of the 29th section and its proviso.

III. The plaintiffs in error place their defence on another ground, viz: that the obligation not being made in strict compliance with the powers given to the corporation by its charter, is, therefore, void, for want of authority on the part of the bank to contract, and the following particulars are assigned:

1. That for the interest on the note a bond was taken in advance, at the time of making the loan.
2. That the obligation was made for a less period than one year.
3. That a greater rate of interest was reserved and taken than was authorized by the charter.

As to the first point, I refer to the 28th section of the charter, which regulates the rate, time and manner of taking interest. It provides for "loans or discounts," and says "the interest may be paid or deducted in advance." Thomp. Dig., 293.

The 29th section does not, in express terms, or by any just implication, change this rule. Its office is merely to provide the loan which the shareholder shall have a right to require, and establishes no new rule as to the time when the interest shall be paid. The term credit is the only new term introduced into this section, and it is to be granted without security.

But if the 28th section does not apply to the time when the interest may be demanded and paid, then I contend it may be taken in advance, under the general authority "to discount on such terms and such securities as they shall judge proper," contained in the 15th section of the charter. Thomp. Dig., 289.

The right to discount, ex vi termini, gives the right to take the interest in advance—such is the only mode in which a discount can be made. Bk. U. S. v. Fleckner, 5 Pet. Cond. R., 462. Upon this question, I cite, also, the decision of the Court of Appeals of the Territory of Florida, in the case of the Union Bank v. Brown, decided at January term, 1844.

719 2. That the obligation was taken for a less period than one year. I apprehend there is no force in this objection—one year was doubtless the maximum of time for which these obligations should be made—they could not be taken for a longer period, but might for any time within that stipulated. See Union Bank v. Brown, before referred to.

3. That a greater rate of interest was reserved and taken than that authorized by the charter, and was, therefore, a valid contract, for want of power. This is supposed to have been effected by two modes: 1. Taking the interest in advance. 2. Computing it by Rowlett's tables.

There is a difference between the exercise of an admittedly existing power in a mode and manner different from the directions of the charter of incorporation, and the assumptions and exercise of powers not given or expressly denied. See 7 How. Miss. R., 508, Commercial Bank v. Nowlan.

When a bank takes a greater rate of interest on a discount than is allowed by its charter, the contract is not void, for want of authority, inasmuch as a discount or loan is within the scope of the powers of a bank; otherwise, where the power exercised is foreign to the purposes of the creation. Ibid. See also Angell & Ames on Corporations, 200, sec. 3. 8 Gill & Johns, 319. Union Bank v. Jacobs, 6 Humph. R. 515. Mum. v. Commission Co., 15 Johns. R., 52. Hayward v. Pilgrim. 21 Pick. R., 270. Mott v. Hicks, 1 Cowen, R., 513. Bank v. Hammond, 1 Rich. L. R., 281.

When it is necessary to pursue the particular mode prescribed in making the contract, see Angell & Ames on Corporations, 188.

It could make the loan then, undoubtedly, by the particular directions of the 29th section, or by the general grant of powers contained in the 15th section—quacunque via data, it was the admitted exercise of an existing power.

A review of the cases cited by the counsel for the plaintiff in error on this point, will show that they were:

1. When the corporation transcended the bounds of its powers either expressly given, or arising by necessary implication.

2. When it acted in violation of some general law restrictive and prohibitory in its charter; or,

3. When the particular mode of contracting was made to constitute the very essence of the contract.

720 IV. The bond not being void for want of power in the corporation to make the contract, is it void for having exceeded the authority conferred?

And first it is well enough to inquire if it has exceeded the authority given. 1. The right to take interest in advance has already been discussed. Though it was formerly held that taking interest in advance by any other than a banker and on negotiable paper, was illegal—yet this restriction has, by later decisions, been removed. All natural persons, and all corporations who by charter have authority to discount, may do so. 2 Blyd. on Usury, 58, and the authorities cited. Union Bank v. Brown, in Court Appeals, January, 1844.

Next, as to the calculation by Rowlett's tables. I refer to the testimony on this point in the Record, p. 37—The interest for the year is calculated at 365 days, and the months as aliquot parts of the year, and give the interest correctly. For the sake of convenience the odd days less than a month are calculated at 30 days for a month. It depends on the mode of using the tables whether they will make any important gain. See Lyon v. the Bank, 2 Stew. Ala. R. 469. Bank v. Hunter, 1 Dev. R. 129. Bank v. Durkee, 1 Vermont R. Crump v. Nicholas, 5 Leigh R. 251. Planters Bank v. Snodgrass, 4 How. Miss. R. 629.

This point was also expressly decided in the case of the Union Bank v. Brown, before referred to in the Court of Appeals of Florida.

The corrupt intention is an essential ingredient in usury—the intent to violate the law and gain more than is allowed.

In addition to the above authorities, I cite, Bank U. S. v. Waggener, et al., 9 Peters R. 378, 400, 401.

The question of the corrupt intention of the bank was expressly left to the jury in the charge No. 5 given, (Record p. 47.) The finding of the jury negative any such asumption.

2. But supposing it has exceeded the rate of interest fixed by the 28th section of the charter, would the contract for that reason be void?

The charter of the bank contains a restriction merely as to the amount of interest; it contains no penalty, neither does it declare the contract on which more interest than eight per cent. is reserved or taken, to be void.

Banks and other corporations are subject, like natural persons, to the general laws in force at the time of their creation; and if the charter does not provide any penalty for usury, or for excess of powers, it is to be regulated by such general law. If in making a con- 721 tract, a corporation should exceed its powers, and the excess can be separated from that part which is within the powers, the excess only is void, and the remainder valid. Such excess of power might be punished by the State as a malefeasance by forfeiture of the charter, yet it would not make the contract void. The following cases, it is believed, will cover the whole ground here assumed:

Fleckner ads. Bank U. S. v. Peters' Cond. R. 464. U. S. Bank v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat. 64. U. S. Bank v. Owens, et al., 9 Peters, 378, 403. Commercial Bank v. Nowlan, 7 How. Miss. R. 530. Planters' Bank v. Sharp, 4 Smedes and M. 75. Stribling v. Bank of Valley, 5 Rand. 140, 151. Louisville R. R. Co., v. Litson, 2 How. S. C. R. 127. Thornton v. Bank Washington, 3 Peters 42. Philadelphia Loan Co. v. Towner, 13 Conn. 249, 260. Bank v. Hammond, 1 Rich. L. R. 281. See also Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs., 2 How. S. C. R.

It seems to me, however, that "it does not lie in the mouth" of a stockholder to set up as a defence in a case like this, the excess, or even unlawful assumption of power by the bank, when the result would be a loss of two millions of dollars of the capital of the bank to its creditors, and a gain of that amount by the stockholders, who would be participators in the unlawful act. Little v. O'Brien, 9 Mass. 423. Chester Glass Co. v. Dewey, 16, Mass. 94.

V. We contend, however, that if the obligation is not good and valid as a loan under the 29th section of the charter, it is good and valid at common law.

The Supreme Court have in several cases laid down with much accuracy, the law on this point. If this agreement is entered into by competent parties, and for a lawful purpose, not prohibited by law, and is founded upon a sufficient consideration, it is a valid contract at common law. See United States v. Tingley, 5 Peters, 115. United States v. Linn, 15 Peters, 311.

Are the parties to this contract competent to make it? The deceased, S. Parkhill, in his life time, was certainly able to contract,—and it remains to establish that the bank was equally so.

"In constituting a body corporate, a legal or artificial person is substituted for a natural person, and when a number of natural persons are concerned, there is given to them the property of individuality. The common law of every State or country annexed to this local or artificial person, when created, certain incidents and attributes, and 722 both by the laws of England and the United States there are several powers and capacities, which tacitly and without any express provision, are considered inseparable from every corporation." Angell & Ames on Corp., 95.

Its essence consists in part in the power to take and grant property, contract obligations, and to sue and be sued by its corporate name. Its incidental powers are such as are best calculated to effect the object of its creation. Ibid. 2 Kent's Comm., 224. 4 Wheat. R., 518.

As to mode of contracting &c., evidence of common consent of corporation sufficient. Angell & Ames, 167-'8, 174. 10 Mass. R., 401. 5 East R., 239, 292. 6 Viner's Ab., 137, pl. 29.

Whenever a corporation is acting within the scope of the legitimate purposes of its creation, all parol contracts made by its agents are express promises of the corporation. All duties imposed by law, and benefits conferred at their request, raise implied promises, which may be enforced. Bk. of Columbia v. Paterson, 7 Cranch R., 299. To lend money and take security for its repayment, was certainly a legitimate act of the Union Bank. See 15th section of Charter.

If a particular mode of contracting is specified, it is only imperative, when the direction constitutes the terms on which the power is granted. Angell & Ames on Corp., 6. 188. In the charter of the Union Bank, there is no particular form prescribed.

I refer to the decision of the court in the United States v. Linn, 15 Peters, 315, and the remarks of the court, as to the grounds which would authorize a court to declare an instrument void.

It follows from the positions and authorities, and the evidence in the record, that there were parties able to contract—that they did contract—that there was a sufficient consideration, and that it was for a lawful purpose. It is, therefore, a good contract at common law.

VI. As to the last ground assigned for error, that the judgment was improperly entered up for the plaintiff, the issue of plene administravit being found for defendants, the judgment should have been for the defendants generally, notwithstanding the other issues were found for the plaintiff below.

The law, as cited from 2 Lomax on Executors, 446, sec. 11, seems to be supported by 2 Saund. R., 217, (note 1,) which says 723 that if the plaintiff takes issue on the general or special plea of plene administravit, and it be found against him, he cannot have judgment of assets quando acciderint, and cites 1 Roll. Abr., 929, (B.) pl. 2. Bro. Abr., Executor, 18 S. C.

It is not easy to discover the reason for the difference between the result of a verdict, and the confession of the plea by the plaintiff. In the last case, all the authorities hold that the plaintiff may enter up judgment for assets quando. Ibid.

But this seems never to have been the doctrine in the United States. In New York, upon the verdict of no assets, the plaintiff is entitled to his judgment quando, &c. 19 Johns. R., 266. 4 Cowen's R., 447. 6. 6 Cowen R., 71.

So in Kentucky, if the plea be found against the plaintiff, he may yet have judgment assets quando. Burns v. Benton, 1 A. K. Mar., 349. It is error, if upon such a verdict, judgment be entered generally for defendant. Miller v. Towles, 4 J. J. Mar., 255.

As to the practice in Pennsylvania, see Wilson v. Hurst, Peters' C C. Rep., 441, n.

LANCASTER, Justice, delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes by cross writs of error from Leon Circuit Court We shall, for the sake of convenience, embody our opinion and rulings in one decision.

The first question, to which we will turn our attention, is one raised in argument by the counsel of the administrators, earnestly argued and much insisted on. By 15th section of the act of incorporation, the bank is created, and declared a body corporate and politic for and during the term of 40 years from the passage of the act, viz: from 13th February, 1833.

By an act of Congress of 3d March, 1845, Florida was declared to be a State of the United States, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever.

The question raised is, whether the corporation did not perish on the 3d of March, 1845, notwithstanding its grant of 40 years existence; and it is contended the charter must be subject to the implied limitation "provided the Territory shall so long continue."

This question is assumed in argument to arise under plaintiff's demurrer to the seventh and last plea of defendants. That plea in sub-724 stance alleges, that the writing obligatory declared on is not the act and deed of defendant's intestate in his life time, but is and was wholly illegal, null and void, because made in consideration of a loan of money upon a pledge of stock, (he being a stockholder), and that the bank, the plaintiff, wilfully and knowingly reserved and took more than the lawful rate of interest allowed to said bank to take upon such loans by law and its charter. Upon argument in the Circuit Court, the demurrer was sustained, and no exception was taken to the ruling of the court.

The tenor of the plea does not appear to this court to put in issue the existence of the bank, but virtually admits its existence. This suit was commenced on the 31st of March 1846, and as the position taken is, that the admission of Florida as a State, into the Union, on the 3d of March 1845, by implied limitation, extinguished the charter on that day, no good reason is apparent, why a plea presenting that issue, if deemed necessary to the defence, was not prepared and filed during the preparation for trial of the case. This cause appears to have been elaborately investigated in the court below, and lengthy bills of exceptions have been filed to the decisions of that court by each of the parties, and this point is not raised by either bill of exceptions. It does not come by the pleadings before this court, and any opinion delivered on it, might justly be termed extra-judicial, or coram non judice.

To allow points not raised by the record to be adjudicated by this court, might, and probably would, result most inconveniently. Who could set limits to their number?

The case of Mumma vs. the Potomac Company referred to 8 Peters R. 281, does not appear to sustain the authority of this court to take jurisdiction of this point. That was a case in which the plaintiff, Mumma, sued out a sciri facias to revive a judgment against the Potomac Company. Upon that sciri facias the attorneys, by way of plea, shew and suggest to the court a state of facts, and among other recitals, that the Potomac Company had surrendered its charter to the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, and an agreement to that effect was signed by the counsel for both parties, and made a part of the record. The question upon this agreement was, whether any judgment can be rendered against the Potomac Company upon the sciri facias to revive a judgment mentioned in the writ. Upon this question the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia gave judgment for the defendants, which was taken by writ of error to the Su- 725

preme Court of the United States, and the judgment of the Circuit Court was affirmed. The jurisdiction of the court was derived from the writ of sciri facias to revive, &c., and not from the agreement of counsel as to the facts; and the decision of the Supreme Court was upon the judgment properly brought before it, from the Circuit Court, and upon the point on which that judgment was rendered. In the case before this court, although the counsel for the bank did not decline the argument of the point now under consideration, yet there is no agreement of counsel on the record submitting it for adjudication; and if there was, the case before referred to, would not be an authority to justify this court, in proceeding to its adjudication. Without therefore, any disposition to avoid it, if properly before us, we must in this case decline its decision.

The question on the record in this case, arising from the decisions of the Circuit court, admitting on the trial testimony excepted to, refusing instructions asked, and giving instructions excepted to, as well as a refusal to admit testimony offered, and exceptions thereto taken, seems to this court to render a review of many provisions of the act of incorporation, as well as amendments thereto, necessary, in order to give a construction to the charter, applicable to the many questions presented on the trial below. We proceed to that review, first remarking that but little light is afforded us by the decisions either in England or the United States, upon the subjects involved. But few charters of incorporation, bearing much analogy to that of the Union Bank of Florida, have been passed by the States of the Union, and it is not known that any similar ones have been passed elsewhere. Neither is it known or believed, that any of those incorporated in any of the States, have undergone judicial investigation or construction, so as in any degree to aid this court in arriving at sound and just conclusions. There are, however, rules laid down in the books, by which to be guided in the construction of statutes, and to these we shall have recourse as occasion may seem to require.

The 1st section of the act of incorporation provides for the establishment of the "Union Bank of Florida with a capital of one million dollars, and with the privilege of increasing it to three millions of dollars, which capital shall be raised by means of a loan, on the faith of the Territory, by the Directors of the Bank." Of which only one million to be taken at the time of organizing the bank.

By the 2d section, books of subscription, towards constituting the 726 capital fund of said bank, were authorized to be opened at Tallahassee and other places therein named, for subscription to the stock.

By the 7th section, "The Board of Directors of the bank shall be the judges of the sufficiency of the mortgages offered for the stock, and shall have power to reject the same."

The 8th section enacts, "To secure the principal and interest of the bonds to be issued by the Territory, for the purpose of raising the capital of the bank, the subscribers shall be bound to give a bond and mortgage to the satisfaction of the Board of Directors, on property, &c."

The 9th section provides, "The bonds and mortgages given to secure the subscriptions to the capital stock of said bank, shall be deposited in the office of said institution, the said mortgages having been first recorded according to law; and whenever application shall be made by a stockholder to transfer his stock and be discharged, such transfer and discharge may take place, upon the new stockholder complying with the same requisitions stipulated in the foregoing (the 8th) section, in the case of an original subscriber, and in all such cases of transfer and discharge, the votes shall be taken by yeas and nays. But any stockholder may, at any time, release his property by paying the amount subscribed, and also such loans as may have been made on the faith of it.

The 10th section provides for issuing one thousand bonds of one thousand dollars each, made payable to the Union Bank of Florida, to be "signed by the Governor, and countersigned by the Treasurer, and under the seal of the Territory," for which bonds a form is given in said section; which bonds are made transferrable by the endorsement of the president and of the cashier of said bank by said section—for the payment of which, the faith of the Territory is pledged, "in order to facilitate the negotiations by said bank for the loan of one million of dollars."

The 11th section provides, that "both the capital and interest of the said bonds shall be paid by said bank, as the same shall become due."

The 14th section prescribes the form of mortgage to be given to the Union Bank by the stockholders, and begin by saying, "The mortgage to be given by the subscribers to the stock of the Union Bank, shall be in the following form:"

We will inquire, what constitutes a stockholder in the Union

Union Bank vs. Parkhill's Admr's—cross writs of error.—Opinion of Court.

727 Bank, and what are the rights of the bank in the stock subscribed to it?

It may safely be assumed the act of subscribing for shares, as provided in sec. 2 of the charter, does not per se make a stockholder, any more than the mere subscribing for cash stock will make a stockholder in an ordinary banking incorporation. In the latter case, the shares subscribed must be paid for in money; in the former, according to the sections before recited, they were paid for by the bond and mortgage of the stockholder. The giving of a mortgage for the stock satisfactory to the Board of Directors, was the final act necessary to constitute a subscriber for shares a stockholder. See sec. 7; and that mortgages made and delivered to the Union Bank was the only consideration or payment of any nature given by the stockholder to the bank, for his shares of certificate of stock in it.

The bank, then, being, under the charter, the lawful possessor and owner of the mortgages, makes them available by the 8th and 10th sections for the procurement of territorial bonds. These bonds were by the 10th section of the charter, made payable to the bank, and transferrable by the endorsement of the president and cashier of the bank; and by the 11th section, after sold, both capital and interest payable or redeemable by the bank, as it becomes due. It appears, therefore, too plain to be questionable, the bonds, when procured, were the property of the bank, and when sold, the funds arising from the sale were the funds of the bank.

It is contended, in view of the 8th section, the object for which a bond and mortgage was given by the subscriber for stock, was to secure payment of the principal and interest of the bonds issued by the Territory, to the extent of his stock subscription. It is admitted they were given for that purpose, yet it seems to this court that was not the only purpose of the mortgage. The last clause of section 9th provides, "but any stockholder may, at any time, release his property (mortgaged) by paying the amount subscribed, (as stock,) and also (by paying) such loans as may have been made on the faith of it, (the mortgaged property.)

It (the last word of the sentence) must, on sound rules of grammatical construction, refer to its last antecedent noun, which is property; so that, supposing the stock to have been paid for in money, the stockholder, to have this property released from the mortgage lien on the bank, must also pay such loans as may have been made on the faith of the property specified in the mortgage.

728 Shares in this bank were not, as in banks usually, purchased by cash payments; and while a stockholder in a cash stock bank would, on a pledge of shares, pledge the very money he had paid for them, in this bank, unless he pledged the mortgage securities given for stock, he would pledge nothing valuable; so that, if contended loans were to be made on the faith of the subscription for stock, without reference to the mortgage security, then the gross absurdity will follow, that the bank was bound to loan to its stockholders, without any security whatever.

Suppose for a moment, the instant of time when, according to its charter, the Union Bank was first in a condition to discount—it was the holder and owner of mortgages on real estate and negroes, executed and delivered to it by its stockholders, to the value of one million of dollars. It was also the holder and owner of one million of dollars in money, produced by the sale of the bonds, and for the payment and redemption of the principal and interest of these bonds, as they might fall due, it was bound; and if the time we are considering occurred before any interest had accrued on the bonds after sale, yet the bank owed just as much money as it possessed, and the stockholders had no valuable interest in bank save their mortgages. The stock, for which nothing had been paid, if we exclude the idea of the mortgages, had not really appreciated, and was really worth nothing, save only such ideal appreciation as the right to a loan under the 29th section of the charter might induce those needing money to be willing to pay for that right of loan. If, at that time, a stockholder had a right to credit in bank, without other security than a pledge of his shares in the capital stock in the bank, and also a loan on a pledge of those shares for two-thirds their amount, still, excluding the idea that the mortgage had been given as payment for the shares, we must arrive at the conclusion that he, the stockholder, had a right to demand and have from the bank a stock loan, without any valuable security whatever; and thus, that the bank was compelled by its charter to loan to its stockholders two-thirds of its entire money capital, with a positive certainty that neither principal nor interest on that loan would ever be paid before the expiration of its charter, and almost with an equal certainty, not at that time or any other. Such we feel authorized from the wording of the charter, to declare was not the intention of the Legislature, and cannot be a sound construction of its provisions. We have shown, we think, that the mortgage given by the stockholder to the bank, was executed for the 729 double purpose—1. As provided by the 8th section, to secure payment by the bank of the principal and interest of the bonds issued by the Territory; and for this purpose, the Territory, the third party, in the charter of the bank is interested in the mortgages; 2. To secure payment from the stockholder to the bank of his stock note, or obligation, and interest, provided he fails to renew the note or obligation, and pay interest, as provided in the 29th section—and for this purpose, the bank and all its creditors are interested in the mortgages, as well as for the first purpose.

It has been alleged in argument, and indeed the court below virtually so instructed the jury, that the money raised by the sale of the bonds was, in the hands of the bank, the money of the stockholders—that the bonds sold by the bank were, in form only, the bonds of the Territorial government, and in effect and actually were the bonds of stockholders, and are in effect and contemplation of law, as if both bond and mortgage had been originally made and executed to the capitalist or holder of the territorial bonds by the stockholder—that, upon the sale of the bonds, the stockholder became debtor to the vendee of the bonds, and he, in turn, the creditor of the stockholder—that the bank was a mere agent or trustee of the stockholder, to see the principal and interest paid, agreeably to the terms of the bond and mortgage, without other rights in the premises, save the privilege of endorsing for its principal, the stockholder.

The 1st section of the charter incorporates a bank by the name of the "Union Bank of Florida," and says it shall have a capital of one million dollars, with the privilege of increasing to three millions.

The 15th section provides that "The subscribers to the stock of said Union Bank, their successors and assigns, shall be and they are by this present act created a corporation and body politic, for and during the term of forty years from the passage of this act, and shall be and are hereby made capable, under the name of the 'Union Bank of Florida,' to receive and possess all kinds of property, either movable or immovable, and to sell, grant, alienate, demise and to dispose of the same—to loan, negotiate, take mortgages and pledges, and to discount on such terms and such securities as they shall judge proper;" and after some provisos not necessary here to be considered, the section adds: "They may sue and be sued, plead and be pleaded, answer and receive answers in all courts having competent 730 jurisdiction, and to have a common seal, and the same to alter and renew at pleasure, and to ordain and establish such by-laws, rules and ordinances as they shall deem necessary and suitable for the government of the said corporation, not being contrary to this act, nor to the constitution and laws of the United States, or to the laws of the Territory of Florida."

The Union Bank of Florida, by these provisions of its charter, may justly be styled a corporation, and is a creature of the charter that constitutes and gives it being, and prescribes bounds and limits to its operations beyond which it cannot regularly proceed. See Bac. Abr. title corporation, letter D., and many authorities there cited. Its name is the very knot of the combination of its members, without which they could not perform their corporate acts, for it is nobody to plead and be impleaded, to take and give, until it hath gotten a name. Bac. Abr. Corporations, Letter C. Although a corporation aggregate is said to be invisible, and to exist only in supposition and intendment of law, yet such an artificial body is, by its creation, capable of purchasing or parting with its possessions. Bac. Abr. on Corporations, Letter E. The name of a corporation is as the name of baptism. 10 Co. 28. 2d Inst. 666.

We repeat, therefore, what we have before shewn, the mortgages belonged to the bank, for it had a right to take mortgages. The Territorial bonds, issued and made payable to the bank, were also the property of the bank, for they were issued on the faith and value of the mortgages held by and belonging to the bank; and the proceeds of the sales of those bonds belonged to the bank, for it, and it alone, by its officers, had the right to sell and transfer them.

It is said, on the sale of the Territorial bonds, the stockholder became debtor to the vendee of the bonds, and he in turn became creditor to the stockholder. Without remarking on the novelty and surprise with which this doctrine would strike the bondholder—let us see if it be so. Is every bond so marked that each bondholder can know what stockholder he must look to for its payment? Or must he look to all the stockholders, and has he any means of knowing them, or any of them, but through the courtesy of the bank? If a stockholder is the debtor of a bondholder, is it of all bondholders, or a particular one? And if a particular one, is it for all the bonds he may hold, or only for so many bonds, and parts of bonds as his stock Union Bank vs. Parkhill's Admr's—cross writs of error.—Opinion of Court.

731 may amount to? Should he transfer his stock, as by the charter he may, does he make his transferee the real debtor, and release himself without the knowledge or consent of his creditor, the bondholder? Answers to these inquiries will, in the opinion of this court, fully shew the fallacy of the position assigned the stockholder, and which they are intended to controvert.

The first clause of the 3d section of the act of incorporation is also invoked to shew the charter will not admit of the construction in this opinion indicated. That clause is in these words: "In all instances in which slaves shall be mortgaged, in virtue of this act, the possession thereof shall be and remain in the mortgagor, any law to the contrary notwithstanding, until by the covenant or covenants contained in said mortgage, it shall be lawful for the said bank to seize the same." Let us premise, if it was intended at all events to permit the stockholder to remain in possession of the slaves mortgaged, any law to the contrary notwithstanding, until the expiration of the charter of the bank, why did the Legislature not say so, instead of using the more doubtful and circumlocutory language adopted? If we adopt the construction that the language used (and such it is contended is its meaning) was intended to protect the mortgagor in possession of the slaves until the Territorial bonds shall become due, and the bank shall make default in their payment, we must destroy the plain intent of the 9th and 22d sections of the charter. If we understand the covenant or covenants contained in the mortgage to apply as well to the payment of the stock note, or obligation of the stockholder, as to securing payment of the Territorial bonds when due, and that on default of complying with the proviso in the 29th section, to give a note or obligation annually for repayment of the money, (loaned) and paying up the interest, the bank may seize the mortgaged negroes, then we save the 9th, 22d, 26th, and other sections of this charter, and make all stand together, and all bear in the rights and duties both of the bank and its stockholders, and all tend to advance the interest of the creditors of the bank; while the contrary construction would tend to make of the stockholders an irresponsible class with exclusive privileges, (and the greater the stockholder, the greater the privilege,) as well also as inflict on the bondholders and other creditors of the bank, the greatest injury and the most stupendous fraud. Can there be a doubt we should adopt a construction which makes the mortgage property responsible for the stock note due the bank.

732 In the case of the Commonwealth vs. Kimball, 24 Pick. 370, Ch. Justice Shaw says: "It is unquestionably a well settled rule of construction, applicable as well to penal statutes as to others, that when the words are not precise and clear, such construction will be adopted as shall appear most reasonable, and best suited to accomplish the objects of the statute; and where any particular construction would lead to absurd consequences, it will be presumed that some exception or qualification was intended by the Legislature to avoid such conclusion." In the case of Wales v. Stetson, 2 Mass. 146, Ch. Justice Parsons says: "In the consideration of the provisions of any statute they ought to receive such a reasonable construction, if the words and subject matter will admit it, as that the existing rights of the public, or of individuals, be not infringed."

In Bac. Abr. title statute, letter H. it is laid down, "The most natural and genuine way of construing a statute, is to construe one part by another part of the same statute, and this best expresseth the meaning of the makers, and such construction is ex viceribus actus." And again, same title. "If the literal expressions of the law would lead to absurd, unjust or inconvenient consequences, such a construction should be given as to avoid such consequences, if from the whole purview of the law, and giving effect to the words used, it may be fairly done."

Impressed with the soundness and wisdom of the afore recited rules, and aiming to adjudicate by their spirit and true meaning, construing one part by another part of the whole charter of the bank, and in view of the verbal obscurity in some of the provisions, which render it difficult to arrive at the true meaning of the Legislature, but bound to presume it was never the intention of the Legislature, that absurd, or unjust, or even inconvenient consequences should flow from the enactments contained in the charter, we think in every instance where a stockholder fails to renew his note, and pay up the interest, if the bank shall file for cancellation, with any officer of the Government, whose duty it may be to receive them for that purpose, and in default of such an one, with the Clerk of the court in which suit may be depending, to be delivered to such officer for the same purpose, as many Territorial bonds as were issued on the faith and value of the mortgage securities of such defaulting stockholder—that then the bank, upon judgment rendered and execution issued, may of right and according to the law of its charter, levy upon and sell all the mortgaged premises of such defaulting stockholder to be applied to the extinguishment of the judgment rendered on his stock note debt, to- 733 gether with interest due and costs accrued, the residue, if any, to be first applied to liquidate his liabilities in bank, as endorser or security, and the remainder, if any, to be paid to him.

Two exceptions taken by the plaintiff below to the decisions of the Circuit Court, admitting testimony upon the plea of plene administravit, remain to be considered. 1st. Certain receipts of H. Manly, the present husband of the relict of S. Parkhill, deceased, the intestate of defendants, which receipts purport to have been given for sums in part of the dower of Mrs. Manly, rejected by the Court of Probate. 2. The admission of testimony upon an alleged liability of the administrators for counsel fees, and for which they claim the right of retainer of such sum as the witnesses supposes would be a reasonable aggregate compensation for services of counsel in this case, and some twenty cases of detenue brought by Parkhill's administrators, and also a suit for foreclosure brought by the bank against Mrs. Manly and her husband, which was carried to the Supreme Court.

The act of the Legislature of February 15, 1834, concerning the duties of Executors, Administrators and Guardians, (see Tho. Dig. p. 237), provides for the settlement annually of the accounts of Executors and Administrators by the Judge of Probates, and that they shall render full and correct accounts of the receipts and disbursements of the estates in their charge, and says, "if approved, or so much thereof as may be approved, it shall be entered on the record:" and the accounts filed. If it be not approved, the only proper course by which the Executor or administrator can attain redress, if injured, is by appeal or writ of error. But if rejected, as the order of the Court of Probates is conclusive until reversed, it is not seen how the administrators can be permitted to avail themselves of it as evidence on the plea of plene administravit. And this objection lies as well to the evidence to establish the value of the counsel fees, which, as well as the first, should have been audited and allowed, or if rejected, by appeal reversed, before a right to use them as evidence on the plea of plene administravit could attach. On the subject of counsel fees we will remark, it is laid down in the case of Sterrett's appeal, 2 Penn. Reps. 426, "Where an estate is so situated that legal advice is proper to direct the course of the Executors, or where they must bring suits to recover part of the estate, or defend suits brought against them, counsel must be employed, and where they are employed to obtain what is honestly supposed to be the rights of the es- 734 tate, the estate ought to pay the counsel fees. But where Executors neglect to settle and pay, and are sued by creditors or cited by heirs, and employ counsel to defend them in their iniquity, no counsel fees should come from the estate." And this doctrine, in our opinion, is correct.

On the trial of this cause, the Circuit Court gave ten instructions, numbered from one to six inclusive, and from eleven to fourteen inclusive—to all which, defendants by their counsel excepted, save the second, and also moved the court to give fifteen several instructions, which the court refused, except the third, which was granted, and the fourth, which was refused, and substituted by another—all which is contained in their bill of exceptions, and by reference to the record will fully and at large appear. To all which refusals, the defendants by counsel excepted, and prayed their bill of exceptions may be signed, sealed and made part of the record, which was done; and thereupon they obtained and sued out their cross writ of error to this court.

By reference to the instructions given and refused, and excepted to by the defendants below, it will be perceived the principal points they make are aimed at the rate of interest which the bank might lawfully demand and take from a stockholder who was its borrower, and the time at which that interest was payable to the bank.

To have a clear understanding of these questions, it is necessary to examine the 28th and 29th sections of the charter, which are as follows: "Sec. 28. Upon loans or discounts, the said bank shall not receive more than at the rate of eighteen per centum per annum—the interest may be paid or deducted in advance." "Sec. 29. Each and every stockholder shall be entitled to a credit or loan equal to two-thirds of the total amount of his shares: Provided, That notes or obligations for repayment of the money shall be annually received, and the interest paid up: And provided, also, that when the accumulated surplus profits shall have equalled the amount of the bonds issued by the Territory for obtaining the capital of the bank, the interest upon all loans shall be reduced to a rate not exceeding six per centum per annum."

We think it manifest, from the last proviso of the 29th section, the rate of interest which the bank was authorized by law to charge was more than six per centum per annum; otherwise, why did the

735 legislature provide, upon the contingency therein named, that the rate of interest should be reduced, so as not to exceed that sum.

The true construction of the word credit in the 29th section, has been the source of much discussion, and it has been contended it is of such extensive import or signification as to entitle a stockholder, at all times and under all circumstances, to a loan from the bank, equal to two-thirds of the amount of his shares. The term is used in the connection, "credit or loan," and was probably intended by the legislature for nothing more than equivalent for the word "loan," or it may have been intended to invest the stockholder, on the faith and virtue of the mortgage securities he had given the bank, with a right to a loan, free of the endorsers which an ordinary borrower might be required to give. But whichsoever may be the true intent and meaning with which it was used, it was subject to the proviso, that notes or obligations for repayment of the money (borrowed) shall be annually received and the interest paid up. It was contended that this proviso did not create a condition precedent or subsequent to defeat the loan; and if a condition, could only be a condition subsequent to defeat the continuance of the loan

Will or can any one successfully contend that a stockholder, as such, was or could be entitled to any loans whatever, unless he first gave a note or obligation for repayment of the money borrowed, and if that was necessary, (as we think it was,) whether it was not a condition precedent to obtaining a loan? At the time of giving a note or obligation for repayment of the money, by the conjunction and he was also required to pay up the interest. So it seems the giving the note and paying the interest at the time of borrowing the money, are both conditions precedent, properly deducible from the 29th section of the charter.

It is objected the frame of words, "and the interest paid up," are repugnant to this construction, and they must mean interest in arrear, but with equal propriety they may mean interest in advance; and this construction of the 29th section harmonizes with the only rational one of which the 28th is susceptible. It provides that the interest may be paid up or deducted in advance upon loans or discounts by the bank. The term, "may be paid or deducted in advance," are terms directory and enabling to the bank, as are all the provisions of that section; and if we understand that the bank, upon a loan or discount, may deduct the interest in advance, or upon a re-

736 newal, may require it to be paid in advance, we but understand these words according to their natural force and usual import. The proviso, therefore, in our opinion, contains two conditions precedent to a stockholder's obtaining or continuing a loan under the 29th section, for a failure to perform either, (to wit: renew the note, or pay the interest,) would determine the duration of the loan, divest the right to have it, and invest the bank with a right of action against such defaulting stockholder. The authority of the bank, under the 28th section, to deduct interest in advance, is an authority co-extensive with the loans or discounts it may make; and this is a loan, peculiar in nothing save the right of the stockholder to have it, so long as he complies with the precedent conditions prescribed for his observance.

The bank has, according to the 28th section, as much right to deduct interest in advance on such a loan as on any other. That section further provides, the bank shall not receive more than at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, but it may be deducted or paid in advance. The rate, therefore, of interest, which, by its charter, the bank may deduct upon a loan or discount, is eight dollars from one hundred for the use of the residue for one year, and at the same rate for any shorter time—the obligation of a borrowing stockholder being to renew his note and pay the interest once a year; but according to bank usage, his privilege to renew and pay interest, oftener, as might suit his convenience. And if there be error in this, as it benefits the stockholder, he cannot complain.

The construction of the 28th and 29th sections, above given, appears to the court to be strengthened by other provisions of the charter. The last proviso in the 29th section contemplates, during the existence of the charter, surplus profits equal in amount to the Territorial bonds issued.

The 23d section contemplates surplus profits, provides for their management, appropriates subsequent profits, assigns a share to the Territory, as well also as the mode, on the expiration of the charter, of a division of capital.

The 36th section directs the disposition which shall be made of the profits which shall accrue to the Territory, and in other sections of the charter, mention is made of the surplus profits.

Now, when it is recollected that two, out of its three millions of capital, must, if required, be loaned to its stockholders—that near that amount was in fact loaned them—that the bank itself has a 737 continually accruing interest debt, payable to its creditors, which amounts annually to $180,000, besides contingent expenses as they may occur—unless a rigid exaction of interest is demanded of the stockholders, it would seem to require unusual arithmetical powers to enable a financier to discover how those surplus profits could arise.

The bank is known to be in an embarrassed condition, from which it will hardly recover, and has no surplus profits to manage. The value of its stock has depreciated, and is far below par. Yet it is perhaps not too much to say, had the debtors (stockholders and others) bona fide and fully paid interest on their respective liabilities, as the same were due the bank, unless, indeed, it was otherwise very badly managed, or had met with great and unavoidable misfortunes, it would now have in possession large surplus profits—its stock would be much above par, and its creditors would hold its liabilities at their original cash value.

We think, then, the bank had and has a right to interest on stock loans, at the rate of eight per centum per annum, and also to deduct it or require its payment in advance. The giving a note and payment of interest are conditions precedent, and without the performance of both, the stockholder has no right to a loan; or at any renewal or failure to perform both, determines the stockholder's right to his loan, and unless he pays the whole amount borrowed, the bank has a right of action against him.

Some objections have been raised in this case upon the use of Rowlett's interest tables. We will remark, that, from the testimony, it seems abundantly clear, the officers of the bank, when computing for a year by those tables, computed for a solar year, or three hundred and sixty five days, and for a month or months as aliquot parts of a year; in all which there cannot be error. But when computing for less than a month, as for days of grace, they computed each day as the 1-30th of a month, instead of the 1.365th part of a year. In computing fractions of a month, it is not easy, as every practical arithmetician must know, to adopt any rule but the one adopted in the tables, to wit: of supposing the month to consist of thirty days, which is nearer the 12th part of the year than any other integral number. We think the rule for practical purposes, the most accurate which has yet been devised, and are not inclined to condemn it.

The subject of the sale of the stock of Samuel Parkhill, under the 738 amended charter passed in the year 1839, was also raised by the instructions asked by the defendants in the court below. By the 2d section of that amendatory act, the sale could only be perfected by the purchaser executing to the bank, within ten days thereafter, bonds and mortgages necessary to make him a stockholder to the amount of the stock purchased. If that was not done (as from the testimony in this case, it seems, was not), the sale would not be valid, and would not divest the liability or interest of the original stockholder.

The amendments contained in this law were only cumulative remedies by way of penalty to coerce stockholders to a more exact observance of renewing their notes, and paying up the interest, and we think a failure to effect and carry out its provisions, does not divest the bank of any other remedies given by the provisions of its charter and the law of the land against a defaulting stockholder.

Upon the subject of the rate of bank interest, the time when it is payable, the use of Rowlett's tables, and the time for which a stockholder's note is required by the charter to be given, we are fully sustained in the positions we assume, by a very able decision delivered by Judge Bronson, at the January term, 1844, of the late court of Appeals of the Territory of Florida, and we take pleasure in saying, that decision discusses the whole of the subjects with a perspicuity and clearness, alike honorable to the heads as the hearts of the very able court from which it emanated.

Having, as we think, fully reviewed all the points raised by the bill of exceptions in this case, which are deemed necessary to its proper determination, and having, we trust, given a reasonable, a just and correct construction to such provisions of the charter as seemed proper or necessary to examine, it now remains to pronounce the rulings of this court, based upon the record presented, and the exposition of the charter, and the legal rights of the parties, as hereinbefore set forth, explained and declared.

We are of opinion that the Circuit Court erred in permitting the receipts offered as evidence by the defendant, Moseley, as part of the dower of Mrs. Manly, to go in evidence before the jury, on the plea of plene administravit and also the evidence concerning the counsel fees—which decisions are hereby overruled and reversed. We are of opinion the Circuit Court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, as prayed by the plaintiff below in its bill of exceptions, and also in 739 each of the six instructions given by the court, and to which the plaintiff by its counsel excepted; which said decisions of the court, refusing to instruct as prayed, and instructions given and excepted to, are hereby overruled and reversed.

We are further of opinion, that on the nine instructions given by the court, and excepted to by defendants by their counsel, there is nothing to which defendants can take any legal exception, as the said instructions were fully as favorable to them as by law they had a right to require. And as to the instructions asked by defendants and refused by the court, and to which they by counsel excepted, upon a careful examination, we do not think they were by law entitled to the allowance of any of them, and therein have perceived no error.

Union Bank vs. Parkhill's Admr's—cross writs of error.—Opinion of Court.

It is, therefore, ordered, adjudged and decreed, upon the writ of error sued out by the "Union Bank of Florida" in this case, that the judgment of the court below be reversed, annulled and set aside—that a venire facias de novo be awarded, and a trial thereon had, according to the principles contained in this opinion—that the cross writ of error sued out by the defendants below in this cause be dismissed, and that they take nothing thereby, and that the plaintiff in error, the Union Bank of Florida, recover its costs, &c.

DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of Florida

AT

JANUARY TERM, 1850.

R. B. & D. W. Post, Plaintiffs in Error, vs. William S. Carpenter, et al.

Under the Attachment law of this State, there is no priority given in attaching creditors whose attachments have been first levied, if the judgments in the suits commenced by attachment obtained at the same term of Court.

The Statute which declares that the services of a writ of attachment shall bind the property attached except against pre-existing liens, is further qualified by the provision "that a judgment in a suit commenced by attachment shall be satisfied in the same manner as other judgments obtained at the same term of the Court are, or shall be satisfied out of the lands and tenements, goods and chattels generally of the defendant in attachment."

Error to the Circuit Court of Wakulla County.

The plaintiffs in error sued out a writ of attachment which was levied by the sheriff of Wakulla County upon about seventy bales of cotton as the property of Wm. S. Carpenter, an absconding debtor. On the same day, but after the levy of plaintiffs' attachment, several other creditors of Carpenter attached the same cotton. The cotton was sold by order of the Court, and the money, the proceeds of sale, was paid into the registry of the Court.

Judgments were obtained in the various suits thus commenced by attachment, at the same term of the Circuit Court of the County of Wakulla, Hon. Thomas Baltzell, Judge of the Middle Circuit presiding.

The proceeds of the sales of the cotton not being sufficient to pay the debts due all the attaching creditors who had thus obtained judgments, the plaintiffs in error claimed priority on the ground that their
2 attachment was first levied and bound the property, and was therefor entitled to be first satisfied. The question was argued in the Court below, on a rule upon the clerk (who had in his hands the proceeds of the sales of the cotton) to show cause why the same should not be applied first to the payment of the claim of plaintiffs in error, and after satisfying that, then to the claims of the other creditors in the order in which their attachments are levied.

The Court below decided that the moneys should be distributed pro rata. To reverse this decision the plaintiffs brought the case to this Court by writ of error.

Maxwell, Papy and Hogue, for plaintiffs in error.

Long & Walker and Archer, for defendants.

HAWKINS, J.

The case at bar depends upon the interpretation of the statutes governing attachments, and we are free to confess that, owing to their singular phraseology, we have found it not a very easy task to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. We have given the subject proper reflection, and have endeavored to arive at what we deem to have been the intention of the Legislature which enacted the statutes. The question is, where there are several attaching creditors, who obtained judgments at the same term, do they participate pro rata in the proceeds of the property attached, or do they take according to the priority of the levy of the several attachments?

On page 368 of the Digest, Article 1, Section 2, is the following: "The service of a writ of attachment shall not operate to dispose ess the tenant of any lands or tenements, but such service shall bind the property attached, except against pre-existing liens; but the judgment in a suit commenced by attachment, shall be satisfied in the same manner as other judgments obtained at the same term of the Court are or shall be satisfied out of the lands and tenements, goods and chattels generally, of the defendant in attachment: Provided, however, That judgments rendered against any garnishee or garnishees in said suit shall be appropriated exclusively to the satisfaction of the judgment rendered against the defendant, commenced by attachment as aforesaid." If the section had ceased, after the words "pre-existing liens," there would be no difficulty, and it would be plain that the liens would be specific, subject to the general exception, 3 "pre-existing liens;" and the several attachments would take preference according to the maxim, prior est tempore potior est jure. But it goes on to say, "that a judgment in a suit commenced by attachment shall be satisfied in the same manner as other judgments obtained at the same term of the Court are, or shall be satisfied out of the lands and tenements, goods and chattels generally, of the defendant in attachment." Now, what is the fair import of these words? We are of opinion that they must be understood as further qualifying the lien contained in the first clause of the section, by the addition of another exception, to wit: judgments obtained at the same term of the Court, whether obtained after the service of attachment or of ordinary process. We think it was the intention of the Legislature to place judgments obtained at the same term, whether the suits in which they were obtained were instituted by attachment or ordinary summons, upon the same footing. We are fortified in these views by the words of the proviso. The words, "exclusively applied," certainly must have been introduced in it to show that the proceeds of judgments against garnishees were to have other and distinct application from those contained in the body of the section, to wit: a general application; whereas, in cases of garnishments, they were to be specifically applied.

We find further, in page 370 of Thompson's Digest, the following section: "If there be two or more suits commenced by attachment against the same person, and several judgments be obtained at the same term, they shall be satisfied pro rata out of the judgments which may have been obtained against the garnishee or garnishees in any such suits, unless the defendant or defendants in such suits have sufficient other property to satisfy the same." This section seems to be but an addition to the one already quoted, and declares a "pro rata" distribution out of the judgments obtained against garnishees at the same term. It seems intended to supply a defect in the proviso of the section first set forth, which only provided for one judgment against garnishees; whereas this section embraces any number of judgments obtained against garnishees at the same term, and declares, where there is more than one judgment, or several judgments, they shall be satisfied pro rata. This law of attachment being in derogation of the common law, we are not disposed to extend its provisions beyond the manifest meaning of its terms; and we should be loath so to extend them as to give a preference to attaching creditors over those who pursue the ordinary process of law, unless the statute contained clear and unequivocal words to that effect. We believe we have given what was the intention of the framers of the law, and by so doing, have avoided a construction likely to operate unjustly and unequally.

We think, therefore, that there was no error in the decision of the Court below, and the judgment of that Court stands affirmed.

Antonio Collins, Plaintiff in Error, vs. Nicholas H. Mitchell, Defendant in Error.

A bond conditioned for the forthcoming property "to abide the final order of the Court," varies from the condition of the bond provided by the statute which is "for the forthcoming of the property replevined, and to abide the final order of the Court."

In an action of debt on a bond given under attachment process, pursuing the form prescribed by the statute, the judgment being the final order of the Court in the attachment suit, would constitute the rule and measure of damages for a failure to deliver the property.

But where the condition of the obligation is "for the forthcoming of property," then upon the return of the officer that the property attached is not forthcoming, or that defendants in attachment have no property in his bailiwick to satisfy the execution, founded on the judgment in the attachment suit, the liability of the surety on the bond attaches, and the measure of damages in an action against him would be the value of the property at that time with interest.

Mitchell, the defendant in error, brought an action of debt in the Circuit Court of Escambia County, on a bond executed by the plaintiff in error, together with J. N. C. Stockton & Co. and Hanson Kelly, and dated the 13th of January, 1840. The bond sued on was delivered to the sheriff of Walton County, who had levied an attachment upon certain slaves as the property of J. N. C. Stockton & Co., and which attachment had been sued out of the late Superior Court of Walton County by Mitchell, for a debt claimed to be due him to the amount of nine hundred dollars. The bond is in the penal sum of $1800, and the condition thereof is in these words—"Now if the said J. N. C. Stockton shall cause said slaves to be forthcoming to abide the final order of the Court, then this obligation to be void, else to remain in full force and virtue."

The declaration avers that the final order of said Court, that is to say, the judgment against J. N. C. Stockton, was rendered on the 27th day of April, 1842, for $1211 75-100, and that execution issued thereon and was returned "no property found."

The declaration then avers that the said J. N. C. Stockton & Co. did not nor did any other person or persons cause the said slaves to be forthcoming to abide the final order of the Court. By means whereof the plaintiff sustained damages to the amount of $1800.

The defendant (Collins) filed three pleas.

The first states that at the time of the institution of the suit against J. N. C. Stockton, as well as at the time of the rendition of the said supposed judgment against the said J. N. C. S., he the said J. N. C. Stockton had departed this life—without this that there was any other final order or judgment in said cause; and so the said defendant says there was no final order, judgment, or decision in said cause.

The second plea filed is non est factum.

And the third is the same as the first, except that it states the institution of the suit and the rendition of the judgment as against J. N. C. Stockton & Co., and not J. N. C. Stockton alone.

The plaintiff demurred to the first and third pleas, and the demurrer was sustained by the Court.

The cause was tried at the fall term, 1849, of the Circuit Court of the County of Escambia, Hon. GEORGE S. HAWKINS, presiding.

The jury found for the plaintiff and assessed his damages at one thousand four hundred and thirty-six dollars and twenty-six cents, and judgment was given accordingly. On the trial of this cause defendant's counsel moved the Court to instruct the jury, that the plaintiff could not recover other than a mere nominal sum, without showing the value of the slaves replevied by other evidence than that afforded by the replevin bond itself, which instruction the Court refused, and gave the following: "that the jury should assume the half of the penalty of the bond to be the true value of the slaves." To this refusal of the Court and to the charge given, the defendant excepted.

To reverse the judgment rendered in this case the defendant prosecuted this writ of error.

M. A. Long, for plaintiff in error.

This is an action of debt upon a replevy bond, executed by the defendant, as surety, on the 13th January, 1840, and delivered to the Sheriff of Walton County, who had levied an attachment upon "certain slaves, as the property of J. N. C. Stockton & Co.," as recited therein. The bond is in the penal sum of $1,800. The bond recites that the debt claimed in the attachment was $900. The declaration alleges for breach of the bond—that the said negro slaves were not delivered to abide the final order of the Court, to which the attachment was returned, and "that the final order of said Court, to wit, the judgment against the said J. N. C. Stockton, & Co., was rendered on the 27th day of April, 1842, for $1,211 75," and that execution was issued thereon, and returned "no property found," &c. Three pleas were filed, but no question is made upon the second, which is non est factum.

These pleas are demurred to, and the judgment of the Court sustained the demurrer, which we assign as error. Two questions are presented by this assignment of error. The first is, does the fact pleaded amount to a good defence in law, suposing the plaintiff's declaration to be good; and the second is, whether the declaration is not bad, the demurrer also raising that question.

The declaration is bad for several reasons:—

1. The condition of the bond sued on is void for uncertainty, in omitting to recite the number, names, ages, or sex of the slaves, which were "to be forthcoming to abide the final order of the Court." The surety is not bound to deliver any particular slaves, and, indeed, is not by the bond informed what slaves had "been levied upon." If his undertaking is not in the bond itself set forth with reasonable certainty, the Court cannot, upon demurrer, see that he has failed to comply therewith. For aught the Court can see, the endorsement of the levy on the writ of attachment was as vague and uncertain as the condition of the bond in this respect; wherefore, it is no answer to this objection to say, that a reference to the levy will cure the uncertainty.

2. The declaration alleges that the condition of the bond required J. N. C. Stockton to cause the said slaves to be forthcoming, whereas the bond itself requires J. N. C. Stockton & Co. to do so. This is a variance.

3. The declaration does not allege that any final order was ever rendered in the particular attachment suit mentioned in the condition of the bond. The averment is, "that the final order of said Court, to wit, the judgment against said J. N. C. Stockton & Co. was rendered on the 27th day of April, 1842," &c. "The judgment against said J. N. C. Stockton & Co." is too general, for it does not appear even that it was in favor of the plaintiff, much less that it was upon the particular attachment mentioned before.

4. The persons against whom the judgment was rendered are equally vague and uncertain, namely, J. N. C. Stockton (and company) & Co.

It is evidently intended to intimate that this final order or judgment was rendered against some one else besides J. N. C. Stockton, and yet no name is disclosed. No such judgment could legally have been rendered as that mentioned in the declaration, even if the person in whose favor it was rendered had been named. In a suit against a firm, you may serve process on one, but must declare and recover against all, and the name of each must appear, as well in the declaration as upon the record of judgment. "Partners cannot be individually sued for a partnership debt. Each partner is bound for the whole until the debt is paid; but payment can be enforced only by a joint action against all. Their responsibilities are joint only, and not joint and several, so as to subject each to a separate action." 1 Chit. Pl., 43, note 3. Robertson vs. Smith, 18 John. Rep., 459. Henry Van Tine vs. Crane, et al., 1 Wend. R., 524.

Therefore, it follows that, as the judgment or "final order" set forth in the declaration is only against one person, it cannot be the judgment or final order which the defendant was bound to have the said slaves forthcoming to abide. The execution, says the declaration, which was returned no property found, was issued upon said judgment—that is, against J. N. C. Stockton alone, and not against the firm. It does not, therefore, appear but what the slaves would have been delivered, had a proper judgment and execution been rendered and issued, which being a condition precedent to any right to sue on the bond, must be distinctly averred. 1 Chit. Pl., 368.

The second question raised under the demurrer is, whether the judgment or final order is not shown to be void, by the existence of the fact thus mentioned in the pleas, namely, the death of J. N. C. Stockton, before the attachment suit was commenced. We have already seen that the judgment does not purport to be rendered against any other person; but we are prepared to show that, if it had been against his copartners by name, it would have been void as to them, if void as to the deceased. We understand that it is conceded on the other side, that a Court has no jurisdiction to render a judgment against a man who had no notice of the suit, actual or constructive, and that death before suit brought precludes the possibility of either. The authorities are full to this principle. In the case of Elliott and others vs. Pearson and others, 1 Peters, 341, the Supreme Court of the United States say: 'Where a Court has jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question which occurs in a cause; and whether its judgment be correct or otherwise, its judgment, until reversed, is binding in every other Court. But if it act without authority, its judgments and orders are regarded as nullities. They are not voidable, but simply void." And in the same case, the Court remark that "the jurisdiction of any Court exercising authority over a subject, may be inquired into in every Court, when the proceedings of the former are relied on and brought before the latter, by the party claiming the benefit of such proceedings."

In the case of Hollingsworth vs. Barbour and others, 4 Peters R., 472, the same Court say: "By the general law of the land, no Court is authorized to render a judgment or decree against any one or his estate, until after due notice by service of process to appear and defend. This principal is dictated by natural justice," &c.

The same doctrine is held in the case of Rangeley vs. Webster, 11 N. H. Rep., 304. In Bissell vs. Briggs, 9 Mass. Rep., 462, Chief Justice Parsons remarks that "the Court must have had juridiction, not only of the cause, but of the parties." See also Hall vs. Williams, 6 Pick., 232, in which it is said, "the judgment being entire, if it is a nullity with respect to one, it is also in the whole." In Holbrook vs. Murray, et al., 5 Wend., 161, the Court say: "The facts stated in the plea being admitted by the demurrer, the defence of want of jurisdiction as to the person of this defendant, (Murray,) is established; as to him the judgment is not conclusive, not even 9 evidence of a demand—it is a nullity. What effect has this on the other defendants, whose plea does not afford any defence? The judgment is entire, and if void as to one defendant, where there are several, it is void as to all." And this precise point was decided in the same way in Richard vs. Walton, 12 John. Rep., 434. Wes tervelt vs. Lewis, 2 McLean, 511. Smith vs. Russ., 1 Mis., 453. Armstrong vs. Horshaw, 1 Dev., 187. Lewis vs. Ash, 2 Miles, 110.

From a view of these authorities, I respectfully submit, that the judgment or final order, set forth in the declaration, was totally void, as to all against whom it was rendered, whether it be regarded as rendered against J. N. C. Stockton alone, or against him jointly with others not named, but included under the abbreviated epithet, "& Co.," and that the pleas constituted a good defence to the action. If the bond ever had any validity, therefore, there has not been any "final order of the Court," which it was the duty of the defendant "to abide by, causing the said slaves to be forthcoming." And if this be correct, it follows as a necessary conclusion, that the writ of attachment was void when sued out, and the levy on the slaves also. The bond taken to replevy the property was equally void, having been literally extorted upon false pretences, under mere color of law.

The second error assigned, arises upon the charge of the Court, set forth in the bill of exceptions, which is in these words: "The jury should assume the half of the penalty of the bond to be the true value of the said slaves," and the refusal of the Court to charge as requested by defendant below, "that the plaintiff could not recover other than a merely nominal sum, without showing the value of the slaves replevied, by other evidence than that afforded by the replevin bond ieself." The doctrine here advanced by the Court below is believed to be without any precedent, and in violation of a very old and familiar rule of law, that plaintiff must prove damages before he can recover therefor. The case cited on the other side, from 3 Conn. Reps., 248, and there was but one cited, is not at all in point. The question did not arise upon the trial before the jury, in the assessment of damages. The defendant in that case pleaded that the bond was void, because the property for which the bond had been given, under an embargo law of the United States, had been valued too high by 10 the officer to whom the bond had been executed and delivered. The plea was held to be no defence, and that the bond was not void.

C. C. Yonge, for denfendant in error:

Contended that the demurrer to first plea was well taken, because the count alleges a judgment against J. N. C. Stockton & Co., and the plea states that no final order was made in the case of John N. C. Stockton, and cited Chitty P., 521. 7 John, 402. Bacon's Ab. Pleas. Skinner vs. Bebow, 2 Strange 919.

The demurrer to third plea was also good, 1st, because the plea is argumentative. 2d, because, though Stockton was dead, it was competent for the survivors to continue the use of the name of the firm; and the bond furnishes the evidence that it was so used after the time at which according to the plea, Stockton died. The bond was a good common law bond, at least, made by the survivors of the firm and the sureties for the forthcoming of property.

The validity of the judgment against J. N. C. Stockton & Co., being a judgment of a Court of competent jurisdiction, cannot be inquired into in a collateral proceeding. Voorhees vs. Bank of U. S., 10 Peters, 473.

The instruction of the Court to the effect that the penalty of the bond furnished evidence on which to base a verdict as to the value of the property, was right. See 3 Cond. Rep., 248.

BALTZELL, J.

This was an action of debt instituted by defendant in error against plaintiff as one of the securities on a forthcoming bond given under attachment process. The defendant filed three pleas which were demurred to, and the demurrer sustained by the Court. Leave was given to plead anew within sixty days, which however seems not to have been done, and the case in this situation, was, as appears from the record, submitted to the jury.

On trial, the plaintiff gave in evidence the bond sued on, with other evidence, whereupon "defendant's counsel moved the Court to instruct the jury that the plaintiff could not recover other than a merely nominal sum, without showing the value of the slaves replevied by other evidence than that offered by the replevin bond itself, which instruction the Court refused to give, but instructed the jury that they should asume the half of the penalty of the bond to be 11 the true value of the said slaves." The propriety of this instruction is the only question presented by the record.

The bond in question is thus described in the condition: "whereas Nicholas H. Mitchell has sued out an attachment against J. N. C. Stockton & Co. for $900, which has been levied upon certain slaves as the property of J. N. C. S. & Co., and the said J. N. C. S. & Co. wishing to replevy the said, now if the said J. N. C. S. & Co. shall cause the said slaves to be forthcoming to abide the final order of the Court, then the obligation to be void, else to remain in full force and virtue." It will be perceived that this varies from the condition of the bond provided by the statute which is for "the forthcoming of the property replevied to abide the final order of the Court." If it had pursued the statute, the amount of the judgment being the final order of the Court, which the security had undertaken to abide by, would probably form the criterion and rule of the damages for a failure to deliver the property.

The defendant's engagement is not of this character, and he has a right to insist upon its very terms. He engages that the principals, the Stocktons, shall cause the said slaves to be forthcoming to abide the order of the Court. Now if the obligation had been complied with by delivery of the slaves, plaintiff would have been entitled to a sale of them under execution, and the appropriation of the proceeds to his debt. He is entitled to be placed in the same position by the failure which he would have occupied if the Stocktons had fulfilled their agreement, and this, in our opinion, constitutes the true measure of damages. Defendant's liability, as that of any other security to such an obligation, attaches upon the return of the officer that the property attached is not forthcoming to abide the order of the Court or that the defendants have no property in his bailwick to satisfy the execution. The value of the property at that time, with interest, would seem to be the appropriate measure of damages.

The case will then be reversed for this error, and the judgment set aside, and a venire facias de novo awarded, with leave to each party to amend his pleadings, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, not inconsistent with this opinion.

We add that in case of another appeal, a copy of the entire record in the suit of Mitchell vs. the Stocktons be sent up, that this Court may, if required to decide the farther points in the case, be possessed 12 of the entire facts necessary to a correct adjudication.

NATHANIEL P. BEMIS, ET AL., APPELLANTS, VS. THE STATE, APPELLEE.

There is no law authorizing the Comptroller to appropriate any money collected or received by him in his official capacity, to the payment of any claim held by himself against the late Territory of Florida.

Under the provisions of the law requiring the Comptroller to collect all the debts, dues and demands of the late Territory, money collected by him for such dues must be regarded as in the Treasury of the State when he receives it, from which it cannot be drawn, but in consequence of an appropriation by law.

Appeal from judgment of the Circuit Court of the County of Leon. This cause was tried before the Hon. THOMAS BALTZELL, Judge of the Middle Circuit at the spring term, 1849, of the Circuit Court of Leon County.

The pleadings, evidence and instructions given by the Judge in the Court below, are set forth in the opinion pronounced by Ch. Jus. Douglas sofully, that it is not deemed necessary to make any other statement of the case.

Thompson, for Appellant.

Hogue, for Appellee.

DOUGLAS, Ch. J.

This suit was instituted in the Circuit Court of Leon County against Nathaniel P. Bemis, late Comptroller of Public Accounts of the State of Florida, and his sureties upon his official bond. The declaration is in the usual form, assigning as a breach of the condition of said bond, that the said Nathaniel P. Bemis did not faithfully discharge all the duties of the said office of Comptroller of Public Accounts, &c., according to the condition of said bond, in this, that he the said Nathaniel P. Bemis, by virtue of the authority vested in him by law, and in the discharge of the duties of said office, &c., on the tenth day of December, 1847, received, collected and had in his possession on account of the Territory of Florida, the amount of five hundred and seventy-nine dollars and fifty-three cents, in cash, of the debts, dues and demands of the late Territory of Florida, which he has neglected and refused to pay into the treasury of said State of Florida, as by law he was bound to do, &c. To this declaration the defendants pleaded, first non est factum. Second, Nil debet. Third, "That the plaintiff was indebted to the said defendant, Nathaniel P. Bemis in the sum of six hundred dollars for work and labour, care and diligence of the said Nathaniel, for the said plaintiff before that time done and performed and bestowed, and for compensation and commissions for diverse collections and other services before that time done, performed and bestowed for the plaintiff, and at his request, and for divers warrants on the treasury of the Territory of Florida, duly issued and owned and held by the said Nathaniel, which the said plaintiff was and is bound to pay and discharge, which said warrants are numbered 158, 317, 265, 147, 257 and 377, and for money by the said plaintiff before that time had and received for the use of the defendant Nathaniel, which said sum of money so due to the defendant Nathaniel from the plaintiff is wholly unpaid, and exceeds the sum so alleged to be due and owing to said plaintiff in the said declaration mentioned, by virtue of the said condition of the said supposed writing obligatory, and which said sum of money so due and owing from said plaintiff, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, in this behalf, the said defendants are ready and willing and offer to set off and allow against the sum of money so claimed to be due and payable under the condition of the said writing obligatory, and this &c. Fourth, that said Bemis did faithfully discharge all the duties of Comptroller, &c., and did faithfully account, &c., according to law; and Fifth, that the said Bemis did faithfully discharge all the duties of Comptroller of Public accounts of the State of Florida according to the conditions of the said writing obligatory, and he the said Nathaniel did not neglect or refuse to pay into the treasury of the State of Florida the debts, dues and demands of the late Territory of Florida received, collected and had by him, in manner and form as the said plaintiff hath thereof complained against him, but did on the 20th day of March, one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, before the commencement of this suit, tender and offer to pay and did deposite in the treasury of the State the sum of five hundred and eighty six dollars and forty-eight cents in warrants on the treasury of the Territory of Florida then outstanding and unpaid, in the hands and possession of the said Nathaniel, which said sum is more than sufficient to pay, satisfy and discharge all the demands of the State of Florida, upon him the said Nathaniel for or by reason of the receipt and collection of the debts, dues and demands of the late Territory of Florida, and this, &c. To the first and fourth of these pleas, the plaintiff filed a similiter. The second seems not to have been noticed. To the third, the plaintiff replied by a general denial, and the defendant joined issue. To the fifth, the plaintiff put in a demurrer, alleging for cause, that the said defendants have not by their plea traversed or denied or attempted to put in issue any matter of fact alleged by plaintiff; that the said plea is double, in this, that the said defendants have thereby pleaded and alleged the performance of the duties of Comptroller by defendant Bemis, and also allege a tender and offer to pay as well as a deposit of Territorial warants in payment of the demands by the State against him, the said Bemis, wherefore, &c. And the said demurrer having been argued, was sustained by the Court. After which the issue of fact were submitted to a jury, who found a verdict for plaintiff and assessed the damages at five hundred and eighty 86-100 dollars. Whereupon judgment was entered for $5000, the penalty of the bond, and for the recovery of the damages so assessed as aforesaid, the judgment to stand, &c.

It appears by a bill of exceptions which constitutes part of the record in this case, that the plaintiff offered in evidence a treasury transcript containing an account current between the said Nathaniel P. Bemis and the State of Florida, commencing as follows, to wit: "Nathaniel P. Bemis, late Comptroller, &c., in account with the State of Florida, for dues to the late Territory of Florida, collected by him in pursuance of an act of the General Assembly approved 23rd July, 1845, and resolution approved 27th December, 1845," which contained two items specially referred to by one of the witnesses, viz: "specie funds rec'd S. Scarborough, fines, $15 20, and specie funds executors of T. P Chaires, escheat, $628 72," and exhibited a balance against the said Nathaniel P. Bemis, late Comptroller, &c., of five hundred and seventy-nine dollars and fifty-three cents, and that the plaintiff called Simon Towle, Esq., Comptroller of Public Accounts, who being duly sworn, depose that the several items in the account stated by him against the said Bemis, in the column headed "current funds" were collected in specie or what was equivalent thereto, and the several items marked "Territorial Scrip" were collected and received in auditor's warrants of the late Territorial treasury, and this so appears from the book kept by the said Bemis in the Comptroller's office, and from said Bemis' explanation in relation to said entries."

And here the plaintiff closed its case. And thereupon the defendant introduceed the following paper writing purporting to be a receipt, viz: "Rec'd, Tallahassee, March 20th, 1848, of Nathaniel P. Bemis, late Comptroller, the following warrants on the Territorial Treasury, the same having been tendered in payment of the balance due the Territory on collections made by said Bemis, and refused by me, for the reason that the amount so claimed by the State was collected as current funds. No. 158, for $525, No. 317, for $9, No. 365, for $9, No. 147, for $3, No. 257, for $36 13, and 377, for $4 35.

And it was admitted by the Attorney General of the State, for the plaintiff, that the warrants were warrantts of the Auditors of the late Territorial Treasury, duly and legally issued, for demands upon the said Territory of Florida; and, further, that the same still remained in the possession of W. R. Hayward, Esq., State Treasurer. Defendants also introduced Richard T. Birchett, who, being duly sworn, proved the said Nathaniel P. Bemis was the owner and holder of said Territorial warrants, prior to his appointment to the office of Comptroller of Public Accounts. Also Hugh Archer, who being duly sworn, deposed that Nathaniel P. Bemis was, before the date of the collections in said accounts stated, as having been made from S. Scarborough, and executors of T. P. Chaires, in possession of Territorial Treasury warrants, and which he believes the same as those described in the Treasurer's receipt, given in evidence. And here the testimony closed. And thereupon the Court charged the jury as follows, viz: "That the Comptroller has no right by law to appropriate funds collected by him in good money to the payment of an individual debt held by him on the Territory of Florida, unless it is so expressly provided by law. That, in performing the duties enjoined upon him by law, it was the duty of the Comptroller to receive scrip of the Territory when tendered in payment; but, if payment is made in good funds, it is the duty of the Comptroller to pay the same to the State in good funds. That the rights of these parties depend upon the law as it exists, and in assuming the office of Comptroller, the defendant undertook to execute the law as it was enjoined upon him; that the Comptroller is not the judge to determine of the justice and propriety of claims for or against the State according to his own notions of right, but according to the directions of the State, whose agent he is. That, if the State Legislature had designed to allow to one of their officers the privilege contended for, they would have expressed their design in unambiguous language." And with such instruction and direction, left the case to the jury.

To which opinion of the Court, the said defendants excepted. The questions presented by the record are —

First. Whether the Court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the fifth plea above set forth?

Second. Whether the Court erred in its instructions to the jury?

The first question depends upon the fact, whether the said fifth plea is good, both in form and substance, or not. One cause assigned for the demurrer is that it is double, in this, that the defendants have thereby pleaded and alleged performance of the duties of Comptroller by defendant Bemis, and also allege a tender and offer to pay, as well as a deposit of Territorial warrants, in payment of the demands of the State against him, the said Bemis; and we think this cause well assigned. The allegation of performance had already been made the ground of distinct plea, the fourth on which issue was taken; and a tender, if well made, is, of itself, a good ground of defence.

It is one of the first rules of pleading, that "pleadings must not be double, and a plea that contains within itself several distinct answers is bad." Stephen on Pl., 258, 259. 1 Chitty Pl., 592, 257, 260, 564. But a more important objection to that plea is, the nature of the tender. We are not aware of any law that makes the Treasury warrants mentioned in it a legal tender in any case.

It was held by Mr. Justice Story, in Thorndike vs. the United States, 1 Mason, that Treasury notes, issued under the act of Congress of 1814, being by their terms receivable in the payment of duties, taxes and bond debts, due the United States for the principal 17 and interest due thereon, are good tenders, and may be pleaded as such to such debts. But it is apprehended that they are not a good tender, and they could not be well pleaded as such to any but such debts. A plea of tender is not supported by proof of a tender of a promissory note due from the plaintiff to the defendant. Carry vs. Bancroft, 14 Pick., 315. These Treasury warrants were not by their terms receivable for taxes or debts due to the late Territory, which issued them. No provision has been made by any law of the State for their liquidation, and if there had it would not make them a good tender in such case as this, unless it specially authorized their reception in payment in such a case. The fifth plea is, therefore, bad and the demurrer thereto properly sustained.

The next and only remaining question is, did the Court err in its instructions to the jury? And after a due and careful examination of them, and a due consideration of the arguments in relation thereto we are of opinion that it did not. The Comptroller certainly had no right by law to appropriate the funds collected by him in good money or, indeed, any money collected by him, to the payment of an individual debt held by him on the late Territory of Florida, unless it was so expressly provided by law; and so far from there being any express provision, the General Assembly have always hitherto carefully abstained from making any provision for the payment of such debts. How far it comports with propriety or sound moral principle, and with the character and dignity of a soverign State, to collect the debts due to the Territory, and apply the proceeds to the payment of its own debts, without making any provision to pay the duly acknowledged and admitted indebtedness of the late Territory for services rendered it by its own public officers and other citizens, is a question for the General Assembly, and not this Court, to determine. It is to be presumed, however, that provisions will be made to pay them so soon as the state of the treasury will permit it to be done.

Until, however, that shall be done by the properly constituted authority, the Comptroller has no right to audit them, or the Treasurer to pay them; for the Constitution expressly declares that no money will be drawn from the treasury, but in consequence of an appropriation by law. Con., art. 8, sec. 3; and the statute provides that no money shall be paid out of the treasury, except on a warrant from the Comptroller. Act July 26, 1845. Pamphlet Laws, page 18 19. Thompson's Digest, page 34, No. 6. And it is made the duty of said Comptroller to examine, state, audit and settle all accounts, claims and demands whatsoever against the State arising under any law or resolution of the General Assembly. Act of July 23d, 1845. Pamphlet Laws, 16. Thompson's Digest, page 31, No. 4; and we are unable to find any statute authorizing the Comptroller to audit any other claims than those which arise under some act of the General Assembly. Sec. 2 of the 17th Art. of the Con., (Schedule and Ordinance,) provides that "all fines, penalties and forfeitures, obligations and escheats, accruing to the Territory of Florida, shall accrue to the State of Florida;" and sec. 3, that "all recognizances taken, or which might be taken, before the organization of the judicial department, under this Constitution, shall remain valid, and shall pass over to and may be prosecuted in the name of the State.

And all bonds executed to the Governor of the Territory of Florida or any other officer in his official capacity, shall pass over to the Governor or other proper State authority, and to their successors in office, for the uses therein expressed, and may be sued for and recovered accordingly. It may be remarked that this article contains no provisions for paying the above specified debts of the Territory.

It was not thought necessary by the framers of the Constitution to enjoin upon the General Assembly by a special clause, what without any such special injunction, is a great Constitutional and moral duty. It would have been a reflection upon the intergrity of the General Assembly, to have inserted in that instrument a clause implying a doubt that the Legislature would discharge a duty required of them by every principle of honor and justice. The Act of July 23d, 1845, Thompson's Digest, page 38, No. 12—Pamphlet L. page, 18, provides that "it shall be the duty of the Comptroller forthwith upon entering upon the duties of his office to cause a strict inquiry and examination to be made either by himself or such person as he may appoint in each and every County of the State, into the records of every Court of this Territory as to all fines, forfeitures recognizances or costs, or other monies due to the Territory of Florida from any District Attorney, Clerk, Marshal, Sheriff or other officer, person, or corporation, and also to enquire and examine into all accounts, returns and reports of all officers of the Territory, or other persons or corporations indebted or accountable in anywise to the paid according to law," And a Resolution of December 27th, 1845, Pamph. L. 157, Thompson's Digest, page 34, No. 17, directs "That the Comptroller of Public Accounts, be and he is hereby instructed to proceed forthwith to collect all debts, dues and demands of the late Territory of Florida, for which he shall be entitled to ten per centum upon all amounts so actually collected and paid into the Treasury." These, it is believed, are all the provisions which our laws contain on the subject under consideration, and none of them authorized the Comptroller to appropriate any monies by him collected to the payment of his individual debts, and especially to pay a claim, which no proof as the law stands would have authorized the Comptroller to audit or the Treasurer to pay.

Territory, and forthwith proceed to have such account settled and 19

The monies collected by the Comptroller under the act and resolution above cited, were, so soon as he received them, to all intents and purposes, the monies of the State, and so far as he was concerned at least, in the Treasury of the State, and he so considered and treated them, for by reference to his account current, it will be perceived that he charged his ten per cent. for collecting them, which he is not entitled to except upon the amount so actually collected and paid into the treasury. The judgment of the Court below is therefore affirmed with costs.

Per Curiam.

THE CITY OF TALLAHASSEE, APPELLANT, VS. JUSTICE R. FORTUNE, APPELLEE

Aggregate Corporations, receiving their corporate powers and bound by their corporate duties with their own consent, are liable for special damage occasioned by their nonfeasance, or breach of duty, in an action of trespass on the case.

The City of Tallahassee having full power and authority to remove and to prevent nuisances is liable in such an action for damage caused by the failure to remove them.

But a plaintiff claiming damages as the result of a nuisance, must show that he acted with common and ordinary care.

This case comes up by appeal from a judgment of the Circuit 20
Court of the County of Leon rendered at the spring term, 1849, Judge BARTZELL, presiding

The facts of the case and the pleadings are stated in the opinion delivered by the Court, affirming the judgment of the Court below.

Archer, for Appellant, contended

1st. That trespass for nonfeasance does not lies against a municipal corporation, and cited Edwards vs. Union Bank, 1 Flor. Rep. 136-147. 3 Peters, 398, 409. 11 Missouri, 59.

2d. If the action lies, the declaration in this case shows that the injury resulted from the negligence of the plaintiff in the Court below, and that therefore he was not entitled to recover. Smith vs. Smith, 2 Pick. 621.

Papy, for Appellee.

The question arising here is as to the liability of the City for neglecting to abate a nuisance whereby plaintiff suffered an injury in the loss of a horse.

By the third section of the act incorporating the City of Tallahassee, the City Council is invested with full power and authority "to prevent and remove nuisances," &c., and generally to provide for the interior police and good government of said City. See pamphlet laws, 1840, page 12.

The declaration alleges that a chasm existed in one of the streets, and that plaintiff's horse fell into it and was injured, so that he died, &c

That this chasm was a nuisance, is shown by the definition given to the terms by the book: "It is the doing a thing which tends to the annoyance of all the King's subjects, or the neglecting to do a thing which the common good requires," &c. 1 Hawk., 360. 4 Black. Com., 166.

There is no distinction between the powers and duties of a corporation. When the public good requires the exercise of their powers, it is their duty to exercise them. People vs. City of Albany, 11 Wendell, 542.

LANCASTER, J.

Fortune, the appellee in this Court, brought suit by action of trespass on the case, against the appellant, the "City of Tallahassee, in 21 Leon County Circuit Court, alleging that a certain street within the corporate limits of said city is, and for a long time has been, a common highway for the good citizens of Florida, and their horses and cattle, to go, return, pass and repass, at their will and pleasure, at all times. The plaintiff on, the 3d day of October, A. D., 1848, was possessed of a gray mare of great value, to-wit, of the value of one hundred and twenty-five dollars. That said mare was employed by the plaintiff on said 3d day of October, in a lawful manner, according to the common usage and custom. That the street aforesaid was in the other parts thereof, except the east end, in a good repair and condition, and passable for men and horses, that, at the east end of said street, there was a large ditch, gully or chasm, which obstructed the free passage for the same. That defendant, in no wise ignorant that said east end of said street was out of repair, and ruinous and impassable, permitted the same so to remain on the aforesaid 3d day of October, and for a long time before that time, and omitted contrary to the legal duty of said corporation, to fill up and repair the said ditch, gully or chasm, whereby the said mare of the plaintiff, then and there passing, by, along and over the said street, fell into the said ditch, gully or chasm, and thereby became so much injured and bruised, that she died of the injuries and bruises occasioned by her fall as aforesaid.

To which declaration, the defendant by its attorney filed a general demurrer; which demurrer was overruled by the Court, and an inquiry of damages awarded to the plaintiff.

Whereupon the defendant appealed to this Court, and assigned as grounds for its appeal the following, to-wit:

1st. Trespass does not lie against a municipal corporation.

2d. If the action lies, the declaration in this case shows that the injury resulted from the negligence of the plaintiff.

The first ground assigned will now be considered, to-wit: Whether tresspass lies against a municipal corporation; and it was urged in argument that actions for torts can only be maintained against money corporations. To understand the force of this objection, it may be necessary to look at the powers of the City of Tallahassee, as conferred by the act entitled "An act to incorporate the City of Tallahassee," approved 2d of March, 1840, Pamphlet Laws, page 42. This is a private act of the Legislature—was referred to as such by 22 both counsel in the argument before this Court; but we think may be noticed under the provision of the statute of November 12th, 1828, which renders it unnecessary to plead specially private acts. See Tho. Dig., 332.

The act of incorporation provides that, by their corporate name, (City of Tallahassee,) they may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, and do all other acts as natural persons—may purchase and hold, real, personal and mixed property, and dispose of the same for the benefit of the City. By the second section, the government is vested in a city council, composed of an intendant and eight council men, of prescribed qualifications. By the third section of the act of incorporation, very large power and authority are vested in the city council, and among others, the power and authority "to prevent and remove nuisances," and generally "to provide for the interior police and good government of the City." By this section, power is given to said city council to levy taxes for the purposes recited in the preceding section.

We were referred to several cases to show that this section will not lie; all of which will be noticed. The first is Towle vs. the Common Council of Alexandria. 3 Peters S. C. Rep., pages 398 to 410. In that case, the plaintiff brought his action on the case, against the defendant, for damages charged to have been sustained by him, by reason of their failing to take bond and security from an auctioneer, licensed by them for certain years, as alleged, contrary to the statutory duty of the said corporation. To the declaration, a general demurrer was filed; which was sustained. Whereupon, the plaintiff prosecuted a writ of error to the Supreme Court. Ch. J. Marshall, in delivering the opinion of that Court, said: "The common council had granted a license to carry on the trade of an auctioneer, which the law did not empower that body to grant." That "he is not the officer or agent of the corporation, but is understood to act entirely for himself, as a tavern keeper, or any other person, who may carry on business under a license from the corporate body. The injury alleged in the declaration as the foundation of the action, is the omission to take the bond required by law. Now, if the common council was not required or enabled by law to take a bond, the action cannot be sustained." And upon this reasoning, the demurrer was held good, and the judgment below affirmed. But the Court says in that case, "That corporations are bound by their contracts" is 23 admitted; that money corporations, or those carrying on business for themselves, are liable for torts, is well settled. But that a legislative corporation, established as a part of the government of the country, is liable for losses sustained by nonfeasance—by an omission of a corporate body to observe a law of its own, in which no penalty is provided, is a principle for which we can find no precedent. We are not prepared to make one in this case."

In the above case, the point as to the right of the plaintiff to have his action on the case against the corporation, does not appear to have been made or decided; but the case went off on the ground that defendants did not apply to be nonfeasors, by omitting to do any thing which, by act of their incorporation, they were authorized or required to do.

In the case of Hawthorn vs. the City of St. Louis, the only question is, whether the salary of an officer of the corporation can be subject to an execution against such officer, by a proceeding by garnishment against the City. The Court holds that it cannot, and in this particular distinguishes between its being a public municipal corporation and a private corporation, such as banks, insurance companies and similar incorporations. 11 Miss. R., 60. We do not see that this authority decides any thing touching the question in regard to the bringing of an action on the case against a corporation for nonfeasance, by which any one has sustained a special damage.

The case of Edwards vs. the Union Bank of Florida, 1 Florida Reps. 136 to 155, is an action of tresspass "vi et armis," brought by the plaintiff vs. the corporation of the Union Bank. The question is there raised whether this action will lie against a corporation, and after an elaborate examination of the authorities, the Court hold the action well brought—but this was an action against a private money corporation. And we must now look to see whether trespass can be maintained against other corporations aggregate. In the case of Riddle vs. Proprietors of locks and canals on Merrimack river, 7 Mass., 189., Parsons, Ch. J., delivering the opinion of the Court, says: "It is one of the maxims of the common law, that a man specially injured by the breach of duty of another, shall have his remedy by action. If the breach of duty be by an individual, there is no question, and why should a corporation receiving its corporate powers, and obliged by its corporate duties with its own consent, be an ex- 24 ception, when it has, or must be supposed to have, an equivalent for its consent?" "We distinguish between proper aggregate corporations, and the inhabitants of any district, who are by statute invested with particular powers without their consent. These are in the books sometimes called "quasi corporations." Of this description are counties or hundreds in England, and counties, towns, &c., in this State, (Mass)." (and counties and townships in Florida). "Although quasi corporations are liable to information or indictment for the neglect of a public duty imposed on them by law, yet it is settled in the case of Russel et al. vs. Inhabitants of the county of Devon., 2 D. & E., 667, that no private action can be maintained against them for a breach of corporate duty, unless such action be given by statute And the sound reason is, that having no corporate fund, and no legal means of obtaining one, each corporator would be liable to satisfy any judgment rendered against the corporation. This burthen the common law will not impose—but in cases where the statute is an authority, to which every man must be considered as assenting. But in regular corporations, which have, or are supposed to have, a corporate fund, this reason does not apply. And he cites with approbation, the case of Mayor of Lynn vs. Turner Cowp. 86, where the principle is established that "case will lie against a corporation for neglect of a corporate duty, by which the plaintiff suffers." The doctrine of this last case appears to be sustained in New York. In the case of the People vs. corporation of Albany, at p. 543, 11 Wendell R., Nelson, J., delivering the opinion of the Court, says: "It is well settled that when a corporation or an individual is bound to repair a public highway or navigable river, they are liable to indictment for neglect of their duty. An indictment and an information are the only remedies to which the public can resort for a redress of their grievances in this respect. "If an individual has suffered a particular injury, he may recover his loss by an action on the case," for which position many authorities are there cited. The same doctrine is asserted 1 Coke on Lit., 56 a. "But the law for this common nuisance hath provided an apt remedy, and that is presentment in the Leete or in the Torne, unless any man hath a particular damage, as if he or his horse fell into the ditch, whereby he received hurt and losse, there for this special damage, which is not common to others, he shall have an action upon his case. And all this was resolved by the Court in the King's Bench." And again in 3d Blackstone, 219, the same doctrine is recognized, as well also as the doctrine that a ditch dug across a common highway is a common nuisance. 4 Blackstone, 167, defines a common law nuisance thus: "The doing a thing to the annoyance of all the King's subjects, or the neglecting to do a thing which the public good requires." We can have little difficulty in asserting that the large ditch, gully or chasm, situated in the east end of the street, named in the declaration, which street was a common highway as asserted by the declaration and admitted by the demurrer, was a common nuisance: that the corporation of the City of Tallahassee is an aggregate corporation, which has or may be supposed to have a common fund, as it has the power of assessing and collecting taxes, and the power to purchase and hold personal, real, and mixed property. It has also the power to prevent and remove nuisances, and provide for the interior police and good government of the city. It was contended by appellee, in argument, (and not denied by appellant) as we think, with much propriety, that the legal power to remove nuisances, having been conferred on the corporation by statute, carried with it the implied legal obligation to remove them.

It is therefore the opinion of the Court, that the City of Tallahassee was guilty of a nonfeasance in permitting the nuisance mentioned in appellee's declaration to remain, and plaintiff having lost his mare by means of her falling into the said common nuisance, and being thereby bruised so that she died, he is entitled to have an action of trespass on the case against the said corporation, for said special damage, unless it occurred by his own gross negligence. And this brings us to consider the second objection of appellants.

The following statement was agreed by council to be a part of the averments in the declaration as demurred to: "On the 3d day of October, Geo. W. Hutchins, who had been using Fortune's mare, returned with her and hitched her near the place where Fortune's tin shop was kept. The mare got loose and nothing was seen or heard of her until next morning, although diligent search was made for her as soon as it was discovered she had got away. She was found next morning in the bottom of the chasm complained of, which was immediately opposite the lot in which she was usually kept. The mare was badly hurt and died on the day she was discovered." Parker, Ch. J., says, in the case of Smith vs. Smith, 2 Pick. 624, "to entitle the plaintiff to an action of damages resulting from a nuisance, he must show that he acted with common and ordinary care." And so we take the law to be; if a person should go headlong with his beast upon a nuisance, which (with ordinary care) he might have avoided, he ought not to have damages for his loss in consequence of his own recklessness. In effect this was decided in the case of Butterfield vs. Forrester, 11 East., 60. The facts of the present case show that Fortune's mare, after being used, was hitched before his tin shop, and where of course she could not remain long without notice. It is the custom of the people generally, when in the streets, to hitch their horses to a hook, peg, post, tree or rack, and leave them while the riders attend respectively to their own business. The thing is daily (and frequently every day) done by the most careful as well as by the careless persons, and cannot, in our opinion, form a ground of allegation of negligence or want of ordinary care, in the plaintiff; but horses so hitched often escape, and this is accident rather than negligence. The mare then having broken loose, or having accidentally escaped from her fastening, it is presumed sought to return to her accustomed enclosure or stall, as it was contiguous to the chasm complained of, and on her way thither fell in and was lost as the facts appear. Had not the chasm been in the street it is reasonable to suppose that the mare would have returned to her stable without damage. It was therefore, the direct cause of her death, and her owner's loss. It was there in consequence of the wrongful negligence of the defendant, and in our opinion it ought to pay the damages such nonfeasance occasioned.

The judgment of the Court below is affirmed with costs.

Per curiam.

GEORGE W. FERGUSON, APPELLANT, VS. MARY ANN PORTER, EXECUTRIX, &c., APPELLEE.

A bailee or factor is bound to follow such instructions as are given to him by his principal, unless the instructions are inconsistent with the special agreement between them; and is liable for any injury resulting from a departure from such instructions; and this liability is incurred, although the services undertaken were gratuitous.

It is erroneous to charge the jury, that they cannot find for plaintiff, because there is no good or valid consideration for the promise or undertaking alleged in his declaration proved.

The statute of the State requiring the judge presiding in the trial of common law cases, "to charge the jury only upon some point or points of law, or exceptions to evidence arising on the trial of the cause," is a positive prohibition against the statement of the facts as proved.

Appeal from a judgment rendered at the spring term, 1849, of the Circuit Court of the County of Monroe, the Hon. JOSEPH B. LANCASTER, Judge of the Southern Circuit, presiding, on the trial of the cause in the Court below.

The jury found a verdict for the appellee, under the instructions given by the Judge—a full statement of which, together with the pleadings in the case, and the evidence adduced at the trial, will be found in the opinion pronounced by Ch. J. Douglas in this Court.

Papy, for appellant.

Hogue, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, Ch. J.

This suit was instituted by George W. Ferguson against Mary Ann Porter, executrix of the last will and testament of Joseph Y. Porter, deceased, in the Circuit Court of Monroe County, to recover damages for an alleged breach of duty by the said Joseph Y. Porter, as the bailee and factor of the plaintiff in this suit. The declaration contains two counts. The first charges, that in the month of January, in the year 1846, the plaintiff and the said Joseph Y. Porter, (then living but since deceased) entered into an agreement, together, whereby the said plaintiff was to manufacture and make arrow-root, and from time to time send and deliver the same to the said Joseph Y. Porter, as his factor, as aforesaid, at the county aforesaid; and in consideration that the said plaintiff would purchase his supplies from the said Joseph Y. Porter, the latter undertook and agreed to receive and ship the same to the port of New Orleans and sell and cause to be sold on the said plaintiff's account. That in September, 1846, at the county aforesaid, in compliance with said agreement, and at the special instance and request of the said Joseph Y. Porter, the said plaintiff sent and delivered to the said Joseph Y. Porter 1725 lbs. of arrow-root, worth $140, which the said Joseph Y. Porter was bound by his said agreement to ship to the port of New Orleans for sale, which he neglected and refused to do, but shipped the said arrow-root to the port of Charleston, contrary to agreement and the wishes of the plaintiff, whereby the same was wholly lost to said plaintiff. Whereby he, the said Joseph Y. Porter, in his lifetime, became liable, &c., and undertook to pay, &c. The second is a general count, charging that the said Joseph Y. Porter was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $140 for 1725 pounds of arrow-root sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the said Joseph Y. Porter at his request, and the further sum of $140 for money had and received. To which declaration a plea of non assumpsit was put in by the defendant at Nov. term, 1848, and at the May term, 1849, the cause was submitted to a jury, who found for the defendant. Whereupon a judgment was entered that the said plaintiff take nothing by his bill, &c., from which judgment an appeal was taken to this Court.

It appears by a bill of exceptions set out in the record, that there was conflicting testimony as to the undertaking and agreement of the said Joseph Y. Porter, respecting the arrow-root; there was no dispute about the delivery of it, but one witness stated that in the latter part of the year 1845, or early part of 1846, the plaintiff, then in Key West, wanted to purchase goods of Joseph Y. Porter, and send him arrow-root at a stated price to pay for them; that Porter refused to sell plaintiff goods upon any other terms of taking arrow-root, than that he, Joseph Y. Porter, should sell it for the best price he could get at his own discretion, and after paying expenses of sale, credit the plaintiff with the balance of the amount of sales; that Joseph Y. Porter advised plaintiff to send arrow-root to New Orleans; that plaintiff agreed to said terms, bought goods and sent arrow-root several times; that Joseph Y. Porter made two shipments to New Orleans, and the price not continuing good, directed wit-

Ferguson vs. Porter, Executrix.—Opinion of Court.

29 ness, who was his clerk, to ship the next to Charleston, with the hope of getting a better price; that in October, 1846, he did ship the arrow-root in the declaration mentioned, towards Charleston, uninsured, and that it was lost at sea in the hurricane of that month. The other witness (for there appears to have been but two examined) stated that in the summer or fall of 1846, the plaintiff, who resided at Miami, wrote to said Porter at Key West, promising to make arrow-root to be sent to Porter for shipment, and inquiring of said Porter what advance he was willing to make on it, and on what charges and conditions he would receive it, and ship it to New Orleans; that in about six or eight weeks, plaintiff received a letter in answer to his from Porter, stating that he would receive the arrow-root and advance four cents per pound in goods on it; would ship it to New Orleans and pay over the balance on receiving account of sales; that upon receipt of this letter of Porter, plaintiff sent him 1700 pounds or more of arrow-root, in pursuance of the agreement between them in the said letter; that about the 1st of November, 1846, witness having been requested by plaintiff to do so, called at Porter's store in Key West to inquire about this 1725 pounds of arrow-root, and was informed that it had been shipped to Charleston in the mail boat, upon the ground that there had been no opportunity to ship it to New Orleans. That a few days afterwards, having heard of the loss of the mail boat, he, witness, called again at said store, where said Joseph Y. Porter spoke of the loss of the mail boat and the arrow-root; said it would be plaintiff's loss, and that he had shipped it at plaintiff's risk. Witness told said Porter that he had shipped it contrary to orders. Porter said he knew he had, but there had been no opportunity to ship it to New Orleans. This is all the testimony material in the question presented for consideration, which the record in this case discloses.

The plaintiff's council asked the Court to charge the jury "that if they believed from the testimony, J. Y. Porter accepted the consignment of arrow-root, he was bound to follow such instructions as he knew his principal to have given, and to have fulfilled to the letter any agreement that had been made between them, and that if he had given a different direction from the one understood and agreed upon between them, he is responsible, though he did it with good motive." The Court gave the instruction with the addition that 30 "it is good law where there is a good declaration." To which addition the plaintiff's council excepted. The plaintiff's council here moved for permission to amend his declaration to the effect that plaintiff did purchase said supplies, and to state the value of such purchases. The defendant's council objected, and the Court refused permission. To which refusal plaintiff's council excepted. The defendant's council asked the Court to instruct the jury that they cannot find for plaintiff, because no good or valid consideration for the promise and undertaking of Porter alleged in the declaration, is set up by plaintiff or proved. Which instruction the Court gave, and plaintiff's council excepted. The errors assigned are

First—The Court erred in not giving without qualification, the first instruction asked for by the plaintiff below.

Second—The Court erred in adding the qualification to the first instruction asked for by the plaintiff below, as appears by the bill of exceptions.

Ffourth—The Court erred in giving the instruction asked for by the declaration asked for by the plaintiff.

Fourth—The Court erred in giving the instruction asked for by the defendant below.

Fifth—The Court erred in giving judgment for defendant.

As to the first instruction asked, it may be proper to observe, that it is very inartificially drawn. It would have been proper for the Court to have instructed the jury, that if they believed from the testimony, that Joseph Y. Porter accepted the consignment of arrow-root as bailee or factor of the plaintiff, he was bound to follow such instructions as his principal had given him respecting it, if there was no special agreement between them on the subject, or if there was, and the instructions given were in accordance with it; but he would not have been bound to follow any instructions repugnant to the terms of any such agreement; nor would he have been liable for giving directions contrary to it, unless such directions had been followed. The plaintiff as well as the defendant, would have been bound to a substantial compliance with the terms of any special contract, that may have existed between them in relation to this matter. And we think the whole of this charge, from the manner in which it is drawn, might very properly have been withheld. But if given, it should have been without the qualification that was added. Because from the manner in which that qualification was coupled with the 31 instruction asked, it seemed (though doubtless not intended,) to leave to the jury the question whether the declaration was good or not, (a question exclusively for the determination of the Court) and might have tended to mislead them. But more especially, because such a question did not properly arise in the case. If it were necessary to have stated such a consideration in the declaration, and none was stated, then the declaration would have been bad on demurrer, and that would have been a proper mode of taking advantage of the error. If such a consideration were necessarily stated, it should have been met by a special plea.

There are two counts in the declaration—one special and the other a general indebitatus assumpsit. And it has not escaped our attention that in a note 1 Chitty's Pl., 55, a., it is said, that to a special count in assumpsit, the want of consideration should be pleaded specially, but in a common indebitatus count, the want of consideration for the promise, is inadmissible under the common plea of non assumpsit. But the 2d rule of practice adopted for the government of the Circuit Courts of this State, page 10, requires "in any species of assumpsit all matters in confession and avoidance, including not only those by way of discharge, but those which show the transaction either to be void or voidable in point of law, on the ground of fraud or otherwise, to be specially pleaded," and in the text of 1 Chitty's Pl., page 557, infancy, coverture, release, payment, performance, want of consideration and illegality of consideration, are all enumerated as matters that must be specially pleaded in every species of assumpsit. In the case of Papenger vs. Brooks, 7 Carr & P., 110, 32 Eng. C. L. Rep., 259, which was an action of assumpsit brought upon a special agreement, plea non assumpsit, and an attempt to set up as a defense a want of consideration, Tindall, Ch. Justice, said "the very object of the new rules was, that such a defence should be pleaded." Wild, Sergt. for plaintiff, said "if it had been pleaded, we should have come prepared to meet it." Talfourd, Sergt. for defendant, then submitted that the plaintiff could never recover nominal damages as the defendant was not to pay money, but to deliver timber at certain prices specified in an agreement that was not produced. Tindall, Ch. J., "it is no matter about that agreement: you are to deliver timber to the value of £350. I think you cannot get on. It seems to me that you have no answer to this record. If 32 you have any relief in equity that is another matter. I cannot deal with it here." Verdict for plaintiff £350. This is the only decision we have been able to find upon this question under the new rules in England, (from one of which, this of our's was copied,) but it is directly in point, if want of consideration is an appropriate defence in a case like this, but for reasons hereafter stated, we do not so consider it. This disposes of the first and second errors assigned.

As to the third, which was not relied upon at the argument of this case, it is sufficient to say, that the question in regard to amendments was so fully discussed and so well considered by this Court, in the case of Stewart vs. Fontaine & Bennett, 1 Florida Rep., 441 to 447, and in Britt vs. Ming, ibid, 447 to 455, that the question ought to be considered at rest in this State. In the first of these cases, at page 442, the Court said: "The doctrine of amendments as it stands at common law, independent of the statute of amendments and joefail, seems based upon the discretion of the Court;" and numerous authorities are cited in the first of these cases in support of this opinion, and the principle has been established by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that the exercise of discretion in the Court below, in granting or refusing amendments of pleading, affords no ground for a writ of error. See United States vs. Buford, 3 Peters S. C. Rep. This is the general common law rule—in addition to, or rather in accordance with which, our statute of November 23, 1828—Sec. 50, Duval's Compilation, 99. Thompson's Digest, 382—especially provides that "the Court may, in its discretion, give leave to either party to amend his declaration or other pleading in a cause at any time before the case is submitted to a jury;" and if it may, at its discretion, give leave, it follows as a matter of course, that it may, at its discretion, withhold it.

The fourth—that the Court erred in giving the instruction asked for by the defendant—we consider well assigned. The instruction asked and given was, that they (the jury) cannot find for the plaintiff, because no good or valid consideration for the promise and undertaking of Porter, alleged in the declaration, is set up by the plaintiff, or proved. We have said that no such question as that of consideration for the promise or undertaking of Porter arises in this case. The reason is that the undertaking itself raises the duty on which 33 his liability (if he were liable at all) rests. So far as regards the first count in the declaration, (and as we have seen no question of consideration could have been raised upon either, without a special plea,) this charge, therefore, was inapplicable to the issue, and besides it took the facts from the jury, and contravenes the provisions of the 1st Section of the Act of the General Assembly, approved January 3d, 1848, to regulate judicial proceedings—acts of 1848, page 12, which declares that, "hereafter, in the trial of all common law cases in the several Circuit Courts of this State, it shall be the duty of the judge presiding on such trial, to charge only upon the law of the case, and in the manner following—that is to say, the said judge shall only charge the jury upon some point or points of law, or exceptions to evidence, arising on the trial of such cause, and such charge shall be wholly in writing." The complaint is, that the Court told the jury they could not find for the plaintiff. By reference to the testimony, it will be perceived that the only two witnesses examined differ very materially upon at least one very important point in the case. The facts should have been left to the jury, whose peculiar province it is to say what effect they shall have. 10 Peters S. C. Rep., 98.

Ferguson vs. Porter, Executrix.—Opinion of Court.

It is the province of the jury to weigh and decide upon the sufficiency of the evidence. Greenleaf vs. Birth, 9 Peters S. C., Rep., 299. The case of Reel vs. Reel, 2d Hawk, N. C. cases, was upon a statute somewhat similar to ours. The opinion was delivered by Ch. J. Taylor, who said, "This is a motion for a new trial, on the ground that the Court intimated its opinion to the jury of the matter in issue." The Act of Assembly, relative to the duty of a judge in charging, (he said), forbids him "to give his opinion whether a fact is fully or sufficiently proved, such matter being the true office and province of a jury;" and it "directs him to state in a full and correct manner the facts given in evidence, and declare and explain the law arising thereon." Our statute does not impose the duty to state in a full and correct manner the facts given in evidence—whether it forbids it or not, is a question which it is unnecessary for us now to decide. It certainly requires that the judge charge the jury only upon the law of the case. Ch. J. Taylor, commenting upon the statute of his State, then under consideration, says: "The evident design was to preserve the purity of the trial by jury, and thus to secure 34 to every man whose rights were controverted a decision on the facts in issue, which should be the result of the jury's investigation of the evidence, uninfluenced and unbiased by the opinion of the judge, whose province it is to pronounce whether testimony is admissible, and to instruct the jury as to the law, accordingly as they shall believe the facts or otherwise. It is not (he added) for this Court to discuss the wisdom or expediency of this law, or to prevent its true construction, under a belief that no mischief can be produced thereby, or even that justice can be more substantially administered. It is the will of the Legislature, and we are bound to obey it; so that every man who conceives himself aggrieved by disobedience of the law, has a right to be heard here, and if he can establish his case, he has a right to a new trial, without any necessity on the part of the Court of inquiring into the merits of the verdict; for although it should appear to this Court, that the evidence spread upon the record is such, that, if believed by the jury, it well warranted the verdict, yet, if it appear that the judge in his charge gave an opinion whether a fact was fully or sufficiently proved, it cannot appear how far the verdict was produced by the testimony, since the jury were to judge of its credibility, or by an intimation of the opinion of the judge."

"The propriety of the verdict, then, or its conformity with the evidence, we leave out of the question, and desire to be understood as giving no opinion upon it; for if the motion for a new trial were overruled, because this Court approved of the verdict, and it should at the same time appear that the judge had departed from the direction of the law in charging the jury, it would be deciding in effect that disobedience to the law may be tolerated or not, according to the consequence which follows from it. If a verdict, contrary to or unsupported by evidence, has been produced by it, the party shall be entitled to a new trial; but if the evidence justifies the verdict, and the right of the cause has been duly administered, that the charge of the judge deviating from the law shall be overlooked, is not the rule prescribed by the Legislature. They have inhibited the declaration of the judge's opinion on the proof of facts in every case, presuming that in every case it encroaches on the proper functions of the jury. It imparts a bias to the judgment of the jury, which they are disposed to receive with confidence, and seldom make an effort to resist." And from the truth of this last proposition, we think no one who has been accustomed to attend jury trials, and witness the effect of a 35 judge's charge to them upon the facts, will be inclined to dissent. The Chief Justice, examining the charge complained of in that case, to ascertain whether it was conformable to the Act of Assembly, concluded as follows: "Upon considering the whole of the charge, it appears to me that its general tendency is to preclude that free and full inquiry into the facts which is contemplated by the law—with the purest intentions, however, on the part of the worthy judge, who, receiving a strong impression from the testimony adduced, was willing that what he believed to be the very right and justice of the case should be administered."

"I am not unaware (he said) of the difficulty of concealing all indications of the convictions wrought upon the mind by evidence throughout a long and complicated cause; but the law has spoken, and we have but to obey." We may with propriety say the same as to the intention of the judge who gave the charge, which we are now discussing. That the error was inadvertently committed, we have not the shadow of a doubt, but it is not the less, therefore, our duty to correct it. Without saying whether we should deem it to be our duty toward a venire de novo in all cases, where the verdict appears to us to be well sustained by the evidence, as shown by the record—where the judge, in his charge to the jury, had contravened the provisions of the act of our General Assembly above cited, we are ready to admit that there is much weight in the reasoning of the Court, in the case we have cited from North Carolina. How can an Appellate Court judge of the credibility of a witness? It can read his testimony, but how can it determine the weight or influence which it ought to have had on the minds of the jury in coming to a conclusion upon the evidence, as compared with the testimony of other witnesses, or other evidence in the cause—a question which must be decided upon matters which do not necessarily form a part of the record, and rarely, if ever, appear in it. An able writer upon the law of evidence says, "it frequently happens that a witness labors under some influence arising from natural affection, near connection, or mere expectation of contingent benefit or evil, which may afford a much stronger temptation to perjury, than that which would arise from any defined and legal interests, which yet would have absolutely excluded his testimony." This is a necessary consequence resulting from the consideration, that the law must operate by means 36 of certain, definite and peremptory rules, and the great mischief and inconvenience that would result from laying down rules too wide and extensive in their operation. When, therefore, the peremptory rules of law cease to operate, it is for the jury to estimate the degree of influence by which the testimony of a witness is likely to be corrupted, and to determine whether, under the circumstances, he be the witness of truth. 1 Starkie on Ev., 481.

In arriving at this conclusion, a consideration of the demeanor of the witness upon the trial, and upon the manner of giving his evidence, both in chief and upon his cross examination, is oftentimes not less material than the testimony itself. Sir W. Blackstone, 3 Com., 373, observes "In short, by this method of examination, and this only, the persons who are to decide upon the evidence have an opportunity of observing the quality, age, education, understanding, behaviour and inclinations of the witness, in which points all persons must appear alike, when their depositions are reduced to writing, and read to the judge in the absence of those who made them, and yet, as much may frequently be collected from the manner in which the evidence is delivered as the matter of it."

The case of Ivey vs. Hodges, 4 Humphrey's Rep., 155, was decided upon the 9th sec. of the 6th art. of the Constitution of Tennessee, which provides "that Judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law." This provision (said the Court) arose out of the jealousy with which our ancestors always looked upon any attempt of the Court to interfere with the peculiar province of the jury, the right to determine when facts are proved in a cause and to put a stop to the practice of summing up as it was and is yet practiced in the Courts of Great Britain, and in all probability in the Colonies before the revolution, which consists in telling the jury not what is deposed to, but what is proved. This, the framers of our Constitution (say the Court) considered a dangerous infraction of the trial by jury, and have prohibited it by express terms. "Judges shall not charge with respect to matters of fact," that is, they shall not state to the jury the facts that are proved; to do so is error, for which a cause must be always reversed. But not being disposed to withdraw from the jury any proper aid which the Judges may be enabled to render them in their inves-

37 tigation, they have provided that they may state the testimony, that is, may, for the purpose of refreshing the memory of the jury, inform them what facts the different witnesses have deposed to, leaving them to judge of the truth thereof, and to draw their deductions therefrom. It will be observed that the prohibition is direct and positive, "shall not," the power permissive, "may state." From this phraseology that Court deduces the opinion that it is discretionary with their judges to inform the jury what facts the different witnesses have deposed to or to "declare the law." But the prohibition is positive, and extends to all cases. Our statute arose out of the same jealousy, and was intended to preserve the purity of the trial by jury, and surely if jury trial is worth having, it is worth preserving in all its integrity.

And here we might with propriety stop, but as an objection was taken at the trial, that no consideration of the promise and undertaking of the said Porter, alleged in the declaration, was set up by the plaintiff, or proved, we deem it proper to state our opinions more fully on the subject. It will be seen by reference to the declaration, that it charges that the said Joseph Y. Porter, (in his lifetime) undertook and agreed with the plaintiff to receive of him and ship to New Orleans, certain arrow-root, (alleged to be worth $140) and sell or cause it to be sold for and on said plaintiff's account, and that he received the arrow-root, but instead of shipping it to New Orleans, shipped it for Charleston, whereby it was wholly lost, &c. That he, (the said Porter,) received the arrow-root, does not seem to be controverted; indeed the testimony shews that he received it and shipped it for Charleston, and that it was lost in a gale of wind. As to the agreement, however, between the plaintiff and Porter, about the shipping and sale of arrow-root, the testimony is contradictory. The undertaking of the said Joseph Y. Porter to receive the arrow-root of the plaintiff, and sell it or cause it to be sold, and account to him for it, created a duty on the part of said Porter to act in regard to it comformably to the terms on which he received it, and if he failed to do so, and it was consequently lost, he was liable on that undertaking. Ever since the great case of Coggs vs. Bernard, decided by Lord Holt, 2 Lord Raymond's Reps., 909, it has been held that the undertaking is the gist of this kind of action. This case is one of the most celebrated ever decided in Westminster Hall, and justly so, 38 since the elaborate judgment of Lord Holt, contains the first well considered exposition of the English law of bailments. The points which the decision directly involves, viz: That if a man undertakes to carry goods safely, he is responsible for neglect, though he was not a common carrier, and was to have nothing for the carriage, is clear law, and forms part of a general proposition in the law of principal and agent, which may be stated in the following words, viz: "The confidence induced by undertaking any service for another, is a sufficient legal consideration, to create a duty in the performance of it." 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 169, (in note.) By this rule, a gratuitous and voluntary agent, who has given no specific undertaking, though the degree of his responsibility is greatly inferior to those of a hired agent, is yet bound not to be guilty of gross negligence. Wilkinson vs. Coverdale, 1 Esp. Rep., 74. Beauchamp vs. Powley M. & Rob. Rep., 38. Story on Bailments, sec. 165.

The liability of paid agents where there has been no conversion, differs from that of unpaid agents. As to the former, the obligation is not as in the case of a common carrier to carry, or as in the case of an innkeeper to keep; but the contract is for the services of employee, for diligence and skill in the agency or work undertaken, and the duty and liability of a paid agent to whom property is delivered, as a warehouse man, or a forwarding agent, is the same as that of a person employed about property in possession of the employee, 1 Smith L. Cases, 185-186. No man can compel another to render him acts of friendship of any kind, either gratuitous or with a view to remuneration, but if the person applied to, consents to render the services, and undertakes the business, he is bound to act in conformity to the terms on which the request was made. Walker, et al. vs. Smith, 1 Wash. C. C. Reps., 153. Loraine vs. Cartwright, 3 Wash. C. C. R., 153, 155. Story on Bailments, sec. 170, a., sec. 171, 171, b., 171, c., 171, d. section 455. Jones on Bailments, 98. Story on Agency, sections 182, 186. It is the duty of the agent in all cases to manage the business of the principal to the best advantage and the best of his ability. Story on Agency, sec. 228, 1. Livermore on Agency, p. 394. And he is bound to pursue the orders of his principal, and is liable for any injury consequent upon his departing from them, however fair may have been his motives for such departure. Manilla vs. Barry, 3 Cranch, 415. 2 Wash. C.

C. R., 203. 4 Wash. C. C. R., 559. Bell vs. Cunningham, 3 Pet. 39

An agent that does not comply with instructions, is liable for the loss incurred thereby, although the services were gratuitous. Walker vs. Smith, Wash. C. C. R., 152. French vs. Reid, 6. Burney's Rep., 308. A paid agent is liable if negligent and not liable if not negligent. Moore vs. the Mayor of Mobile, 2 Stewart's Rep. 81. Whenever an agent violates his duties, or obligations to his principal, and loss or damage thereby falls upon his principal, he is responsible therefor and bound to make a full indemnity. Story on Agency, sec. 217. Paley on Agency, 71, 74. Marzett vs. Williams, 1 B & Adolph, 415. 1 Livermore on Agency, Chap. 8, sec. 3, page 398. Dodge vs. Tileston, 12 Pic., 328. Holmes vs. Misroom, 3 Brevard's Rep., 209.

The declaration charges the undertaking of Joseph Y. Porter, (as before stated,) that he entered upon the business, that he failed to comply with the terms of the undertaking and that the property was consequently lost. The plea of non assumpsit denies the undertaking; this raises a sufficient issue to determine the rights of the contracting parties; no further consideration need to have been alleged; a plea of want of consideration would seem to be inapplicable to such a count, it would put in issue nothing more than the plea of non assumpsit. The only question arising in this case, or rather the only questions in contest, seem to be as to the undertaking of Joseph Y. Porter. Was the arrow-root in question received by him as the bailee or factor of the plaintiff? If it was, did he, (the said Porter,) act in relation thereto in conformity to the terms on which he received it?—these being mere questions of fact for the jury to decide upon the evidence adduced in the case, and that evidence which we have seen, was upon some points conflicting, having been withdrawn from the jury by the fourth instruction above cited. The judgment of the Court below is reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

Per curiam.

BALTZELL, J.,

Not concurring altogether in the views expressed by the Chief Justice, delivered the following:

I concur in the opinion expressed as to the instruction asked by plaintiff. The instruction given at the instance of defendant was, 40
"that no good or valid consideration for the undertaking of Porter, alleged in the declaration, was set up by plaintiff, or proved." The sufficiency of the pleadings was not matter proper to be submitted to the jury, nor is it to be inferred (although the instruction is somewhat ambiguous) that the council either asked, or the Court gave, an instruction referring it to them. The preferable construction is, that the consideration alleged in the declaration was not proved. If correct in this view, the instruction was erroneous, as being directly at variance with the evidence in the case. Such an instruction is against common law principles and the Constitution of the State securing the trial by jury; so that a reference to the law of the Legislature of the State is, in my opinion, not called for, as necessary to the elucidation of the case. I leave it entirely out of the question. According to the view I take of the subject, the only point in contest was, as to the compliance of Porter with his engagement. He had undertaken to sell arrow-root for the plaintiff, and forwarded it for sale to Charleston. Was the shipment to this particular port in pursuance of, or in conflict with, his engagement with his principal? In agencies of this kind, it is well settled that a factor should deviate as seldom as possible from the terms, and never from the spirit and tenor of the order he receives. His duty is to obey. If he sends commodities confided to him to a different place from that to which he was directed, they will be at his risk, unless the principal, on receiving advice of the transaction, acquiesce, and this whether the service was gratuitous, or for compensation. 1 Wash. C. C. R., 152, 453. 4 Wash., 551.

The evidence is contradictory. One of the witnesses deposing that the disposal of the arrow-root was to be at the discretion of the defendant; another that he was specially directed to send to New Orleans. According to the mode adopted by the English Courts, the jury would have been asked specially as to the facts, whether there was this discretion or not, and after ascertaining this, they would be directed to find accordingly in favor of defendant, or damager for plaintiff. The practice in America is different in some degree, though leading to like result. The course here would be to give instructions, having a distinct reference to this discrepancy in the statement of the witnesses. The instruction, according to my 41 view, should have been as follows: If the jury should be of opinion that the arrow-root was to be disposed of at the discretion of Porter, and acting upon that discretion, he sent it to Charleston, he is not responsible for the loss occasioned through the destruction of the vessel. If, on the contrary, they should find that the understanding between the parties was, that the arrow-root was to be shipped to New Orleans, or was to be subject to the instructions of plaintiff, and he directed it to be sent there, and defendant deviated by sending it to Charleston, the shipment was at his risk, and in case of loss, he is responsible for its value. Such is the view I have thought proper to express in reference to the case, coinciding in the conclusion announced in the opinion delivered by the Chief Justice, but not entirely in the views declared.

WILLIAM J. WOODS, APPELLANT, vs. WILLIAM BAILEY, ADMINISTRATOR, DE BONIS NON OF JOHN BELLAMY, DECEASED, APPELLEE.

R. sold land to W., and took his note for the purchas money—R., the vendor and payee of the note, assigned the note to B., and guaranteed the payment. Afterwards R. sold the same land to another person. B., the assignee of the note, pursued the endorser and guarantor, R., to the State of Alabama, (he having gone there with a number of slaves)—sued him upon his guaranty, obtained judgment, and then took a conveyance of personal property from him, to secure the payment of the judgment obtained upon said endorsement, as well as judgments upon other notes of R., and gave him time of payment. Held—That if B., as against the last purchaser of the land, ever had a lien upon it for the purchase money, he waived and abandoned it by these proceedings. Held, also—That if the vendor transfers the note of the vendee, and guarantees the payment, the person taking such guaranty does not acquire a lien upon the land for the purchase money. In such case, the taking of the guaranty is such an additional security as defeats the tacit lien.

The lien of the vendor on lands for the purchase money is lost in all cases, where any security is taken on the land, or otherwise, for the whole or any part of the money, unless there is an express agreement to the contrary.

This cause was brought up by appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of Jefferson County, made November 8th, 1849, by the Hon. THOMAS BALTZELL, sitting in Chancery.

42 The facts of the case are so fully and clearly set out in the opinion of this Court, pronounced by Justice Lancaster, that any other statement is deemed unnecessary.

Hawkins, for appellant:

Woods, on the 5th day of November, 1844, purchased of Ransom J. Roberts a tract of land for $2,000, and paid the purchase money, partly in cash, and the balance in good negotiable promissory notes on third persons, without notice, as alleged in his answer, of any valid or subsisting lien on the land in favor of any one.

Bellamy claims to have a lien or equitable mortgage on the land in the hands of Woods, upon the following grounds, to-wit:

Roberts (as alleged in the bill) on the 26th day of March, 1840, executed a bond to one William H. Williams for titles to some land, not specifying the quantity, quality, locality or other description of the land contracted for—Williams on the same day executed to Roberts, his promissory note for $4,000, with interest at ten per cent. per annum, from 1st of January, 1841, and payable, 1st of January, 1845, which note Roberts assigned or guaranteed (as alleged in the bill) to Bellamy.

Bellamy, under this statement of the case, could have had no lien upon the land in the hands of Woods, or any body else, even if he had notice of the transfer of the Williams' note for the purchase money to Bellamy; for the endorsee of a note given for the purchase money of land is not, from the mere transfer of the note, entitled to the benefit of the assignor's or vendor's lien on the land for the purchase money. See White vs. Williams and others, 1st Paige's Chancery Reports, page 502. 3 Paige's Chancery Reports, p. 122.

But even admitting that Bellamy had the lien he contends for, Woods, claiming to be a bona fide purchaser of the lands from Roberts, (who still held the legal title,) for a valuable consideration, without notice (as alleged in his answer) of any valid or subsisting lien on the land in favor of Bellamy, or any one else, acquired a perfect title thereto, both in law and equity, and ought to be protected therein by the Court. See Sugden on Vendors, page 546-7.

Woods admits in his answer that he had heard, but from rumor only, that there had been a contract between Roberts and Williams for the sale of land, but that the contract had been abandoned on the part of Roberts, in consequence of the failure of Williams to com- 43 ply with his part of the contract. But the answer does not admit notice of the assignment of the Williams' note, nor is there any notice to Woods of this fact even alleged in the bill, or proof thereof in the cause. But even admitting that Woods had notice of the contract or bonds, as set forth in the bill, it could not be contended, by any pretence whatever, that it could have been any notice of the assignment of the Williams' note to Bellamy by Roberts. But there is no proof whatever in this cause, as against Woods, (the bill being taken pro confesso, as against Roberts only,) that the bond for title from Roberts to Williams, as set up in the bill, was ever executed by Roberts. The bond, as set forth, bears date 26th March, 1840, and was recorded June 19th, 1844, upwards of four years after its alleged execution, at the bare request of J. D. Westcott, Jr., without any proof of its execution whatever; and the bond set forth appears upon its face to be a mere copy from this record, made, as it would seem, for the express purpose of his cause, the original bond, if any, not having been produced or filed in this cause, and no excuse alleged or shown for its absence or omission. This, to say the least of it, must be considered by the Court to be a very suspicious circumstance in this cause. But even admitting that the bond had been duly recorded and proved without delay, it would not have been notice to any body—for there is no law requiring such bonds to be recorded, and consequently making them constructive notice; and even admitting that there was such law requiring bonds of this character to be recorded, the record could not be notice of any thing that was not specified in the bond itself. Consequently, in this case, there being no particular land described in the bond, either by metes and bounds, or number of acres, location or quality of the land agreed to be sold by Roberts to Williams, it could not be considered as notice to any body of any thing; but said bond, even if properly produced and proved in this cause, would have been considered as void for want of centainty, and could not be specifically enforced, either in favor of Williams or Bellamy. 1st Maddock's Chancery, pages 426-7.

Again: Even admitting, for the sake of argument, all the facts set up by Bellamy, as entitling him to a lien on the land itself, unless the title thereto had been actually conveyed to Williams, he could have no lien on the land in his hands—for Williams would have no land on which any such lien could attach, and the mere assignment 44 to Bellamy by Roberts of Williams' note for the purchase money, who still held the legal title, as there was no contract between Roberts who still held the legal title, ts there was no contract between Roberts and Bellamy about land. If Bellamy had any lien whatever, it must have been through the equity of Williams—a lien, not upon the land itself, but merely a lien upon the equitable right of Williams to call for a specific performance of the contract, upon payment of the entire purchase money—Roberts having retained the legal title to the land, until the purchase money should be paid; and the only way in which Bellamy could have enforced such lien, would have been to file a bill against Roberts and Williams for a specific performance of the contract between them, in order that the payment of the note might be enforced against the land in the hands of Williams, after the performance of the contract between Roberts and Williams; but the Court could not have decreed a conveyance of the land from Roberts, until the entire purchase money had been paid, with interest. If Williams would not or could not pay it, Bellamy, if he desired it, might have been subrogated to the rights and equities of Williams under his contract; but upon the conditions thereto attached—that is, upon the performance by Bellamy of the contract on the part of Williams, to wit: the payment of the $4,000 00, with interest, by Bellamy—Roberts would have been compelled to convey the land to him; but under no circumstances whatever, could Roberts, under his contract, have been compelled to part with his land, until the entire purchase money and interest had been paid, either by Bellamy or Williams; and if Bellamy took the land under the equity of Williams, he must have paid the same price for it that Williams had contracted to pay.

It is further alleged in the bill, after the assignment to Bellamy of the note on Williams, that Roberts ran off with some seventeen slaves, and some other articles of personal property, and was pursued by Bellamy into the State of Alabama, and the slaves and other property attached by Bellamy, to satisfy the liability of Roberts, as endorser on the Williams' note, and also three other notes, upon which Roberts was responsible to Bellamy, either as principal or endorser; that on the 22d of October, 1842, Roberts consented to judgments on all the notes sued on in Alabama, including the Williams' note, which judgment amounted in all to near $10,000, and on the same day, Roberts executed to Bellamy an absolute bill of sale for the seventeen slaves, in payment and full discharge of all the judgments so confessed by Roberts; and on the same day, Bellamy executed a deed or obligation to Roberts, in which he obliges himself to allow Roberts five years to redeem the slaves; and the hires of the slaves in the meantime to be applied to the payment of Bellamy's demand against Roberts. Bellamy also obliges himself to take the land contracted for by Williams, in full discharge of the liability of Roberts, as endorser of the Williams' note, to assist him in redeeming the slaves—upon condition that Roberts would discharge the incumbrance of the Union Bank on the land within ninety days from the date of Bellamy's deed.

From these subsequent transactions and statements of the case, it clearly appears, from Bellamy's own showing, that the bill of sale for the slaves was given by Roberts, and accepted by him, in full payment and discharge of all the judgments, debts and obligations due from Roberts to Bellamy, including his liability on the Williams' note; and that the deed or defeasance executed by Bellamy, and signed by him alone, was a mere privilege extended to Roberts, which Roberts could comply with or not at his option, and not at all binding upon Roberts, not being signed by him; and if Roberts failed to comply with the stipulations in the deed, the only consequence was, that Bellamy took the absolute property in the negroes, and the debts and obligations of Roberts would thereby have been paid and discharged, and Roberts would have kept his land.

And on the other hand, if we consider the bill of sale from Roberts and the deed of defeasance from Bellamy, as to be taken together and constituting a mortgage, it can only be considered a mortgage on the slaves, and not on the land, as there is no land mentioned in the bill of sale from Roberts, the land being mentioned only in the deed of defeasance executed by Bellamy alone, and consequently not binding on Roberts. Then, under this view of the case, considering these transactions as constituting a mortgage in favor of Bellamy on the slaves as insisted on in the bill, Bellamy must be considered as having waived his lien, if he had any on the land—on the well settled principle, that the taking of independent or other security for the payment of the purchase money of real estate, is considered as a waiver of the implied lien of the vendor. See Fish vs. Howland and others, 1st Paige's Chancery Reports, page 20; also Kent's Com., pages 151 to 153. Bradford vs. Marvin, Florida Reports 1849, page 463.

Bellamy could have been considered only as standing in the shoes of Roberts, in relation to the land, and any transaction that would have discharged the lien of Roberts, while he was the holder of the note on Williams, would equally have discharged Bellamy's lien, if he had any, after the assignment of the note to him. Consequently, taking the bill of sale or mortgage by Bellamy, to secure the payment of the Williams' note,, after it was assigned to him, must be considered as taking other and independent security for the purchase money by Bellamy, and a waiver of his lien, if he had any—the same as if Roberts had taken it from a third person in the first instance.

But, again: The bare consolidation of said note with other debts and notes, and taking a joint security or mortgage for the whole debt—or even the consolidation of the debt claimed in the bill to be a lien on the land, with other debts which were not a lien on it, even without any security—must be considered as a waiver of the lien—for all the debts became but one debt, and every portion of that debt must be of the same nature, and the entire debt, after consolidation, must have a lien on the land, or no portion of it can. Now, it would be absurd to contend for the first part of this proposition—that the holder of several independent claims, and having a lien for one of them only, could acquire a lien for all of them, by consolidating them.

But even if we consider the deed of defeasance from Bellamy to Roberts, as obligatory upon Roberts—then, it is clearly established, by the evidence of Woods and the proof in the cause, that Roberts did everything in his power on his part to comply with the stipulations in the deed in relation to the land, and did substantially perform the same; that he did discharge the incumbrance of the Union Bank within the ninety days specified in the deed, to wit: on the 17th day of February, 1843, thereby showing a readiness, ability and eagerness to perform the stipulations of the deed on his part; and in a short time after the expiration of the ninety days, Roberts made a formal tender of a deed to the land to Bellamy, in the presence of witnesses, to-wit: on the 25th day of May, 1843—which Bellamy refused to accept, and stated as his only reason for refusing it, that "the land was not worth the money" he had contracted to allow Roberts for it, and no objection was made on account of the deed not having been tendered within the time specified; thus clearly showing that he, Bellamy, did not consider that time was of the essence of the contract with Roberts—all of which clearly appears from the bill, answer and proof in the cause; and it is not proved, or even alleged in the bill, that Bellamy had ever requested Roberts to convey the land to him, but seemed to repose with content upon the bill of sale obtained from Roberts for his slaves, as a sufficient security or payment for all his demands against him. Therefore, if Bellamy seeks to enforce his demand against the land, on account of this agreement, he must take the land at the price he agreed in his deed to take it at, (in the event that the Court is of opinion that Bellamy's refusal to accept the deed was not an abandonment of his contract, which we insist upon)—that is, the Williams' note for $4,000 00 with interest; and permit Woods to go upon the other funds in the hands of Bellamy, to the amount thus over-paid by the land upon Bellamy's debt, after a readjustment of his accounts, to indemnify Woods for the loss of the land. But Bellamy can take no advantage of the failure of Roberts to tender him a deed for the land on the precise day agreed upon, as he has not shown that he has been injured thereby, and time, consequently, not considered as of the essence of the contract. See 2 Story's Com. equity, pages 85 to 88.

It also appears, from the allegations in the bill, that the Williams' note, assigned by Roberts to Bellamy, was not due at the time Bellamy filed his bill. The bill was filed 15th November, 1844, and the note not due until 1st of January, 1845—consequently, if Bellamy had any lien on the land for the payment of the note, he could not have enforced it, or have commenced any proceeding for its enforcement, either against Roberts or Williams, or any body else, until the note had become due, and was duly presented to Williams for payment, and refused by him, and notice of such refusal to pay given to Roberts. And even the confession by Roberts of the alleged judgments in Alabama, on his endorsement of the note on Williams, and afterwards executing a bill of sale for the slaves, to pay or secure the payment of his liability as endorser, could only have entitled Bellamy to have proceeded against the slaves in the bill of sale, or other property of Roberts, for payment of his debt, and not to have enforced any lien he might have had upon the land until the note became due. There is no allegation in the bill, or proof in the cause, that Bellamy ever demanded payment of the note from Williams—in fact, he could not legally have done so, until the note became due; and if he has not done so yet, he has lost his recourse upon Roberts.

But again, in conclusion: The bill of complaint having been taken pro confesso, as against Roberts only, (who it appears has left this State,) the bare allegations in the bill, so admitted by the default of Roberts, ought not to be binding on Woods, or prejudicial to him; and there is not a shadow of proof in this cause, except the bare allegations in the bill itself, that there ever was any contract whatever between Roberts and Williams for the sale of land, or any note given by Williams to Roberts, and assigned by Roberts to Bellamy, or any judgment obtained in Alabama, or in fact of any other allegation in the bill. Wherefore, upon this as well as the other grounds above relied upon, the decree of the Court below ought to be reversed, and the bill dismissed with costs, as against Woods, for want of equity; or if the Court is of opinion that Bellamy has any lien on the land, either under the original contract attempted to be set up between Roberts and Williams, or under the deed of defeasance from Bellamy to Roberts; then the decree of the Court below ought to be reversed, and the accounts re-adjusted, and Bellamy compelled to take the land, if at all, at the price Williams was to give for it, or at the price Bellamy agreed to take them at—which both amount to the same, to wit: $4,000 00, with ten per cent. interest from 1st of January, 1841; and the surplus, after the payment of Bellamy's debt, upon a re-adjustment of the account, to be decreed to Woods; or Woods permitted to go upon the funds already in the hands of Bellamy, for the amount over-paid by the land.

Papy, for Appellee.

The object in making Woods a party to this suit is to subject 600 acres of land purchased by him of R. J. Roberts, one of the defendants, to the payment of a debt due from Roberts to complainant.

This land was sold by Roberts to William H. Williams, in 1840, and he agreed to make out a good title to Williams, who was to pay Roberts $4000, and executed his promissory note for that sum. This note was endorsed by Roberts to Bellamy, and was guarantied by 49 Roberts. The consideration for this endorsement was cotton sold by Bellamy to Roberts. In 1842, Roberts absconded with all his property, and being pursued by Bellamy, was overtaken in Alabama, where, among other things, an agreement was made, by which Bellamy was to release Roberts from the Williams note, provided Roberts procured a release of the land from the Union Bank incumbrance, and conveyed it to Bellamy within ninety days from the date of the agreement, which was dated the 22d Oct., 1842. Roberts did procure a release but not till after the ninety days had elapsed, and did not tender a conveyance until the fifth day of June, 1843, long after the time limited for him to do so. Bellamy refused to accept it. On the fifth day of November, 1844, Roberts conveyed the land to defendant Woods, who acknowledged to have had knowledge of the agreement set out in the bill, but seeks to establish that they were rescinded.

The question, therefore, arises, is this land subject to the debt due Bellamy's estate on the Williams note? and this will depend upon whether the contract was binding between the parties—whether it was rescinded or not, and whether Woods had sufficient notice to charge him.

I. As to whether the contract was binding.

It is believed that no doubt can exist as to the binding force of this contract. Roberts agreed on one side to make a good title, and Williams, on the other, gave his note, which Roberts transferred to Bellamy. Indeed no objection was taken to this point in the Court below, and it is believed that none will be made here.

If the contract was binding, the thing to be done is considered as done, and the property converted in contemplation of Equity. Lacon vs. Mertins, 3 Atkins, 1. Attorney General vs. Day, 1 Ves., 218. The estate under such contracts of purchase as in this case, is in the vendee in contemplation of equity, and cannot be revoked by subsequent conveyance of the legal title by the vendor. 7 Vesey, 274. 11 Vesey, 554. 3 John Ch., 316. Livingston vs. Newkirk.

If Williams were here claiming to subject this land to sale for his benefit, his note having been assigned by the payee, admitting that the land was still in the possession of Roberts, a Court of Equity would decree that Williams had a lien upon the land upon the principle that where there is a payment of the money, or what is, as we 50 contend, the same thing, the delivery of negotiable notes, and an assignment of the same in toto to a bona fide holder, the vendor is a trustee for the purchaser, so as to oust judgment against the vendor intervening between the contract and conveyance.

A vendee who has paid the purchase money prematurely, has a lien against the vendor analagous to that of the vendor in the opposite case. 4 Mad., 503. 15 Vesey, 346. Lacon vs. Mertins, 3 Atkins, 1. Farmer vs. Samuel, 4 Litt., 190. Newman vs. Machin, 5 Hawyr., 241. Frink vs. McKeoun, 4 J. J. Marsh., 169. Bibb vs. Prather, 1 Bibb, 316. Finch vs. Earl of Winchelsea, 1 Pr. Wms., 278.

Although Williams had not, in fact, paid the purchase money, yet his note was assigned to a bona fide holder, and he was bound on it. He could not in the hands of Bellamy, make the same defence to it that he could in the hands of Roberts, unless received after it was due. There is, consequently, the soundest reason for holding that the transfer of the note to a bona fide holder, shall be considered as equivalent to the payment of the money so far as to fix the lien of the vendee prior and superior to a judgment between the contract and conveyance. And if this be so, a fortiori, a purchaser with notice should be ousted, since he does not occupy grounds as favorable as those upon which a creditor stands. It is believed to be a well settled principle that he who takes a conveyance of the legal title with notice of an outstanding equity, is in no better situation this his grantor was. McNitt vs. Logan, Littel's Selected Cases, 69. Mason vs. Sudam, 2 John, Ch., 181. Wadsworth vs. Wendall, 5 John. Ch., 229. Yoder vs. Smrope, 3 Bibb, 204. Simms vs. Richardson, 2 Litt., 276. Champion vs. Brown, 6 John Ch., 402.

Roberts having transferred the note given by Williams, stands in the position of a party who has been paid the purchase money, and Williams could come into a Court of Equity and establish his lien upon the land, notwithstanding its conveyance to Woods, who is a purchaser with notice, as will hereafter be shown. If Williams could do this, why may not Bellamy or his representative, who is the holder of the land note, be entitled to the same rights, and have the same equities enforced that Williams himself could? Instead of going immediately upon Williams, and Williams going upon the land, Bellamy or his representative, may reach the land through the equities of Williams. Riddle vs. Mandeville, 5 Cranch, 330. Russel 51 vs. Clark's Ex'rs., 7 Chanch. 69-97.

Roberts must be considered as a trustee for the purchaser, and Woods who took a conveyance with notice, stands in precisely the same condition, he not acquiring any greater or other rights than Roberts himself had. See cases above cited, Littel's Selected Cases, 69, &c.

II. The contract was not rescinded and could not have been rescinded unless both parties had agreed to it.

It is claimed in the answer of Woods, that Williams did not complete the contract—that he did not pay the money, and therefore Roberts had a right to consider the contract as rescinded. This could be done in the case between original parties where the rescision of the contract would leave them in statu quo.

No Court of Equity even, would upon the application of either party, rescind a contract where the parties could not be placed in their original position. Johnston's Heirs vs. Mitchell, 1 A. K. Marsh, 227. Turner vs. Clay, 3 Bibb, 53. Skinner vs. Dayton, 2 John. Ch., 533. Smith vs. Field, 5 Term. R., 403.

Now the parties here could not be placed in their original position. Williams' note was in the hands of an innocent holder, upon which he was bound. Roberts had received the amount of the purchase money, and if he desired to rescind the contract, he should have tendered this sum to Williams, or procured his note to be cancelled. It is not pretended that this was done or offered to be done.

III. Woods was a purchaser with notice.

He admits in his answer that he had knowledge of the contract with Williams, and of the subsequent agreement with Bellamy. He, however, insists that the contract was rescinded, &c.

The knowledge of the facts admitted by him was sufficient to charge him with notice. It was not necessary that he should have been fully acquainted with all the facts and circumstances. Whatever is sufficient to put a party on inquiry, is in equity held to be good notice to bind him. 1 Story Eq., S. 400. 4 Kent. Com., 179. 1 John. Ch., 261. Starry vs. Arden.

The admissions in the answer of Woods show that there was sufficient to put him on inquiry, and therefore, under the law, he is charged with notice, and he took the conveyance incumbered with all pre-existing equities.

There is, however, another and a very important aspect in which 52 this case is to be viewed.

Bellamy, when he took the Williams note, relied not only upon the responsibility of Williams, the maker, and Roberts, the endorser, but also upon the security which the land to be conveyed afforded. Roberts then may be regarded as a vendor to Bellamy, and one too, who had been paid the purchase money, for he had in point of fact received the purchase money from Bellamy. And if so, under the principles already cited, he was but a trustee to hold the legal title for Bellamy, and could not transfer it to any one. Woods, who took conveyance with notice of the facts, got nothing beyond the interest of Roberts in the land.

That Roberts himself looked upon the land as bound for the amount of the purchase money note, or that he regarded himself as a mere trustee, is obvious from the compromise agreement between himself and Bellamy, by which he agreed to release the land from the Bank and convey it to Bellamy within ninety days from its date.

It is, however, contended that this is a substantive agreement for a sale, and it having been proved that Roberts did procure a release and executed and tendered a conveyance to Bellamy, which was refused to be accepted, the contract should be considered as rescinded, and Roberts had a right to so consider it.

But it will be seen from the proofs that the release from the Bank was not procured within the time limited by the agreement, and the deed was not tendered—not even executed—until long after the time had elapsed.

The provision of the compromise agreement was gratuitous on the part of Bellamy, and was intended for the benefit of Roberts, who was to be finally released from all claims against him on the land note, provided he complied with the conditions attached. He failed in this respect, and Bellamy was consequently not in anywise bound to accept the conveyance which was tendered.

But it may be said that upon Bellamy's refusal to accept the deed, he virtually rescinded the contract, and Roberts had a right to convey to another. It is granted that the agreement of compromise was rescinded so far as this provision is concerned, but in that event, on what ground do the parties respectively stand? Why, they revert to their original position—they fall back upon their original rights, and 53 it is shown that Roberts, who had received the purchase money, was but a trustee for the purchaser. How could the rescision of the compromise agreement have the effect of enabling Roberts to convey to another? Were the parties left in statu quo? By no means. Roberts had received the purchase money and Bellamy and Williams had got nothing.

Woodward, on the same side.

PROPOSITIONS FOR APPELLEE.

I. The agreement between Roberts and Bellamy created a trust, which equity will preserve, either in a suit for specific performance, or for compensation in damages by vendee.

II. Equity will uphold a lien arising from an agreement in relation to land, maintaining between all parties the rights thereby acquired, and enforcing the obligations incurred.

III. Upon failure of vendor to perform an agreement in relation to land, equity will hold the land subject to the reimbursement of vendee, for the purchase price which he may have paid.

IV. Equity affords no indemnity or protection to a subsequent purchaser, with notice.

V. If an agreement in relation to land be rescinded, the purchase price having been prematurely paid, equity will, nevertheless, subject the land, in satisfaction to the superior prior lien of the first vendee.

As to parties in chancery.

All persons in interest must be parties to the suit, especially when their rights and interests are therein particularly complicated and involved, or their position an obstacle to its progress, and in conflict with a complainant's asserted claims.

Woods was a subsequent purchaser from Roberts, and in possession of the land in controversy, when the bill was filed; he is therefore, a proper party.

LANCASTER, J.

On the 15th day of November, 1844, John Bellamy, the intestate of complainant, filed his bill of complaint in the then Superior Court for Jefferson County, alleging the indebtedness to him of the defendant, Ransom J. Roberts, for large sums of money, on four several notes, as in his said bill is mentioned, amounting together to about $9,717 54. One of which said notes, he describes thus: "On a note dated Aucilla, 26th March, 1840, for $4,000, payable on the 1st of January, 1845, with interest at ten per cent. per annum from 1st of January, 1841, to the order of said Roberts, made by one W. H. Williams, as expressed in said note, for value received in land;" and endorsed on the 26th day of March, 1840, by said Roberts to said Bellamy, for value received, as expressed in said endorsement, and the payment of which Roberts guarantied to said Bellamy, and was responsible for and assigned said note as a security for cotton sold by Bellamy to him, said Roberts, and for which amount he was bound to Bellamy. The bill alleges that the defendant, Ransom J. Roberts, made a fraudulent disposition of his property on the 14th day of September, 1840, by making a fraudulent bill of sale of seventeen negroes in the bill named, to his brother, Elijah Roberts, who on the same day, gave to David Emanuel, a brother-in-law of said Ransom, a power of attorney to take charge of said negroes, and defend them against any other claimant; and that a few days thereafter, the said Ransom J. Roberts and the said Emanuel absconded secretly from Jefferson County, and from the Territory of Florida, taking with them all said negroes and other property mentioned in the bill. And the bill charges that all these fraudulent actings and doings were done with the fraudulent intent and purpose of de- 55

frauding the said Bellamy.

The bill further charges that the complainant gave chase after the said Roberts and the said Emanuel, and overtook them in the State of Alabama, where he caused said slaves and other property to be levied upon, arrested, attached and seized by the proper officer, as the property of said Ransom J. Roberts, and as liable for and bound for said debts; that a claim was interposed by said Emanuel, for and on behalf of Elijah Roberts, which was tried and found by a jury in favor of said Bellamy; that, thereafter, on the 2d day of October, 1842, an agreement of compromise was entered into by said Bellamy, and the said Ransom J. Roberts and Elijah Roberts, (the latter acting by his agent and attorney in fact,) by which the said Roberts acquiesced in the claim, as established in favor of said Bellamy, and also agreed that judgment should be rendered in favor of said Bellamy, in the suit he had instituted against Ransom J. Roberts, without defence, for the amount of the four several notes sued on, with legal taxed costs, together with other matters therein stated as agreed to, and which may be referred to hereafter.

The bill then says, the foregoing agreement was on the same 22d of October, 1842, "annulled and abrogated, and a conveyance of said slaves and other property was made, executed and delivered by said Ransom and said Elijah, (by his agent and attorney aforesaid,) in the words and figures following, viz:

"The bill further states, that "on the same day a final agreement of compromise in lieu of the above mentioned, was made between said Ransom and said Bellamy, which was signed and sealed by said Bellamy, and delivered by him to said Ransom, as follows, viz:

"State of Alabama, } Ss.
"County of Covington, }

"This indenture made this twenty-second day of October, Anno Domini 1842, between John Bellamy of the County of Jefferson, in the Territory of Florida, of the first part, and Ransom J. Roberts late of the same place, of the second part, witnesseth: Whereas said John, executor of Abram Bellamy, deceased, hath heretofore instituted three several suits by attachment in Dale County Circuit Court in said State, against said Ransom, et al., as by reference thereto will appear; and whereas said attachments were levied on seventeen slaves, and a road wagon and four mules, as the property of said Ranson, and claimed by Elijah Roberts, (by his agent and attorney in fact, David Emanuel,) and by consent, the claim was tried before the County Court of said County of Covington, and a verdict this day rendered, that the property was subject to said attachment, and a compromise and agreement made in said case, signed and sealed by said Ransom, and said Elijah, (by his agent,) and by said John, as by reference thereto, bearing even date herewith, and a copy whereof is in possession of the said parties to this indenture, will appear; and, whereas, in pursuance of said agreement, said Ransom and said Elijah have this day executed a conveyance of said slaves and other property to said John, which bears even date herewith, and is recorded in the Clerk's office of said County of Covington, and who delivered said 58 slaves and property to the said John; and whereas said Ransom hath also filed his written consent to judgment being entered in each of the said suits, at the next term of the Covington County Circuit Court, said suits being by consent transferred from Dale Court to Covington, in case a Court is held at Covington next week, and if not, the judgment to be entered at the next term of Dale Circuit Court, said judgments being entered with full release of errors, as by reference to the written consent filed in each of said cases will appear, which judgments all amount in the aggregate, besides costs, to about $9,717 54:

"Now, in order to carry out and fulfill the residue of the conditions and terms of said compromise, with such modifications as the parties thereto have since agreed upon, the said John binds himself to said Ransom J. Roberts, to transport and convey said slaves and property forthwith back to Jefferson County, Florida, and to keep the same in said County of Jefferson, according to the terms of said compromise, until otherwise agreed; and said John further binds himself to said Ransom to extend to said Ransom indulgence on said debts for five years from this date, he the said Ransom, paying the interest thereon at eight per cent. per annum, and payable annually, on the 22d of October in each year, to said John, and said slaves and their increase in the meantime remaining in the possession of said John, and as his property, under and by virtue of said conveyance; and said John binds himself, on full payment and satisfaction of said judgment debt, interest and costs at anytime within said five years, to sell, or assign, and reconvey to said Ransom, or to such person as he may appoint in writing, such of said slaves and their increase as may be then living; and said John binds himself to hire out said negroes at just and reasonable prices in Jefferson County, or if he uses them himself, to allow just and reasonable prices or hire for them, and which hire is to be annually, as the same hire becomes due, to be faithfully applied and appropriated to the discharge and payment of the interest and principal and costs of said judgments; and said John further agrees to give said Ransom the privilege and preference of hiring and taking said negroes on equal, reasonable terms with others, if said Ransom desires the same, the hire to be so appropriated and applied as aforesaid. And in order to aid in enabling said Ransom to pay said debts, said John further agrees that he will lease or sell to said Ransom, on fair and reasonable terms, sufficient lands in the 59 County of Jefferson aforesaid, whereon to reside and work the said slaves during said term, if said Ransom so desires; and said John further agrees that, on said Ransom giving a full, perfect and complete title to six hunderd acres of land in Jefferson County, sold by said Ransom to William H. Williams, to release said Ransom from his liability as endorser of said Williams' note, and upon the debt and interest of said judgment thereon entered—the incumbrance, of the Union Bank, and all others, to be however first discharged satisfied and taken off by said Ransom, and said conveyance by said Ransom for said lands to be either to said John, or to said Williams, in pursuance of said agreement between said Ransom and said Williams, dated March 26th, 1840, or otherwise, as said John may direct, so that said Wiliams may be compelled to pay said note, and said Ransom to make said conveyance, and discharge all incumbrances on said land, within ninety (90) days from the date hereof. At the expiration of said term of five years from this date, if any portion of said debt and costs are still unpaid, or any of said interest shall not be paid, sufficient of said slaves to pay the same are to be sold by said John at public auction in Monticello, Jefferson County, on thirty days' notice, and the proceeds taken to pay and satisfy the same; and if, after payment of all said debts, interest and costs, any of said slaves remain unsold, they are forthwith to be reconveyed and redelivered by said John, as hereinbefore stated; and if after such sale, there should be a portion of said debts, interests and costs remaining unpaid, said Ransom shall be still liable for the deficiency. The said John is to sell the said wagon and mules at fair prices, and credit the proceeds, after deducting reasonable expenses of transporing said slaves and property back to Jefferson County, Florida, on said judgments.

"In witness whereof, the said John Bellamy hath hereunto set his hand and affixed his seal, the day and year first above written, at Montezuma, Alabama.

"JOHN BELLAMY, [SEAL.]

"Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of us—

"JAMES D. WESTCOTT, JR.,
"JAMES P. STEEDLY,
"LEMUEL S. HARRELL."

The bill also charges that the note above mentioned, given by 60 William H. Williams to said Ransom, and by him assigned to said Bellamy, was given and made, as expressed on the face thereof, in consideration of certain lands in said County of Jefferson, containing six hundred acres; that said Ransom did not make any conveyance to said Williams of said lands, but made and delivered a written agreement or contract to said Williams, in the following words, viz: "I hereby agree to dispose of and deliver, on or before the 1st of December next to William H. Williams, Esq., fifty head of cattle, more or less, at five dollars per head, and fifty hogs, more or less, at one dollar each, five hundred bushels of corn, and some fodder of the crop, at market value, the delivery of the latter to be optional with William Williams. I hereby further agree to make out a clear title to the lands, and to hold myself responsible for all claims against it. (Signed,) Ransom J. Roberts, and dated Aucilla River, 26th March, 1840. Witnessed by John Walsh, and recorded the 19th of June, 1844."

The bill further alleges, that the time of ninety days mentioned in the agreement executed by said Bellamy to said Ransom J. Roberts, in which the said Ransom was to execute a conveyance and discharge all incumbrances on the land, was agreed upon and specified as a material and essential condition of said agreement, and to be part of the essence of the contract, because it was believed said Williams would come to Tallahassee about the first of January, 1843, as a member of the Legislature Council, and remain in said Middle District that month, and afford thereby an opportunity to said Bellamy, if the same was done in ninety days, of applying to Williams respecting the business, and inducing him to accept such conveyance and take the lands, and if he refused, of instituting proceedings in equity against him in said District to compel him to do so, and enforce the payment of said note by him, or effect a compromise with him.

The bill further charges that Bellamy requested said Ransom J. Roberts, after discharging all the incumbrances aforesaid, within the ninety days aforesaid, to make a title to said Williams and deliver it to said Bellamy or his counsel at Tallahassee, to tender it to Williams, and if he would accept, to deliver the same to him, and thereby make him liable and bound for said note, but that the said 61 Ransom entirely neglected and refused so to do within said time, or subsequently, and has not yet done the same according to his agreement. The bill further charges, that said agreement of Oct. 22d 1842, and Ransom's agreement with Williams of 26th March, 1840 were duly recorded, and all said premises were public and notorious in Jefferson County, and William J. Woods had due and legal notice thereof. Yet said Woods, on the 6th day of Nov., 1844, in consideration, as it is pretended by said Ransom and said Woods, of $2000 lawful money paid by said Woods to said Ransom for said land, took and received a conveyance of said 600 acres of land from said Roberts, and caused the same to be recorded in Jefferson County. And the bill charges that the deed was taken by Woods with full knowledge of all the premises, and was made and executed for the purpose and with the intent of defrauding said Bellamy and said Williams, and that the said deed is fraudulent, null and void, and should be set aside and declared null and void, and said Woods and said Ransom compelled to convey the same so as to fulfill the terms of the agreement between the said Ransom and Williams and Ransom and Bellamy.

The bill further charges, that Williams disputes and contests his liability on said note, especially since the conveyance to Woods, thereby destroying the ability of said Roberts to make him a title, and causing a failure of the consideration of said note; and the bill contends that both Williams and Roberts are bound and liable to said Bellamy to pay the amount of said note, principal and interest, when due; and notwithstanding said fraudulent conveyance by said Roberts to said Woods, the said Bellamy has a lien, and charge and equitable mortgage upon said lands, prior and superior to, and above and before said fraudulent conveyance. And the bill charges, that said land should be sold to satisfy said note and interest and costs and expenses, and if insufficient, that Williams and Roberts should both be held and bound to Bellamy for the deficiency.

John Bellamy, the complainant, died, and William Bailey, Adm'r de bonis non of said Bellamy deceased, filed his bill of revivor praying to be admitted as complainant, and was made a complainant, as the legal representative of John Bellamy, deceased. And none of the defendants having appeared or answered said bill except William J. Woods, an order for publication was obtained against them 62 and satisfactory proof being made to the Court, that a notice to appear and answer had been published against all the defendants except William J. Woods, according to the terms of the order for publication and agreeably to law, it was ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the original bill be taken as confessed against the said Ransom J. Roberts, Elijah Roberts, David Emanuel and Frances Williams, adm'rx of W. H. Williams, deceased, they having failed to appear and answer said original bill or to plead or demur thereto. The defendant William J. Wood answered, and admitted his purchase of the land mentioned in complainant's bill at the day, and for the sum named in the bill, and which was recorded as stated in the bill, but he says he purchased in good faith, for the legal and valuable consideration of $2000, which he actually and in good faith paid to said Roberts, partly in money and partly in good negotiable promissory notes, on good and solvent persons, which he considered equal to money—that at the time of the execution of said deed by said Roberts, before the filing of complainant's bill of complaint, this defendant in good faith, and without any knowledge on his part, of any legal or equitable claim in favor of any person or persons whatsoever in, to, or upon said land, paid as above stated for the same.

The defendant further states that he had heard from rumor only, that there had been an old contract in regard to the purchase of said lands by Wm. H. Williams, from said Roberts, but upon inquiry, he was informed and believed, and so charges, that at the time of his said purchase, it was null and void to all intents and purposes. That it was a notorious fact that Roberts had tendered Williams a deed, which Williams refused to accept, and Williams being insolvent, Roberts elected to abandon the contract with Williams, and did abandon it.

And further answering, this defendant saith, he had also heard from rumor only, before he purchased from Roberts, of the contract or agreement in complainant's bill mentioned, between said Roberts and complainant in regard to said land, but at the same time he was informed and believed, and so charges, that said agreement was also rescinded, and at the time of the purchase of said land by this defendant, was null and void. That said Roberts had done everything necessary on his part to be done, to complete said contract, and had at great costs and charges, sacrifice and trouble, paid off and discharged all 63 the incumbrances and liens on said land, and tendered in the presence of witnesses, a good and sufficient legal title to said land to said complainant Bellamy, clear of all incumbrances and liens, in pursuance of the agreement between said Roberts and said Bellamy, and that said Bellamy refused to accept said title so tendered to him, and refused to have anything further to do with said lands, and disclaimed repeatedly, in the presence of divers good citizens of Jefferson County, that he had any claim, title, interest, or lien, in, to, or upon said land, and that he never intended to have anything more to do with it, and said Roberts did then elect to abandon said contract with said Bellamy, as he had a right to do under the circumstances. This defendant denies positively that the deed of said land made by Roberts to him, was made and received for the purpose and with the intent, to defraud said Bellamy and said Williams, or any body else, but avers it was made in good faith, and for the valuable consideration aforesaid. And he denies all the charges and imputations contained in said bill against him, of combination on the part of this defendant, with said Roberts or any one else, for the purpose of defrauding, injuring, or vexing the said complainant or any one else. And afterwards a decree was entered by consent of complainant's solicitor and the solicitor of said Woods, and it was ordered, among other things, that said defendant Woods have leave to file his amended answer. And in pursuance of said consent decree, said defendant Wood filed his amended answer, by way of demurrer, in short, relying upon the statute which allows defendants to insist upon any matter of demurrer in their answer, and insisting among other things, that said bill should be dismissed, because the same wants equity apparent upon the face of it, and because the same does not set up any claim, right, title or interest in equity, or any equitable lien to the land of this defendant bought of said Roberts.

And by way of plea under said statute this defendant insists that said Roberts offered to said Bellamy a deed of conveyance in fee simple, a copy of which is filed with this answer, and which deed convey a good and valid fee simple, unincumbered title to said Bellamy, which he refused to accept before the purchase of said lands by this defendant.

There are many other matters contained in the original bill of complaint, not herein set down or noticed, but all is contained in the 64 foregoing statement, which is believed to have relation to the controversy between complainant and the defendant W. J. Woods, who are the only parties litigant before the Court.

It is in proof by two witnesses in this cause, that on the 1st day of June, 1843, they tendered and read to John Bellamy, the original complainant in this suit, a deed of conveyance from Ransom J. Roberts to said Bellamy for a certain tract of land, containing 600 acres —that the said Bellamy refused to accept said deed, saying he would take the land for its worth, and that the land was not worth the money mentioned in the deed, say $4000. It is also in proof that R. J. Roberts filed with the clerk of Jefferson County Court on the 17th February, 1843, for record, a deed of release from the Union Bank to said Roberts, which deed bears date the same day it was received and filed. The cause came on afterwards to be heard, so far as the defendant William J. Woods is concerned, upon the bill, answer and exhibits, and after argument of counsel and time for consideration taken by the Court, "it was ordered and decreed that the said complainant has a lien and charge upon the land mentioned in said bill of complaint, and that the same is in equity prior and superior to, and above and before the conveyance by said Roberts to said Woods, to the extent of the balance due to said complainant from Ransom J. Roberts, on the note given by said Williams to said Ransom, and by him transferred to complainant's intestate, amounting, in the aggregate, with interest, to the present term, to $3,809 77-100.

"And it is further ordered and decreed, that the said conveyance from said Ransom J. Roberts to said William J. Woods for said land, dated the fifth day of November, 1844, mentioned in said bill, though valid between the parties, be, and the same is hereby set aside, as far as claim of complainant is concerned.

"And it is further ordered and decreed, that the land described in said deed, to wit: The southwest quarter of the northeast quarter, the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter, the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter, the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter, the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter, the east half of the northeast quarter, the east half of the northwest quarter, the east half of the southwest quarter, the west half of the southeast quarter, and the east half of the southeast quarter, all in section two, of township two, range five, north and east, in the district of land subject to sale at Tallahassee, containing about six hundred acres, more or less, be sold by the sheriff of Jefferson County, after giving public notice of the time and place of sale, said notice to be, as in cases of sales under execution at law, the proceeds of which sale to be applied to the amount so ascertained to be due as aforesaid.

"And it is further ordered and decreed, that defendant Woods, pay the costs of the said sale and of this decree, and the depositions and other proceedings connected therewith.

THOMAS BALTZELL, Judge.

"November 8th, 1849."

From which decree the defendant, Woods, appealed to this Court, And here contends that the complainant's intestate, John Bellamy, does not in this bill, set up any claim, right, title or interest in equity or any equitable lien to the land, which he, defendant, bought of Ransom J. Roberts, and that the decree of the Court below is erroneous. The agreement for the conveyance of land by the defendant Ransom J. Roberts to W. H. Williams, whose legal representative is also sought to be made a defendant, evpresses no time at which the conveyance was to be made, and the vendee, Williams, had a right to have a title at any time on demand. As Roberts ought, therefore, to have made him the title, equity will consider it as done, 2 Story Eq. Jur., Sec. 792. The agreement for title bears date 26th March, 1840, and on that day Williams executed his note to Roberts, or order, for the sum of $4000, payable on the 1st January, 1846, with interest at ten per cent. per annum from 1st January, 1841, for value received in land. As no other security but the note of Williams was taken for payment of the purchase money, according to all the authorities except in the case reported in Ambler, page 724, and a few others following its lead, and which have been repeatedly overruled, the vendor's lien attached in favor of Roberts and that lien in equity is said by Chancellor Wallworth to be admitted to exist everywhere in England and the United States, where there is a Court of Chancery to give effect to such a lien. 1 Paige Ch. R., 24.

On the day of the date of said note it was, as the bill alleges, endorsed, for value received by Roberts, the payee, to John Bellamy, the original complainant in this suit, who the bill alleges, guarantied and held himself responsible for payment thereof to Bellamy, the endorsee or assignee; whereby the said Bellamy claims in his said bill to have a lien, charge, and equitable mortgage upon said lands, prior and superior to the title of Woods, derived through his conveyance from Roberts. Whether the vendor's lien under any circumstances is transferred to the assignee of the vendor, is a question which, though much discussed up to a comparatively late period, appears not to have been settled in England. See 1 Page Ch. R., 26-7. It may be here observed, however, that by the endorsement of the note to Bellamy, and the guarantee alleged in the bill to have been taken by him of Robert's individual responsibility, to say the least, a disposition on his, Bellamy's part, to rely on the vendor's lien, if in contemplation of equity assigned to him, does not appear very manifest, but it seems to have been his intention to have the personal responsibility both of vendor and vendee, as well as the tacit, equitable lien on the lands, with which to secure himself in the payment of the note—whether he can do this, remains to be seen,

The bill sets up, that afterwards, Roberts, with others, fled and absconded from Florida, with all his negroes and other enumerated property; that he was pursued by Bellamy, who overtook him in the State of Alabama, and instituted legal proceedings against him, on the note asigned to him by Roberts, as well as other notes; that proceedings were thereon had, by which he brought Roberts to a compromise on the 22d October, 1842, by which compromise Roberts agreed to confess judgment in the State of Alabama, on all the demands which Bellamy had against him, and that judgments were actually rendered in favor of said Bellamy in said State against said Roberts in three several suits—one of which was on his endorsement of the note, in this opinion referred to, and was for the sum of $4,722 19, with interest thereon at eight per cent. per annum from the 22d October, 1842, till paid, and costs. And that on the same day, a final agreement or compromise was made between the parties Bellamy and Roberts, by which Roberts conveyed to him seventeen negroes, &c., for and in consideration of ten thousand dollars, admitted to have been received by said Roberts from said Bellamy, which conveyance was signed by the said Roberts, and on the same day Bellamy executed to said Roberts an indenture which recognizes that the conveyance of the slaves, &c., as above, was made in consideration of the judgments so by consent to be given to said Bellamy—one of which is on Roberts's endorsement on the note of Williams to him—and all of which judgments, together besides costs, amount to the sum of about $9,717 54. That indenture binds said John Bellamy to extend time for payment to said Roberts, for all said debts for five years from its date, and making further provision for the transportation of the slaves and other property back to Florida, and for disposition of it by hire, sale, &c., it says, in order to enable said Ransom to pay said debts, said Bellamy agrees that he will lease him lands, &c., and further agrees that on said Roberts giving a full, perfect and complete title to the 600 acres land in Jefferson County, sold by him to Williams, to release said Roberts from his liability as endorser of said Williams' note, and upon the debt and interest of said judgment entered thereon, "incumbrances first to be removed, and the conveyance to be either to Bellamy or to Williams, or otherwise as Bellamy may direct," so that said Williams may be compelled to pay said note; and said Roberts to make said conveyance, and discharge all incumbrance on said land within ninety days from the date of the indenture. The indenture further provides, that at the expiration of five years from its date, if any portion of said debt, interest, and costs remains unpaid, negroes shall be sold to pay it; if any remain unsold, they are to be reconveyed to Roberts, but if all are sold and there remains a portion of said debts, interests, costs unpaid, the said Ransom J. Roberts shall be still liable for the deficiency.

We think the plain, unequivocal effect and result of these proceedings is, that by taking judgments on these claims in the State of Alabama, and the conveyance of the slaves, &c., thereon, in the nature of a mortgage, (the indenture of Bellamy to Roberts giving to the transaction that effect,) Bellamy thereby plainly indicated his intention to rely on that mortgage as a security for the whole of his debts, &c., and in the event that was insufficient, then to rely on the personal responsibility of Roberts for the residue. That this was intended, seemes inevitable—or else why extend the time of payment on the Williams note, which would be due on the 1st of January, 1845, as in favor of Roberts' endorsement thereon, for the term of almost three years longer? or why consolidate the judgments obtained on Roberts' endorsement of that note with the judgments obtained on other notes, and take a joint security by mortgage for the whole? In order to enable Roberts to pay these debts, it was stipulated, if Roberts would discharge the incumbrances on the lands sold to Williams, and make a good title thereof to Bellamy or Williams, or otherwise as Bellamy might direct, within ninety days from the date. that Bellamy would release him from his endorsement on the Williams note, and from the debt and interest of the judgment entered thereon. It appears by the proofs in this case, that on the 17th of January, 1843, less than ninety days after the 22d October, 1842, Roberts filed in the Union Bank, in substitution for the mortgage which the Bank held on the lands in controversy in the suit, a security which was deemed satisfactory to the Bank, and it thereafter executed a release to him of his mortgage, which was filed for record in the Clerk's office for Jefferson County on the 17th February, 1843, and that thereafter he tendered a deed of said land to said Bellamy on the 1st day of June, 1843, who declined taking it, and refused to accept it, saying he would not give the consideration therein of $4000, but was willing to give what it was worth. No objection was here raised that the incumbrances was not removed, or any defect suggested as to the tenor or execution of the deed, nor yet was any thing said as to the time being too late, but only the price was too much.

Bellamy, in his bill, alleges, that time was of the essence of his contract with Roberts, in regard to this conveyance, because about the 1st of January, 1743, Williams was expected at Tallahassee to attend the Legislative Council, and he could then see him and compel him to take land, or sue him in Middle Florida if he refused, or compromise with him. It is not alleged that Williams did come at the expected time, or that Bellamy was injured by the delay; no damage is stated in the bill, but only it is urged that time was of the essence of the contract. In Story Eq. Jur., Sec. 776, it is laid down as true, that Courts of Equity have regard to time so far as it respects the good faith and dilligence of the parties. But if circumstances of a reasonable nature have disabled the party from a strict compliance, or he comes recenti facto, to ask for a specific performance, the suit is treated with indulgence and generally with favor by the Court.

We cannot see in this, bad faith on the part of Roberts; he did, as soon as he reasonably could, all that was necessary, to invest Bellamy with an unincumbered, legal, valid title to these 600 acres of land in controversy, which title Bellamy refused to accept, and he, Roberts, might, thereupon, with propriety, perhaps, have gone into a Court of Equity, and tendering the conveyance, might have compelled Bellamy to release to him the whole amount of the judgment and interest obtained by Bellamy in the State of Alabama, on and by reason of his, Roberts' endorsement on the Williams note. Or he might as he appears to have done, have abandoned that contract and obligation of Bellamy to him, in which last event no objection is perceived, so far as Bellamy's interest is concerned, to his selling to any purchaser he might meet.

To return to the consideration of the security by mortgage taken by Bellamy from Roberts in the State of Alabama on the 22d of October, 1842. It seems proper to remark, that the lands are not mortgaged or named or recognized as under lien to Bellamy, nor does the transaction which there took place, in the direct conveyance by Roberts to Bellamy, or in his indenture explanatory of the transaction given to Ransom J. Roberts, state or shew, that the conveyance or mortgage was given by Roberts or received by Bellamy, as an additional or further security for the whole or any part of said judgment debts, but on their face appear to be the entire security taken to secure payment of the whole debt. Whether by the endorsement of vendor, and his guarantee of payment of Williams' note, he gave or transferred to Bellamy the vendor's tacit or equitable lien, comes now to be more particularly considered.

In the case of Francis vs. Hazleriggs, Executor, it was held, where the vendor gave a conveyance and took a bond for the purchase money, in which a third person joined as security, there was no lien upon the land. Hardin's R., 48. And in the case of Bradford, administrator, et al. vs. Marvin and Martin, 2 Flor. R., 463, this Court expressly recognize the same doctrine. Authorities to the same effect might be multiplied. Now what, let it be asked, supposing Bellamy invested with the vendor's lien, by virtue of the endorsement of Roberts' is Roberts guarantee to him, but an agreement of Roberts to become security for the payment of the amount of the note by Williams to Bellamy? Bellamy being supposed then in the position to claim the vendor's lien, as against Williams, takes the additional security of Roberts' responsibility—but this in equity, as we have seen, defeats the tacit lien. In the case of White vs.
70 Williams, 1 Paige Chancery Reports, 506, Chancellor Wallworth says, "The claim of a complainant for a specific lien on the premises, upon the ground that his judgment was obtained on a note given for a part of the purchase money, cannot be sustained. At the time he bought the note of Kingsbury, the latter had unquestionably such a lien, but it is not pretended that there was any agreement that such lien should be transferred to the complainant." And again: "But I am not aware of any case, where the assignee of the note, or other security, has been permitted to sustain such a claim, on an implied agreement to assign the lien." Again: "I am satisfied that the sale and prosecution of the note to judgment, in the name of the endorsee, must be considered as a waiver of the original implied lien for the purchase money on the land." This authority of high respectability appears much in point and we might, with great safety, rely on it as precedent conclusive of this case. But we feel inclined to enquire, supposing we are mistaken, and that the vendor's lien may be transferred tacitly to his assignee, whether in this case there has not been a waiver, or abandonment of it. The rule, as laid down in Fish vs. Howland, 1 Paige Ch. R., 30, is "to sustain the equitable or implied lien, whenever the vendor has taken the mere personal security of the purchaser only, and to consider any bond, note or covenant given by the vendee alone, as intended only to countervail the receipt of the purchase money contained in the deed, or to show the time and manner in which the payment is to be made, unless there is an express agreement between the parties to waive the equitable lien. And on the other hand, to consider the lien as waived, whenever any security is taken on the land or otherwise, for the whole or any part of the purchase money; unless there is an express agreement that the equitable lien on the land shall be retained, the lien is lost." The Chancellor says: "This constitutes a safe rule, easily understood, and which I consider established by weight of authority in this country is not easily shaken." This Court, in the case before referred to, 2 Florida R., 471, say, quoting from 4th Kent's Commentaries, 152-3—"Taking a note, bill or bond, with distinct security, or taking the distinct security by itself, either in the shape of real personal property from the vendee, or taking the responsibility of the third person, is evidence that the seller did not repose on the lien, but upon independent security; and it discharges the lien. 71 and taking deposit of stock discharges the lien."

If, therefore, we were to consider that, by the assignment of Williams' note to Bellamy, he became tacitly invested with the implied lien, which Roberts, the original vendor, had upon the lands sold by him to Williams, the vendee, yet it would be no stronger in his hands, than in the hands of Roberts; and we have seen that the taking a distinct, seperate security discharges the lien. And there was no express agreement originally to transfer the lien to Bellamy, nor yet, any agreement when Bellamy took the separate security, that he should either have or retain any equitable lien on the lands.

Nor will the complainant's case be better, by considering that Roberts held the legal title, to secure the payment of the purchase money; for if so, then Bellamy, as assignee, to have that lien, ought to have had the title conveyed to himself; for equity will not force it out of the vendor, (the purchase money being due,) for less than the sum it secured. But we have seen when that was offered him, he refused it; and he shows, both by his bill and his statement at the time the deed was tendered him, that he did not consider the lands a sufficient security for the amount of Williams' note; for he says in the bill $2,000 are as much as they are worth, and at the tender he says that they were not worth $4,000; and yet at that time the note, with its interest, was worth near $5,000. He, Bellamy, has shown by his bill, that he took a distinct, seperate, substantive security from Roberts for the amount of the judment which he had obtained against him in Alabama, on his, Roberts', endorsement of said note, for its full amount, with the interest then due; and unless there had been (which is not alleged) a distinct agreement he should keep that note as collateral security, the property of it was no longer in him, and Roberts, the endorser, was entitled to the possession, and it ought to have been restored to him. There is also reason to suppose that Bellamy himself either never thought of, or did not rely on the vendor's lien, until a short period before he filed his bill in this case; for Roberts' agreement to convey to Williams was never recorded until the 19th day of June, 1844, and then by the request of Bellamy's counsel, and without proof of its execution.

The opinion of the Court is, that the demurrer of the defendant. William J. Woods, to the bill of complaint filed in this cause, is well taken, that the bill on its face sets up no right, title, or interest in 72 equity, or an equitable lien to the land in controversy, in favor of the complainant and appellee, and that the judgment and decree rendered therein, as against the defendant, William J. Woods, is erroneous:

It is therefore, considered, ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the decre of the Circuit Court, rendered on the 8th of November, 1849, and entered of record on the 23d day of November, in the year last aforesaid, be, and the same is hereby, reversed, annulled and set aside, in all things therein contained; and it is further ordered and decreed, that the said bill, so far as the same relates to the defendant, William J. Woods, be dismissed, and that he go thereof without delay, and that he recover his costs, &c.

Per Curiam.

OSCAR FILLYAU, AND ADNA, HIS WIFE, APPELLANTS, VS. HENRY LAVERTY, APPELLEE.

When a bill is filed by a creditor of a partnership against the representatives of a deceased partner, the surviving partned being interested in taking an account, should be made a party.

In equity, partnership debts are joint and several, and the creditors of a partnership may proceed at law against a surviving partner; and in equity, against the estate of the deceased partner, whether the survivor is insolvent, or not; and they may, at their option, do the one or the other.

The statute which bars all debts and demands of whatsoever nature against the estate of any testator or intestate, unless the same shall be exhibited within two years to the executor or administrator, provided the executor or administrator gives the notice required by said statute, prescribes a rule which must be rigidly observed. It is, in effect, a statute of limitations passed for the security of the personal representative—for the benefit of the heirs and distributees, and intended to effect a speedy and final settlement of estates. This statute requiring the exhibition by a creditor of his debt or demand within two years from the time of the granting of letters of testamentary or of administration, is as obligatory in a Court of Chancery as at law.

There should be actual presentation of the claim within the time prescribed, or something done equivalent to it; but the presentation need not be in any particular form. The object is to give notice of the existence of the demand. The bringing of a suit would be sufficient.

Debts not due, as well as those due, are required to be presented.

73 Appeal from decree of the Circuit Court of the County of Gadsden, pronounced by the Hon. THOMAS BALTZELL, Judge of the Middle Circuit, at the Fall Term, 1849.

Henry Laverty, who was complainant in the Court below, on the 3d day of June, 1844, filed his bill against Banks Meacham, administrator, and Oscar Fillyau and Adna his wife, heirs and distributees of William D. Harrison, deceased, to recover of his estate the amount of a partnership debt of the said Harrison and one Wilder, who were in the life-time of Harrison, partners in trade. This partnership debt was evidenced by the following note, viz:

"New York, March 23, 1836.

"$1,975 22-100. Twelve months after date, we promise to pay to the order of Laverty, Cutter & Co., nineteen hundred and seventy-five twenty-two one-hundredths dollars, Value received.

(Signed.) HARRISON & WILDER."

This note was endorsed by Laverty, Cutter & Co., the payees, to the appellee.

Wilder, the surviving partner of the firm of Harrison & Wilder, was sued at law on the note, and judgment was recovered against him on the 8th day of December, 1840, for the sum of $2,487 89-100, in the Superior Court of Franklin County.

The bill represents that writs of execution were sued out by complainant against William H. Wilder, to obtain satisfaction for said judgment, but that neither complainant nor the ministerial officers of said Court had been able to find any effects of the said Wilder, or of the said firm of Harrison & Wilder, in the hands of the said Wilder, or any other person, with which to satisfy said judgment in whole or in part, and that said writs had been returned "No property found."

On the 14th of September, 1844, the defendant, Meacham, filed his plea of discharge from his said administration, which was, on the 19th July, 1847, after argument, overruled, and the case ordered to stand over for his answer, which was subsequently filed.

Fillyau and wife filed their answer on the 13th of September, 1844.

This cause was argued in July, and the decree was pronounced at the last Fall Term of Gadsden Circuit Court, ordering the payment by the defendants, Fillyau and wife, of the appellee's demand, and dismissing the bill as to defendant, Meacham.

74 The answer of Meacham insists that Wm. H. Wilder, named in complainant's bill as survivor of the firm of Harrison & Wilder, should have been made a defendant, and the answers of all the defendants admit the existence of said firm at the time of the date of the note. March the 23d, 1836, and that Harrison died in May of the same year. But they set up as a defence to the claim of complainants against the estate of Harrison, that letters of administration were granted to defendant, Meacham, on the 16th day of July, 1836, and that he did, in accordance with the requisitions of the statute in such case made and provided, entitled an "Act concerning wills, letters testamentary, letters of administration, and the duties of executors, administrators, &c.," by advertisement, dated July 23d, 1836, published in a newspaper, give notice to all persons having any claims against the estate of Wiliam D. Harrison, deceased, to present the same within the time prescribed by law, or that the recovery of the same would be forever barred; that this notice was duly published for the time required by law, and that no claim or demand was ever presented to the administrator by complainant, or by the said Laverty, Cutter & Co., or by any other person for them, or either of them, against the estate of said Harrison, at any time within two years (the time required by law) from the taking out of said letters of administration. Several other matters of defence were also set up and relied upon by defendants in the Court below; but those already stated are believed to be the points presented for the consideration and judgment of this Court.

Thompson, for appellant:

As to the first point, William H. Wilder, the surviving partner, is a necessary party, who should have been joined as interested in taking the account, although no decree could be had against him. It is believed there is no conflict of authority on this point. It is in conformity with the general rule of equity pleading, that all persons who are or may be interested should be joined. Story on Partnership, 515. Story Eq. Pl., 157. Wilkinson vs. Henderson, 1 Mylne & K., 582, 588. Holland vs. Prior, ibid, 237, 340. Devaynes vs. Noble, 1 Meri., 539, 572. Pierson vs. Robertson, 3 Swanst., 139. Nelson vs. Hill, 5 How. S. C. R., 127.

But the other and most important point we present, is, the statute of non-claim for two years provided by the 39th section of the act of 75

November 20, 1828.

The provisoin os, "that all debts and demands of whatsoever nature against the estate of any testator or intestate which shall not be exhibited within the said two years shall forever afterwards be barred." The only saving is as to femes covert, infants, persons of unsound mind, or without the United States, in the military or naval service thereof during war. Thomp. Dig., 206.

The condition on which the bar is made to depend is, that the Executor or Administrator give notice in some Gazette for four weeks, that the bar will be enforced unless the claim or demand be exhibited within the period of two years limited. Idem.

The notice in this case was published in strict conformity with the statute.

Administration was granted to the defendant, Meacham, on the 16th July, 1836, and the first publication of the notice to creditors was on the 23d July, 1836.

The first notice of the present claim is alleged by the complainant in his bill to have been made after the return of nulla bona on the fieri facias issued against Wilder upon the judgment in Franklin County, which appears from the record filed to have been in December, 1841; then he charges, that "he made known to defendant, Meacham, the existence of the claim and demanded payment."

If this had been done immediately upon the return of the fieri facias, it would have been more than five years after the grant of administration, and therefore, too late; but we contend that there was no legal notice of the claim until the 3d June, 1844, when the present bill was filed.

The statute requires the "exhibition" of the debt or demand, and it is conceived means something more than saying to an administrator: "I have a claim against the estate you represent, and demand payment."

To exhibit, in ordinary parlance, means to produce, show offer to view; and I am not aware of any technical signification different from this. It would, therefore, seem, that something more than the mere assertion of a claim or demand is requisite; the evidence of the debt or demand, or some specific statement of the character, origin, and extent of the claimant's demand, should have been presented to the administrator. This, we say, there is no evidence of, save by 76
the filing of this bill nearly eight years after the grant of administration

The letter of Meacham produced in evidence by the complainant, in answer to the alleged demand, shews, that the demand so called, contained no notice of the character of the claim made upon him.

It being conceded that the notice to creditors was duly given, and the complainant not alleging a presentment or exhibtion of the demand within the time limited, and not bringing himself within the protection of the saving clause, the question is, can this claim or demand be now enforced in this suit?

Our statute acts upon "all debts and demands," against the estate of the deceased; more comprehensive terms, it is conceived, could not well be employed to express the intention of the Legislature.

"Debt" is a word of known signification, and is used in law to express a sum of money due upon any contract, express or implied—'Demand" is a term still more comprehensive, and embraces a right of action beyond those which can be properly called debts. In re Denny vs. Manhattan Co., 2 Hill N. Y., 228.

As a release of suits is more large than quarrels or actions; so, a release of demands is more large and beneficial than either of them. 2 Jacob Law Dict., 238.

But the class of debts and demands intended to be covered by the statute is still further described by the addition of the phrase "of whatsoever nature"—words of still more comprehensive import; as if the Legislature intended, as no doubt they did, to exclude the idea that there did, or should exist, any debts or demands which should form exceptions to the general rule laid down.

This section of the act of 1828, has never been directly before this Court for adjudication, but in the case of Gilchrist, Judge, &c., vs. Fillyau, it was incidently considered in the determination of the question of the right of a bond creditor to sue the heir at law, and with which it seemed to be entirely connected, and to that case we refer for a portion of our argument. 2 Florida Rep., 98.

The statute is considered by this Court to be one of repose, and to be as equally available to the heir or distributee, to the executor or administrator. And in this view, the decision is in accordance with the decisions of all the State Courts in which similar statutes have been adopted, and to which reference will hereafter be made.

77 This view, in our opinion, is fortified by reference to the 38th section of the act of November 20th, 1828, which immediately precedes, and seems to be intimately connected with, the one under discussion.

The 38th section allows the executor or administrator the period of six months within which to arrange the trust fund committed to his charge, and to ascertain the claims upon it, without let or hindrance from legatee or distributee. After that time he may be compelled to pay legacies and make distribution of the estate, provided the legatees or distributees shall give bond and security to refund a due portion of any debt or demand which may afterwards appear against the estate, and all costs which may be awarded on the same: Provided, that such debt or demand appear within two years from the grant of letters.

Now, suppose the estate distributed immediately after the lapse of six months, and the distributees had given bonds to refund according to the requisition of the statute, and no debt or demand should be exhibited until after the two years had elapsed—could any recovery be had upon the bond according to the provision of the 38th section, unless the creditor should bring himself within some one of the clauses of the saving?

Clearly not, for the undertaking of the distributee was to pay a due proportion only of such debts or demands as might be exhibited within the two years, and none were so exhibited. So, it would seem, if the legatee or distributee is unwilling or unable to give the bond and security provided for, he may leave his legacy or distributive share in the hands of the executor till the period of limitation elapses, and then demand and receive it—for all claims not then exhibited, are barred by the statute.

From this, it would appear, that the protection of those entitled to the estate as legatees or distributees is one of the principal objects of the statute; and it also serves to make the creditor vigilant, and by early exhibition and prosecution of his claim insure a faithful and diligent action of the representative. Vigilantibus non dormientibus, leges subveniunt.

It was argued for the complainant in the Circuit Court, that the statute did not include a debt or demand of the character of that sued upon here, because, as it was alleged, the claim was a mere equitable one, and did not arise, or accrue, until after the surviving part-78 ner had been pursued at law, and until after the expiration of the limitation of two years.

To this we reply: 1. We contend, that the right of suit or action, as well as claim, accrued on the maturity of the note against the estate of William D. Harrison, deceased.

We hold it to be the law, settled by weight of authority, that a partnership debt is, in equity, joint and several; and that on the death of one partner, his executors or administrators may be sued without resorting to the survivor, and without the allegation of his insolvency. Collyer on Part., (new ed.,) 526, Book 3, Ch. 3, Sec. 4, § 576. Story on Part., 513, 514, 515. Bissett on part., 150, 151. 3 Kent. Comm., (4th ed.,) 65. Braithwaite vs. Britain, 1 Keen R., 206. Thorp vs. Jackson, 2 You. and Coll., 553. Nelson vs. Hill, 5 Hon. S. C. Rep., 127.

We admit there are American cases which seem to support the views of the counsel opposed to us, and which influenced the Judge below in his decision; but it will be seen that a majority of these cases were decided upon what was then understood to be the doctrine of the English Courts of Equity. And when we advert to the fact that the establishment of the right of a creditor to resort to the estate of a deceased partner is one of, comparatively, modern date, we may expect contrariety of opinion during the progress of formation, and until finally settled.

An examination of the English cases will show some diversity of opinion both as to the principle and the reason upon which it was placed.

The first case is that of Lane vs. Williams, decided in Trin. T., 1693, and we presume from the date, by Ld. Keeper Somers. In this case the Court declared the joint debt to be a charge, in equity against both partners and their separate estates; nothing is said about the necessity of the surviving partner being insolvent, although it appears that he was so. 2 Vern. R., 292.

The same case is reported as having been decided by the Ld. Commrs. Rawlinson and Hutchins, in Mich. T., 1692; and from Mr. Raithby's note it appears that the executor of the deceased partner had taken a bond of idemnity from the survivor against all demands arising from the partnership, and which seems from the decree to have influenced the decision of the Court. 2 Vernon R., 277.

Fillyau and wife vs. Laverty.—Argument of Counsel.

The next case is that of Heath vs. Percival, decided in 1720 by 79
Ld. Cr. Macclesfield, where, although the surviving partner was insolvent, that circumstance did not seen to enter into the reason of the Court for the judgment that the debt should be paid out of the estate of the deceased partner. 1 Peere., Willm., 682.

In Bishop vs. Church, decided by Ld. Hardwick in 1751, the survivor had never been sued at all, although the creditor had been desired to sue him and get in his money. The Court held he was not bound to do so, although in this case the learned Chancellor held that the right to resort to the estate of the deceased was an equity which may be rebutted by circumstances, such as laches or collision 2 Vesey Sr., 100, 371.

In Hoare vs. Contencin, which was decided by Lord Thurlow in 1779; he doubted the equitable right to proceed against the property of a deceased partner. 1 Bro. Ch. Ca., 27.

In Ex parte Kendall, decided in 1811, Lord Eldon expresses his surprise that where parties think proper to enter into a joint, instead of a joint and several contract, that Courts of Equity have not left that to its fate as a joint contract, and says it is an equity, subject, however, to many considerations. 17 Vesey, Jr., 518.

But in the case of Devaynes vs. Noble, the Master of the Rolls, (Sir Wm. Grant,) reviews all the preceding cases, and deduces the doctrine from them, that in equity, all joint contracts are joint and several. And he scouts the idea that the previous pursuit by all possible diligence to obtain payment from the survivors, was the condition upon which a resort to the estate of the deceased partner was allowed—and this for obvious reasons stated by him. Decided in 1816. 1 Merivale R., 562, 569.

This case was affirmed on appeal by Lord Brougham in 1831, who takes a distinction between mercantile and other joint contracts. 13 Eng. Chan. R., 114, 115.

The case of Devaynes and Noble was afterwards in 1833 fully recognized and acted upon in Wilkinson vs. Henderson, by Sir John Leach, M. R. In this case the defence was, that there had been no effort to recover the sum due from the surviving partner—the Court held, he was not compelled to pursue him in the first instance, but might at once resort to the estate of the deceased. 7 Eng. Ch'y R., 176, 177.

This case was followed by that of Thorp vs. Jackson, decided by 80 the very able bench of the Court of Exchequer, sitting in equity, M. Baron Alderson pronouncing the judgment of the Court, fully sustaining the previous cases of Devaynes vs. Noble, and Wilkinson vs. Henderson. 2 Young & Collyer R., 553.

The late Justice Story, in the case of Van Reimsdyk vs. Kane, 1 Gallison R., 371, which was decided in 1812, held that such a suit must expressly charge the insolvency of the survivor, but we find his more recent opinion in his Comm. on the Law of Partnership. He says very decidedly, that the doctrine that the joint creditor had no claim in equity, except when the survivor is insolvent, has been overturned; and is now held that partnership debts are joint and several in equity, and that creditors may at once proceed against the representatives of the deceased partner, whether the survivors are, or are not, solvent. Story Comm. on Part, 514.

This doctrine has been fully recognized and acted upon in the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Nelson et al. vs. Hill. 5 How. S. C. Reps., 127.

Some of the cases decided in New York determine that a creditor may come into equity upon the insolvency of the survivor, but do not hold that the insolvency is essential. Jenkins vs. Degroot, 1 Caines' Cases in Error, 122. Hammersley vs. Lambert, 2 John. Ch. R. 508.

In the late case of Laurence vs. The Leake Orphan House, decided by the Court of Errors of that State it is held that the insolvency is essential, but it will be seen, upon examination, that it was a case of fraud of peculiar character, and it was necessary so to determine, to avoid the general act of limitations. The Court held it an equitable right, and which would only be barred by the statute of limitations, as to equitable rights of ten years. The decision professes to be based upon the earlier English cases, but if we are not mistaken as to the effect of those decisions, the learned Court in New York certainly was. 2 Denio R., 577.

It may be as well to remark here, that there is no statute in New York similar to our statute of non-claim.

In the discussion of the case at bar before the Court below, this statute (39th section act of November 20, 1828,) so shocked the sense of propriety of the learned judge, that he declared his very great indisposition to give any effect to it, if it could be avoided.

Fillyau and wife vs. Laverty.—Argument of Counsel.

81 His honor compared it with the statute of Missouri, from which he was of the opinion it had been copied, with some alterations; and which alterations, by shortening the period for exhibitions of claims, had disturbed the harmony of the general system of limitations, and had deviated from the correct policy of the law in this particular, and ought not to have been passed.

Entertaining these views, it is not surprising that the learned judge below adopted the decision of the Supreme Court of Connecticut, in the case of Pendleton vs. Phelps, a note of which in the Digest fell under the observation of the judge in the course of his examination, as decisive of the present controversy. This case from the note cited, seems to have been decided upon what was understood to be the English decisions on the subject of the liability of a deceased partner's estate, as affected by the Connecticut statute of non-claim. 4 Day's R., 481.

It is most respectfully urged, that it cannot and ought not to be considered as authoritative precedent in our Courts, and under our statutes.

2dly. We insist—That if the right of action did not accrue until after the lapse of the two years limited, yet the liability or cause of action did exist before the intestate's death. It was debitum in praesenti, solvendum in futuro.

Our statute is broad enough to cover it, regarding it as a debt or demand, due presently, or in future—absolute, or contingent and conditional. It includes al debts and demands of whatsoever nature.

Under the Alabama statute of non-claim, it was held by the Supreme Court of that State, that there was no difference between an absolute and conditional liability, as to the necessity of a presentment to the executor, to prevent the operation of the statute of non-claim. King vs. Moseley, 5 Ala. Reps., 610. And to the same point is the decision of the Supreme Court of Connecticut, under the statute of non-claim of that State. Paine vs. Smith, 2 Root, 142.

3dly. We insist—That if the counsel for the appellee are correct in their position, that the cause of action did not accrue, as against the estate of William D. Harrison, until after pursuit of the survivor at law to insolvency, it then results, as a principle of equity, that the creditor should pursue the survivor with all possible diligence, and if there be any laches in this respect, the creditor should bear the bur-
82 den of the loss consequent upon it. The creditor should commence his suit immediately upon the accruing of the right of action, and should, with good faith and diligence, pursue it against the survivor.

We refer here to the record exhibited by complainant with his bill, and show the negligence of complainant in pursuing his remedy at law against the survivor.

But we do not in any wise admit by this position, that we have any want of faith in our other points.

Similar statutes having been passed by several of the States of the Union, it is proposed to refer to them, and the adjudication of the Courts respectively, not as authoritative precedents, but in the hope that the view taken by the Courts of those States in the exposition and effect given to these laws, may afford some light to this Court in the interpretation and application of our own statute. Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Connecticut, North Carolina, Missouri and Alabama, have all provided statutes of non-claim, as they are termed; and the judiciaries of those States have ever held them to be statutes of repose, designed to enforce a speedy settlement of the estates of deceased persons, and to quiet the possession of the residum by the heirs and distributees. Angell on Lim., (2d Ed.,) 167.

The statute of Massachusetts, provides that no executor or administrator shall be held to answer any suit, unless commenced within four years after undertaking the trust. Under this statute, it has been held that the administrator cannot waive the bar by a new promise, and so bind the estate. Brown vs. Anderson, 13 Mass. R., 201. Thayer vs. Hollis, 3 Met. R., 369. Emerson vs. Thompson, 16 Mass., 429.

So, a license to sell real estate to pay a debt, barred by this statute, will not be granted to the administrator. Scott vs. Hancock, 13 Mass. R., 162. Ex parte Allen, 15 Mass. R., 57. Heath vs. Wills, 5 Pick. R., 140.

So, infancy of claimant or creditor will not save the bar. Hall vs. Bumstead, 20 Pick. R., 2.

So, it may be pleaded in equity as well as in law. In a suit in equity brought by a surviving partner to be relieved from a promissory note given to the executor of a deceased partner, for the supposed value of the share of the deceased in the joint estate, and which was afterwards discovered to be erroneous from mistakes, and from the acts of the deceased in his life time in relation to the joint fund; 83 held, the bar was effectual. Burditt vs. Grew, 8 Pick. R., 108.

In New Hampshire, it is provided, that in case any creditor shall neglect to exhibit his or her demand against any estate to the executor or administrator within the term of two years next after proof of the will, or grant of administration, "such demand shall be extinguished, and the creditor totally barred from recovery of the same."

Under this statute the Courts of New Hampshire have held the statute a bar which can be waived by the administrator only at his peril; it does not bind the estate. The statute, says the Court, was intended for the benefit of all interested in the estate of deceased persons. Gookin vs. Sanborn, 3 N. H. Rep., 491. Hodgdon vs. White, 11 N. H. Rep., 208.

Upon the subject of exhibition of demand, and when actual presentation of the claim, or its evidence will be waived—see Mathes vs. Jackson, 7 N. H. Rep., 260.

In Connecticut, the Court of Probate is authorized to fix a time for presentment of claims against the estate of a deceased person, not less than six, nor more than eighteen months. And if claim be presented and disallowed, suit must be brought within six months after notice of disallowance, or it will be barred. Rev. Stat. of Conn., 354.

It has been held that this statute is a positive bar, not removable like other statutes of limitation by a new promise, or a recognition of a subsisting debt. The object of the Legislature was to compel early settlement of estates. Spalding vs. Butts, 6 Conn. R., 28.

And it has been held also, that there is no difference between a conditional and absolute liability as to the necessity for presentment to the executor to prevent the operation of the statute of non-claim. Painter vs. Smith, 2 Root R., 142.

Opposed to the case last cited is that of Pendleton vs. Phelps before mentioned, which we think is not entitled to the importance claimed for it in the Court below.

In Alabama, the provision of the statute is, that all claims shall be presented to the executor within eighteen months after the same shall have accrued, or within eighteen months after the grant of letters testamentary, or of administration, or they will be forever barred; with a saving in favor of infants, femes coverts, persons insane, or non compotes, and to debts contracted out of the State, and to heirs 84 and legatees claiming as such. Clay's Digest, 195, Sec. 17.

We have collected the following notes of decisions of the Supreme Court of Alabama upon this statute:

As to presentation.—A writ issued and afterwards abandoned, is not a presentation within the meaning of the statute. Bigger vs. Hutchins, 2 Stewart, 448.

So, knowledge of the existence of the claim is not sufficient—nothing short of actual presentation will satisfy the statute. Jones vs. Lightfoot, 10 Ala. R., 24.

As to character of claim.—Held to include judgments rendered in life time of deceased. Ready vs. Thompson, 4 Stew. & Port, 52.

The statute runs from "the time the claim has accrued," not from the time the cause of action has accrued. It has never been its construction that a claim which does not become one within eighteen months after the grant of letters shall not be presented within that time. Such a construction would go far to defeat the beneficial purposes for which it was intended. King & Barnes vs. Moseley, 5 Ala. R., 610. Jones vs. Lightfoot, 10 Ala. R., 26.

As to who may take advantage of it.—A creditor or any other person interested in the distribution, has an equal right with the executor to insist on the plea. McBroom vs. The Governor, 6 Porter 32. Jones vs. Lightfoot, 10 Ala., 24. Thrash vs. Sumwalt, 5 Ala., 20.

The statute of North Carolina on this subject was enacted in 1789—for its terms and an exposition of it, see the opinion of Gaston, Judge, in Goodman vs. Smith. 4 Dev. Law R., 454.

The statute of Missouri, from which it is supposed by the learned judge in the Court below that our statute was copied, will be found in Geyer's Digest, 51.

If the surmise be correct that our statute had its origin from this act, upon a comparison of the two statutes, it will be evident that the Legislature of Florida was not satisfied with the provisions of the Missouri act, and were determined to advance the remedy which it proposed for the mischief of the common law, and therefore made important alterations.

1. To the terms, debts and demands, the phrase is added, "of whatsoever nature," so as to include every species of claim.

2. It abridges the limitation from five to two years.

3. It excludes from the saving, all those without the limits of the United States, unless they be in the military or naval service during war.

Under this statute, it has been held that a person having a claim against the estate of a decedent, and wishing to give notice to the administrator of such claim, must state in his notice its nature, and whether he claims in his own right, or that of his wife. This case was that of a distributee. Dorsey vs. Burns, 5 Missouri, 334.

Where cause of action did not accrue until atfer the limitation expired, held not within the statute. Miller vs. Woodward, 8 Missouri, 176.

We take it, there is a difference between the accrual of the right of action, and that of the cause of action. In the case at bar, the cause of action accrued in the life-time of Harrison.

Again: The Missouri statute does not contain the important description to the debt or demand, "of whatsoever nature," which is in our statute.

The limitation of three years is not for the personal convenience of the administrator, but for the benefit of those interested in the estate, hence it cannot be waived by the administrator. Wiggins vs. Lovering, 9 Missouri, 266.

S. J. Douglas, for appellee:

It is attempted to reverse the decree of the Court below, on two grounds:

1st. It is said that Wilder, the surviving partner of the firm of Harrison & Wilder, was a necessary party.

2d. That, under the act of 20th November, 1828, the claim of Laverty should have been presented to the administrator of Harrison, within two years after administration granted.

It is answered to the first objection, that all the cases cited on the other side to sustain the position assumed, were English cases, in which proceedings were had in the first instance against the estate of the deceased partner, and it was necessary to make the survivor a party, to bind him by the decree—to ascertain his liability, and that he might be present at the taking of the account, to defend and protect the interest of the joint effects. He is supposed to have a know-86 ledge of the transactions, and the estate of the deceased partner is entitled to the benefit of his answer. But no case it is believed can be found, where the survivor is deemed a necessary party, after his liability has been fixed by a judgment at law. No decree could be rendered against him, and he would not be allowed to contest the judgment. The case in 2 Denio, 585, is in point. Butts & Havens vs. Geming and others, 5 Paige's Ch. Rep., 154.

The most important question to be considered is, whether the heirs and distributees of Harrison's estate are discharged from the payment of the complainant's demand, by reason of the provisions of the act of the 20th November, 1828, usually known as the act of non-claim.

It will be remembered that the complainant is seeking to recover the amount of his debt from the distributees of Harrison, who are in equity trustees for this purpose, and are not entitled to the enjoyment of the estate of the ancestor, except the surplus of the assets, after the payment of all the debts. 2 Story's Equity Com., 498, section 1251.

The note given by the firm of Harrison & Wilder to complainant, is dated the 23d March, 1836, and payable twelve months from date. The death of Harrison took place some time in the month of May, 1836. In the month of November, 1838, the complainant, Laverty, instituted suit against Wilder, the surviving partner, and in December, 1841, there was a return of his execution, endorsed "No property found."

The complainant then filed his bill in Gadsden Superior Court, against the administrator of Harrison, and the distributees of his estate, to recover the amount of his demand.

The first point to be considered and determined is, was the complainant right, in first resorting to the surviving partner and the joint assets, for the payment of his debt, or should he have proceeded in equity against the estate of Harrison, the deceased partner, before suing Wilder, the survivor, to insolvency? Until recently this question, both in England and this country, would have met with but one response, and that is, that the surviving partner must be sued to insolvency, before the estate of the deceased partner could be called upon to discharge partnership debts. On this point, see the opinion of the Court in Pendleton vs. Phelps, 4 Day, 477. Lawrence vs. Trustees of the Leake and Watts Orphan House, 2 Denio's Rep., 87
585. Sale vs. Dishmon's Executors, 3 Leigh, 553. Jenkins vs. Degroot, 1 Caines' Cases in Error, 122. Edbert vs. Woods, &c., 3 Paige's Chancery Reports, 517. Higginson, &c. vs. Air, 1 Desau., 427. 2 Robinson's Prac., 129, and, indeed, every case decided in this country.

It seems, however, that, by recent adjudications in England, the Courts have permitted the creditor, at his option, and for his benefit, and the more speedy recovery of his debt, to unite the representative of the estate of the deceased partner in the same chancery suit with the surviving partner, and have proceeded to take an account of the partnership effects, and settle the rights of parties. In these proceedings, the Courts still continue to keep the partnership funds separate and distinct from those of the separate partners. Let it be also observed that, even in the English Courts, this right on behalf of creditors to restore to the estate of the deceased partner in the first instance, is only permissive, and not compulsory, and in every reported case it was for his benefit; and that the creditor may still, in the English Courts, if he so elects, pursue the surviving partner to insolvency, and then proceed against the estate of the deceased partner in the hands of the heir, and that he may adopt this course, without incurring the hazard of the statute of limitations, while pursuing the joint effects of the survivor. Winter vs. Innes, 4 Myl. and Craig, 111.

It will be seen from a careful examination of the decisions made by the Courts of the several States of the Union, that they have uniformly held, without exception, that in order to justify a creditor's filing a bill against the estate of a deceased partner, he must first follow the joint effects in the hands of the survivor, and only upon his insolvency do they allow the estate of the deceased partner to be resorted to. The question is now before this Court for the first time, and it is with it to determine whether they will adopt the recent English decisions, or follow the uniform current of decisions made in the United States. It is a matter for its consideration whether the ultimate good will outweigh the hardship in this individual case. Should the rule as established by the English Courts, be held to be more consonant with reason and the principles of equity, still it will be seen that there it is only permissive to the creditor for his benefit, and not compulsory to his injury, and that being permitted to elect 88 between remedies, it has never been held to defeat his debt under the stringent statute of limitations. It is hoped that the very first application of the English rule in this country will not be to defeat the collection of a just debt by the creditor.

The case cited on the other side, of Nelson et al., vs. Hill et al., 5 Howard S. C. Rep., 127, was a bill against the survivors of one of the firms, and the estate of the deceased partners, without first having resorted to the legal remedy against the survivor. In that case the Circuit Court sustained a demurrer to the bill, on the ground that the suit in the first instance should have been at law and against the survivor. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed the decision, and decided that the creditor has his option. It will be seen that in this case, the only one decided in this country, the decision was to advance the rights of the creditor. There were other circumstances and facts in this case that made it one peculiarly proper to resort to a Court of Equity in the first instance. If it be true, as it doubtless is, that a suit against the surviving partner will keep alive the claim against the estate of the deceased partner, so as to defeat the general statute of limitations, will it not also apply to the act of non-claim, which it is conceded is a special statute of limitations? It is said in the books that the equities between the partners, of which the creditors may have the benefit, will defeat the statute of limitations. Will not the same equities apply to the act of non-claim? See the case of Winter vs. Innes, 4 Myl. & Craig, 111.

I shall next endeavor to show that whether the Court shall be of the opinion that the recent English decisions are the most reasonable, and are to be adopted in this State; or whether they shall adhere to the decisions of the Courts of this country; still the claim of Laverty against the estate of Harrison, was not of that character and description of debt and demand, which, by our statute, should have been exhibited to the personal representative.

It would seem from the general law on the subject of the administration of estates, that this act of non-claim was not so much designed as a new act of limitations, as it was intended for one of repose to the personal representative. It was desirable to appoint by law some time beyond which the personal representative, and those who signed his official bond, should not be liable to suit by creditors. The terms used in the act of the 20th November, 1828, showed most conclusively, that this two year's act was not designed so much to release the estate of the deceased, as it was to release the representative from suit. It will be seen on examination, that this act differs materially in its provision from similar acts in the other States, and more nearly resembles that of Missouri. In other States, their acts of non-claim apply only to creditors, while our's include not only creditors, but legatees and persons entitled to distribution. Now persons entitled to distribution are those entitled to the estate of the deceased, after the payment of his debts. Does this act design to protect the estate from those entitled to it? Why protect it if they are not to enjoy the benefit of the protection? Why protect their rights in order to defeat them? Is it the object of the act to create a fund at the expense of creditors, to the enjoyment of which those entitled to it may never succeed? Should those entitled to distribution not appear and claim within the two years, will the representative succeed to the estate, or will it escheat to the Commonwealth? Should it be distributed to some of those entitled to distribution, will others, who are equally the objects of the ancestor's love and care but who did not claim within the two years, be barred and excluded from its benefits, or rather would not a Court of Equity cause those who had received it to refund a just proportion to their co-distributees? It would seem from these views that the object of the act of 20th November, 1828, was especially intended for the benefit and protection of the personal representative, and not designed to protect the estate by defeating such debts and demands as could not properly be exhibited to the representative, and paid by him. When a claim is of such a nature that it cannot be adjusted and settled by the administrator, then it is not such a debt and demand as the act designed should be exhibited within the two years, or be forever barred of recovery. Vide 6 Connecticut Rep., 258.

It is contended for the appellants that the act of the 20th November, 1828, is a statute of limitations. It is granted that it is a statute limiting the time in which the personal representative may be sued by the creditors of the deceased, but it is denied that it is a statute of limitations for the estate itself, against the claims of distributees, who in fact are the persons entitled to its enjoyment; and, if not a statute of limitations as to them, with what propriety can it 90 oe said to extend to creditors, seeing they are by the express terms of the statute placed on the same footing?

All statutes of limitations are looked upon with jealousy and distrust when invoked to defeat a meritorious claim, and the Courts will never extend their provisions by implication and construction, but require parties relying on them to bring themselves most clearly within the benefit of their provisions; and, indeed, where the Court can see that a statute of limitations will defeat a just demand, it will usually require a party to come within its very letter. No latitude of construction will be adopted in aid of such a statute. In the case now under consideration, the judgment and the return of insolvency against Wilder, the surviving partner, is the foundation of the bill. No debt and demand could properly be said to exist against the estate of Harrison, the deceased partner, until the survivor was sued to insolvency. Previous to that time, Laverty was the creditor of Wilder, the surviving partner, who, if he paid the debt, became, to that extent, a creditor of Harrison's estate for his pro rata proportion, and might maintain his action for contribution. West vs. Skip. 1 Vesey, Sr., 251.

This, at least, is the rule of proceedings as laid down by the Courts of this country without exception, and if a different one exists in England, it was only adopted, after much hesitation, and repeated conflicting decisions, and this Court will hardly, I presume, require a party to nicely balance the weight of authority, in order to escape the consequences of the statute of limitations. Courts have uniformly held that it was much better to adhere to decisions once made, even if erroneous, than by reversing individual cases to unsettle the law which had been long acquiesced in. In Devaynes vs. Noble, a case much relied upon at bar, Lord Chancellor Brougham says, "It is not upon slight grounds, certainly, that any Court, either of law or of equity, ought to loosen and unsettle that which has stood for so long a period as nineteen years. If it be true that even a prevailing error—what has been called a common or universal error—may be said to make the law, this at least may be allowed to be a sound foundation of the doctrine I am referring to, namely, that, unless a great and manifest deviation from principle shall have been committed, it may create much further mischief to reverse an individual case by way of correcting a slight error, if that error has been acted upon for a long series of years, than to leave it as it stands; more 91 especially, if the opinion of lawyers and the decisions of Judges have been ruled by it, and if, upon the analogies of that case, the same principle has been recognized and adopted in other cases, connected with and relating to it." Devaynes vs. Noble, 2 Rus. & Mylne, 495. 13 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep., 144. It is believed that the language held by the Lord Chancellor in this case, is entirely applicable to the case before the Court.

The next question for consideration is, the nature and character of Laverty's demand against the estate of Harrison, the deceased partner. It is contended on behalf of the complainant, that in the case at bar, the debt and demand against the estate of Harrison, was uncertain and contingent, depending on the solvency of Wilder, the surviving partner, for had the surviving partner proved solvent, there never could have arisen any debt or demand against the estate of Harrison in favor of Laverty. In England, the true and legal test of insolvency is, 1st, By the party becoming a bankrupt, and 2nd, By a judgment and execution, and a return of nulla bona. See 2 Robinson's Practice, 130. Up to the time of the return of the execution against Wilder, Laverty had no debt or demand against the estate of Harrison. His debt and demand was against the surviving partner and the partnership effects, and not until he proved insolvent, did the right of action accrue to him against Harrison's estate. At that instant of time, his contingent claim against the estate of Harrison was converted into a debt and demand. His right to exhibit his claim and to demand payment from Harrison's personal representative, then for the first time sprung into existence. As against Harrison's estate it was suspended and in abeyance until Wilder, the survivor, proved insolvent—a mere contingency which might never happen. It remained dormant against the estate of Harrison until this period of time, and until the happening of the contingency; and then and not until then, could the statute of non-claim begin to run. Vide Backus vs. Cleveland, Kirby, 36. Adams vs. same, do. 38 6 Connecticut Rep., 258. Pendleton vs. Phelps, 4 Day, 477. Nëil vs. Cunningham, 2 Porter, 171. 10 Alabama Rep., 24. 2 Denio's Rep., 585.

If, in the case under consideration, Wilder, the survivor, had been solvent, the firm being insolvent, and from his separate and private fortune had satisfied and discharged the demand of Laverty against 92 the partnership, could he not have maintained his action against Harrison's representative for contribution; and would not the defence of the act of non-claim have been well answered, by replying that he had no debt or demand against Harrison's estate until satisfaction to Laverty, and until after the two years had expired? In a case of this nature, the surviving partner, with full knowledge of the partnership effects and its liabilities, might well know that ultimately he would have to resort to the estate of the deceased partner for contribution; and yet it would seem he might, notwithstanding the act of two years, maintain his action for this purpose. The cases stated in the books show most clearly that it is not every debt and demand that may ultimately come against an estate, that must be exhibited and made known to the personal representative within the two years, or be "forever barred of recovery." Take the common one of a surety on the bond of a guardian, or other fiduciary. A. as surety for B, makes good by suit or otherwise the deficiency of his principal. B, has been dead for many years before this deficiency is ascertained, and his estate has been distributed to those in interest. It cannot be that B.'s estate is discharged from the claim of the surety. True it is that B.'s personal representative is discharged from suit, but the estate in the hands of distributees is still liable.

This will serve to illustrate the position before taken, that the statute of two years was for the benefit and repose of the personal representative, and was not intended to discharge the estate in the hands of heirs and distributees from the payment of such debts of the ancestor as could not be exhibited to the representative. One of the most cherished principles upon which courts of equity act is, "that a man shall be just before he is generous," and they will exercise all power in their hands to compel payment of debts, before enriching heirs and distributees.

I have presented the various questions involved in this case, as if the personal representative of Harrison had complied with the act of 20th November, 1828, and had given the notice required by its provisions. I shall now proceed to show that those who are seeking to avoid the payment of this claim, and are most clamorous for rigid and stringent technicalities, have not so complied with the statute as to entitle themselves to the benefits of its provisions. It will be seen 93 on reference to the act, Thomp. Dig., 206, that it contemplates two notices to be published by the administrator. The one, required by the 2d section, is to be published for the space of eight weeks, calling upon all persons having claims against the estate of the deceased to present them without delay to the executor or administrator. The other, under the 6th section of the act, leaves it optional with the representative, but provides, if the representative shall make the publication for the space of four weeks, directed to creditors, legatees and persons entitled to distribution, then their claims and demands will be barred at the expiration of two years, unless exhibited within the same.

The only notice given by the representative of Harrison is a general one, to be found on the twentieth page of the printed record, which, he says, in his answer, was published for the space of four weeks, and longer. On examination, it will be found that this notice cannot be held to be a compliance with the 6th section of the act of 20th November, 1828; it is manifest from its terms that it was not intended to be. It bears on its face the evidence that it was designed as a general notice to persons having claims against the estate of Harrison to make them known to the representative, preparatory to so arranging the affairs of the estate that it might be speedily settled. It is most apparent that the 6th section of the act was not in the mind of the representative at the time of giving the notice. It is much more like the notice required by the 2d section of the act, than that required by the 6th section. The first notice is obligatory on the representative, and may be general—while that under the 6th section is optional with the representative, and must be special. It wants the most essential requisite of a notice under the 6th section. It is not directed to the persons that the act declares shall be notified, and legatees and persons entitled to distribution, are wholly omitted to be notified. It may be observed that this act is but one of many for the administration of estates in this State, and that, in order to give it a just construction, regard should be had to the entire legislation on this subject. The law requires that, in the event of the insolvency of an estate, a pro rata distribution shall be made among the creditors. Now, examine the notice given by Meacham, the administrator of Harrison, and it is most obvious that it was for the purpose of enabling him to ascertain the condition of the estate to meet this 94 requirement of law. True it is, that all persons are warned that their claims will be barred of recovery unless presented within two years; yet it is apparent, from the character and terms of the notice, that the representative had not in view the 6th section of the act, but his notice was designed to quicken debtors in paying, and creditors in presenting their debts, that the condition of the estate might be ascertained.

In conclusion, it may be observed that, if all the benefit claimed for the estate from the act of November, 20th, 1828, was conceded, still, this being purely an equitable demand, the statute does not apply. The right to pursue the estate of the deceased partner arises from the equities between the parties. The estate is a trust fund in the hands of the heirs and distributees for the payment of debts, and it is contended that nothing but laches will defeat the creditor in pursuing it in their hands, and subjecting it to the payment of the debts of the ancestor. His debt is a lien on the fund, which he can lose by his laches and neglect, and no statute of limitations will impair his rights. See Story's Eq., 498, § 1251. Hammersley vs. Lamb, 2 John. Ch. Rep., 508. Sale vs. Dishmon's Executors, 3 Leigh, 560.

In this last case, the Court say, the defendant having made no charge of laches in the answer, or any part of the pleadings, the question could not be examined by the appellate court. See also 2 Robinson's Practice, 11.

Archer, on the same side.

The appellants seek a reversal of the decree on two grounds:

1st. They say that Wilder, the survivor, should have been made a party.

2d. They say the claim in this case should have been presented to the administrator within two years after administration granted on Harrison's estate.

In answer to the first objection, it is sufficient to say, that the cases cited on the other side are English cases, where there had been no judgment recovered against the survivors. The only object in making the survivor a party is, that he may be present at the taking of the account of the amount due to complainant. Such account in this case was taken by the recovery at law against Wilder. The case in 5 Howard was the case of a creditors bill, where only part of the claims had been reduced to judgment against the survivor of one of 95 the firms. To have joined Wilder could have answered no useful purpose. The debt as to him, had been already ascertained, and no decree could be rendered against him.

Again: No such objection was taken by demurrer, or is insisted upon in the answer of the appellants. The objection comes too late.

As to the second objection.—The question is, how far the statutes of this State have cut off the right of a creditor to follow in equity the estate of a deceased debtor, as a trust in the hands of the administrator, or legatees, and distributees.

The statute of five years, it is admitted, does not apply in this case, and indeed is never applied in equity, unless there be a concurrent remedy at law. See cases cited by Hoffman, Vice Chancellor, in 2 Denio, 577.

But it is said the statute of two years, or of non-claim, amounts to a flat bar.

I say the statute of two years does not bar equities (where there is no concurrent remedy at law,) any more than the statute of five years.

The statute requires "all debts and demands of whatsoever nature," to be presented, &c., and also by implication from the proviso, the claims of distributees and legatees.

The terms debts and demand, mean, as I contend, money demands, on which an action at law may be sustained.

The term debt and demand are used in our attachment laws, and also in the statute of set-off. It is true in one of the attachment statutes, debts and demands not due are spoken of, but this does not prove a different construction, independent of the qualifying words whether due or not. But could the claim in question against Harrison's estate be the basis of an attachment under either of the statutes, or could it be the subject of a set-off? Certainly not.

The claim against Harrison was not a debt or demand within the meaning of either of these statutes of attachment or set-off. Why then should these identical words in the statute of non-claim, be construed to extend to Laverty's contingent equitable claim against Harrison's estate?

The object of the statute undoubtedly is, to effect a speedy payment of debts to creditors, and a speedy distribution to the next of kin, to terminate the office of administrator within two years, so 96 that he may be protected.

The administrator cannot be protected except by providing against two classes of persons—creditors and distributees. He is effectually protected after distribution against any suit by creditors who do not exhibit their demands within two years from the date of his administration—for, when he distributes before the two years expires, he takes a bond of indemnity to protect him against all creditors who present their demands within the two years; and this indemnity is as broad as his responsibility under such circumstances. And when he distributes after the two years, he is protected against all claims demanded after the distribution, for the distribution he may give in evidence against subsequent claims, under the plea of plene administravit. He is also protected against distributees, because although he may distribute to the wrong persons, the right persons cannot maintain a suit against him, unless they have brought their claims to the knowledge of the administrator before the two years expire, so as to enable the administrator to put the surplus in proper hands.

But because creditors, whose demands accrue after the two years, cannot compel the administrator to pay them, when he has previously parted with the fund; or because the right persons entitled to distribution cannot have redress against the administrator, when they did not notify him of their claim—is it to be inferred that they have no remedy in equity against the funds or assets?

The persons properly entitled to distribution, I take it, notwithstanding the want of notice to the administrator, and certainly the future creditor, could follow the fund in any hands, except those of a purchaser. 2 Story's Eq., 498, § 1251.

Now, if our statute required or authorized the administrator to take a bond from the distributees to refund for any future claims which might accrue, it might be inferred that all future suits were to be enforced against the administrator, (if any one could be found to take the office under such provisions,)—for the refunding bond in his hands might be construed, to be assets, and thus create a continuing and indefinite liability. But the administrator is not required or authorized to take such refunding bond, and, consequently, is not held to such continuing libility. I maintain that while the administrator, who has parted with the fund by a distribution, is protected from suits on claims accruing subsequently, the fund is not protected.

Fillyau and wife vs. Laverty.—Argument of Counsel.

97 Hence I say, that Laverty's claim is not within the operation of the statute of non-claim.

But it is said that a bill in equity might have been sustained against Harrison's administrator and Wilder immediately after the note became due, and therefore that there was such a demand as should have been presented within two years after administration granted. The note was not due until some nine months of the two years had expired, and there is no statute to meet such a case. 4 Day, 476. To argue that Laverty's claim against Harrison's estate must, under these circumstances, be presented within the two years, is to argue that he must also present any other claim accruing within that time, even within five days of the expiration of the time, and though the note be payable in New York, and it be necessary to present it there, in order to bind endorsers. The appellant's position in this respect cannot be correct—for a creditor is not bound to act upon the presumption that his claim will not be paid at maturity.

The more reasonable construction of our statute is, that debts and demands on which suits at law may be brought, must be presented within the two years—a period of time allowed to such creditors to come in. But that in reference to creditors whose claims accrue in such manner, or at such time, as not to allow them the full two years for presentation, there is no limitation, except such as may exist independent of the statute of non-claim. Our statute does not, like those of some of the other States, appoint a time for the presentation of future claims, contingent or otherwise.

But did any right to sue or claim, legal or equitable, accrue to Laverty, prior to the return of nulla bona on the execution against Wilder—or in other words, was not Laverty's claim against Harrison's estate dependent upon the result of the suit at law against Wilder?

Recent English authorities, and one American, have been cited upon the other side, to show that Laverty had a remedy in the first instance in equity against Harrison's estate, by joining Wilder, the survivor; but these cases do not show that it is necessary to resort to such remedy, to preserve the ulterior liability of the deceased partner's estate. Indeed, in every decision authorizing this resort to equity in the first instance, the creditor has been the party invoking that remedy. No decision can be found, even in England, where 98 the election of a different remedy is held to prejudice the rights of the creditor.

I understand the English decisions to amount to this, that, out of great consideration for the creditor, the Courts will permit a resort to equity in the first instance against the estate of the deceased partner, leaving his representatives to pursue the survivor; or will permit the creditor to pursue the survivor to recover the amount of the claim, leaving him to settle his accounts afterwards with the representatives of the deceased partner. In other words, there are two remedies—the one at law, the other in equity—and the creditor may elect either at his option, but cannot pursue both. Such certainly is the view taken by the Supreme Court in 5 Howard, cited on the other side. The Court say—the creditor "may, at his option, proceed at law against the surviving partner, or go in the first instance into equity against the representatives of the deceased." To harrass the survivor by a suit at law and a suit in equity at the same time, on the same cause of action, would certainly seem to be contrary to principle. Besides, the suit at law against the survivor is virtually a proceeding against the estate of both parties, for the judgment and execution bind the joint property—at least, so it is considered in England—so far as to preserve the ulterior equity against the estate of the deceased partner. Winter vs. Innes, 4 Myl. and Craig, 111, cited in Collyer on Part., (N. E.,) p. 542.

But in equity, as well as in cases in bankruptcy, the English Courts recognize the prior lien of joint creditors on joint assets, and separate creditors on separate assets—principles which would seem to be inconsistent with the equitable remedy against the deceased partner in the first instance. Gray vs. Chiswell, 9 Ves., Jr., 118.

That the English doctrine is an invasion upon correct principles, is apparent from the language of Lord Brougham, in Devaynes vs. Noble. (13 Cond. Eng. Chy. Rep., 144.) Lord Thurlow and Lord Eldon would not have recognized the rule as an original question. The latter, indeed, expressed surprise at its introduction, and his ignorance of its origin! It is apparent also that Lord Brougham had misgivings as to the correctness upon principle of his decision in Devaynes vs. Noble, and yet it is remarkable that in that case the insolvency of the survivors appeared upon the record. Lord Brougham seems to have made his decision upon the authority of precedent, rather than upon the authority of principle, and certainly there was 99 sufficient precedent to authorize the decision upon the facts of that case. But whatever may be the English rule, and its applicability to a case like this, in England, there can be no doubt that the doctrine of the American Courts fully sustains the complainant in the course he has pursued. 2 Denio, 577. 4 Day, 476. 2 Porter, 171. 6 Conn., 258.

The American rule is, that the deceased partner's estate cannot be resorted to until the remedy at law against the survivor is exhausted, or until the survivor becomes insolvent. This rule is consistent with the English and American doctrine governing the marshalling of joint and separate estates of partners, and is supported by irresistible reasoning. Besides, it has prevailed in the State where the contract was made, and also in our State where the contract is sought to be enforced. Lord Brougham says, in Devaynes vs. Noble, "unless a great and manifest deviation from principle shall have been committed, it may create much further mischief to reverse an individual case by way of correcting a slight error, if that error has been acted upon for a long series of years, than to leave it as it stands."

It is peculiarly the policy of the slave States to adopt the American rule, for generally the separate estate of the deceased partner in this country consists principally of slave property, the value of which to the family of the deceased cannot be replaced out of the partnership moneys.

It cannot be doubted that Laverty's claim in any of the States of the Union would not be considered within the statutes of non-claim, but as a contingent claim arising upon the insolvency of Wilder, which appears by the return of nulla bona. Even in Alabama, where the statutes of non-claim are most rigid, the case in 4 Day is approved, and such a claim as our's held not to be within the statute of non-claim.

As to the laches of Laverty complained of, see cases cited on the other side—and particularly 2 John. Ch., 508, Hammersley vs. Lambert—also the rulings of the Master of the Rolls, in Devaynes vs. Noble, 1 Merivale, 539, 572. Besides, no such objection is made in the answer of appellants, and no proof could have been taken to rebut any unfavorable presumptions.

Smedes and Marshall, 552. 8 Missouri, 176.

HAWKINS, J.

The case before us has been argued very elaborately and ably, and we have given it the consideration due to the importance of the questions involved in the discussion, an importance much enhanced from the likelihood of their frequent recurrence in practice in the Courts of our State.

The main points presented for decision are these:

1st. Whether on a bill filed by a creditor of a partnership against the representatives of a deceased partner, it is necessary that the surviving partner should be made a party to the bill after judgment against him at law.

2d. Can a creditor of a partnership, upon its dissolution by the death of one of its members, proceed, at once, in equity, against the estate of the deceased partner, without first showing the insolvency of the surviving partner?

Besides these, there are other questions as to the forms of notices, to be given by executors or administrators to persons having debts or demands against the estate of their testator or intestate—the effect of the statute of non-claims in cases like the present; the mode of exhibition of debts or demands against estates of decedents; and the effect of the statute of non-claim where equitable rights are involved, or trusts actual or implied.

As to the first point, there can be no doubt that the surviving partner should be made a party to the bill filed against the estate of the deceased partner, for the reason that he is interested in taking an account. Story on Part., 515. Story's Eq., Pl., 157. Wilkinson vs. Henderson, 1 Mylne & Keen, 582, 589. Burwell vs. Mandeville, Ex. 2 Howard S. C. R., 560, 575. In the latter case, Judge Story remarks, "In general, the surviving partner is liable at law only, and no decree can be made against him, although he may be made a proper party to the suit in equity, as being interested to contest the plaintiff's demands, unless some other equity intervenes."

It is true, there had been a judgment at law in this case against the surviving partner and a return of nulla bona upon the execution, still he may have had effects of the firm in his possession not amena-

101 ble to the execution, such as liabilities and evidences of debts due the concern. It was moreover a new proceeding, and he might have had an interest in taking the accounts correctly, inasmuch as there might be a remedy over against him by the representatives of the estate by their being substituted in the place of the creditors.

The question whether the creditor of a partnership must in the first place pursue the surviving partner at law, before he can proceed in equity against the estate of the deceased partner, is one of difficulty, and from the facts that this is the first time that it has been presented for adjudication in this Court, we have duly considered it: and we give, with due caution, our views on this embarassing topic.

The old English doctrine on this subject, though not entirely clear and settled, was, that the joint creditor must, in the first instance, seek his redress against the surviving partner, and that he had no claim in equity against the deceased partner, unless the surviving partner was insolvent or bankrupt.

This doctrine was based upon the general principle that, the joint estate was the first fund for the payment of the joint debts; and inasmuch as the joint estate vests in the surviving partner, the joint creditors, upon equitable considerations, ought to resort to the surviving partner before they should endeavor to obtain redress or satisfaction out of the assets of the deceased partner. Bishop vs. Church, 2 Vesey, 100. Ex parte Kendall, 17 Ves., 519. Story on Partnership, 514, and cases there cited.

This doctrine has been since contravened, and it is now held (says Judge Story,) that all partnership debts are to be deemed joint and several; and consequently the joint creditors have in all cases the right to proceed at law against the survivors, and an election also to proceed in equity against the estate of the deceased partner whether the survivors be insolvent, bankrupt, or not. Story on Part., 515.

This doctrine was first definitely settled in the case of Devaynes vs. Noble, 1 Mer., 593.

The case was pending many years, and was first decided by Sir Wm. Grant, and finally by Lord Brougham, 2 Russell & Mylne, 495. It was followed by other decisions to the same effect, and is now the settled and firmly established doctrine of the English law. Wilkinson vs. Henderson, 1 Mylne & Keen, 582, and other authorities cited on page 514, of Story on Partnership, and in the brief of counsel for appellants.

102 The English decisions upon this point have been adopted, as we have seen, by Judge Story, and regarded by him as settling definitely the law on the subject. So also, Chancellor Kent, in the 3d book of his Commentaries, page 64, uses this language: "But relief may be now had in equity against the representatives of the deceased partner having assets, if the surviving partner be insolvent. And it is now held, that a partnership contract, upon the death of a partner, is in equity to be considered as joint and several and to be treated as the several debt of each partner;" citing in a note 3d Merrivale, 393. 3 Paige, 367; and in that note he says: "A joint creditor may file a bill against the representatives of a deceased partner, though the survivor be not insolvent. He is not compelled to sue the survivor in the first instance." And then cites the cases of Devaynes vs. Noble, Wilkinson vs. Henderson, 1 Mylne & Keen, 582, and other authorities.

We have been referred to some American cases by the counsel for appellee, going the other way, such as 2 Peters, 171. 2 Denio, 585. 6 Con., 258. Pendleton vs. Phelps, 4 Day, 477, and others. But to these stands opposed a very recent decision. Nelson, et al., vs. Hill, 5 Howard, 133.

The Court in this case uses this very cogent and explicit language: "It is now a rule of law too well settled to be shaken, that the creditor of a partnership may, at his option, proceed at law against the surviving partner, or go in the first instance into equity against the representatives of the deceased partner."

So, too, the Supreme Court of Alabama, in a case reported in 8 Alabama Reports, 577, remarks: "It is true, by the common law, upon the death of a partner, the remedy was gone at law, against his personal representatives, but in equity the liability was held to continue, and it is said could be enforced by bill whether the survivors were solvent or otherwise. Story on Part., 514, and cases there cited. Indeed in this respect, it is now recognized as the well settled doctrine, that there is no distinction between the debts due from partners and those due from other joint debtors. In equity all are considered as joint and several, and the creditors may pursue the personal representatives of the deceased joint debtor or partner, whether the survivors are insolvent or otherwise."

The Court then refers to a decision in the case of Marr vs. South-wick, et al., 2d Porter, 351, as having been made in opposition to 103 the foregoing principles, and clearly by the above language expresses its dissent to that decision.

Upon a review of the whole subject, we feel constrained to side with the English rule, as adopted by the highest legal tribunals in our own country, and such text writers as Judge Story and Chancellor Kent.

We deem it consonant with reason and justice, that creditors should possess every facility of enforcing their demands against the estates of those who contracted the obligations, without being obliged to await the law's delay, by being forced in the first place to pursue the surviving partner, before they can come upon the estate of the deceased partner; nor can we see any good reason why the death of one of the partners should place the creditor, as to the efficiency of his remedy, in a worse position than if the death had not occurred. Credit is far from being given in any instance to partners on account of their partnership effects, but creditors look, and they have a legal right to do so, not only to those effects, but to the separate property of the individual partners. The lex mercatoria regarded the contract of partners as joint and several, and Courts of Equity have, we think, very wisely adopted that principle. At common law, the rule was different, being then regarded as a joint contract. In Abbot vs. Smith, 2d Black., 949, Chief Justice DeGrey remarks, "that a contract when made with partners is originally a joint contract, but may be separate as to its effects, and that each is answerable for the whole, and not merely for his proportionable part."

Creditors certainly cannot complain because a two-fold remedy is afforded them; nor should the heirs or representatives of the deceased partner be querulous—for we cannot see that any prejudice can accrue to them, by the ability of the joint creditors to render them primarily liable; for if the estate of the surviving partner be solvent, they have a remedy over by virtue of the subsisting equities; and if it be insolvent, it is very certain that the estate of the deceased partner is liable to the payment of the debt. Sir John Leach, in the case of Wilkinson vs. Henderson, 1 Mylne & Keene, 582, bases his decision upon the ground—"that the estate of the deceased partner is, at all events, liable to the full satisfaction of the creditors, and must, first or last, be answerable for the failure of the surviving partner; that no additional charge is thrown upon the assets of the de- 104 ceased partner by a resort to them in the first instance, and that great inconvenience and expense might otherwise be occasioned to the joint creditors."

Besides the foregoing reasons, we coincide with the modern rule, as being more compatible and more in consonance with the policy of our statutes, in relation to the settlement of estates of deceased persons. It is the province of every Court, where the policy of law is clearly discernible, to carry out that policy, unless militating against the letter and spirit of the Constitution. Cases of individual hardship, may no doubt, occasionally arise, from the enforcement of this principle, but this is preferable to the infraction of the laws, regulations, or policy of a State.

All our statutes in relation to the estates of decedents bear upon their face the determination, that estates shall be settled as speedily as possible. The Legislature saw the evil results which would almost inevitably ensue, if estates remained a long time unsettled, arising from the expense of administration, the detention of property from the legitimate and appropriate owners, the presentation of stale demands, and the litigation springing out of them.

To obviate these mischiefs, various statutes were passed, all having the same object, all converging to one point, the speedy settlement of estates. Among them is the one invoked by the appellants, which is in the following words: "All debts and demands of whatsoever nature, against the estate of any testator or intestate, which shall not be exhibited within the said two years, shall be forever barred: Provided, That the executor or administrator shall, by advertisement, to be published once a week for the space of four weeks, in some newspaper printed in the State, give notice to all creditors, legatees and persons entitled to distribution, that their claims and demands will be barred at the expiration of the period aforesaid, unless exhibited within the same"—with a saving to married women, infants, &c.

Much stress is laid upon the fact that this statute is of a stringent nature, but for that reason it is not to be disregarded; and if the law-making power prescribes a rigid rule, a corresponding rigid observance must follow, and is as much a duty, as though the rule was more mild, qualified, or equitable. Legal morality can drow no distinction.

Fillyau and wife vs. Laverty.—Opinion of Court.

105 This statute is virtually a statute of limitations, passed not only for the security of the legal representatives, but for the benefit of the heirs and distributees, to effect the speedy and final settlement of estates.

By it, and the statute preceding it, (section 2,) the executor or administrator is enabled to ascertain what debts or demands are due by the estate, so that he can discover whether the estate is solvent or not; while it enables the distributees or legatees to demand distribution of the estate, unless it be necessary for the administrator or executor to retain it longer in his hands, for the purpose of paying debts.

If a creditor of a partnership, in case of its dissolution by the death of one of its members, was obliged to exhaust his legal remedies against the surviving partner, before he could proceed against the estate of the deceased partner, the result would be, that the estate would necessarily be kept open and unsettled in many instances for a long period, owing to tedious litigation; and this would be, we have seen, against the policy, and I may add also, the explicit declarations of our statutes.

The statute, too, seems to have contemplated the idea that legatees and distributees should take their portions, discharged from all claims not exhibited within two years; because the bond they give, upon receiving their portion, refers to debts or demands appearing within two years, after granting the letters testamentary or letters of administration.

If, therefore, the contract of partners be joint and several in equity—if the joint creditors can proceed primarily against the estate of the deceased partner, and such we deem the law to be—we are clearly of the opinion that such creditors should exhibit his demand within the time prescribed by our statute. Having an option, he should exercise it; possessing a right, he should pursue it, within the terms of the law. If he does neither, he waives his remedy, and is estopped by a statute, as obligatory in a Court of Chancery as at law.

As to the form of the notice published by Meacham, the administrator of Wilder, we deem it sufficintly correct. It is in these words: "All persons having any claims against the estate of William D. Harrison, deceased, are hereby warned to present them to the subscriber within the time prescribed by law, or they will be forever 106 barred of recovery; all those indebted to the estate are requested to make immediate payment." It embodies, we think, substantially the requirements of the statute; and although it does not contain the words, "creditors, legatees and persons entitled to distribution," still we think the words, "all persons having any claims against the estate," are of so comprehensive a character, that they include and embrace within their meaning, "creditors, legatees and persons entitled to distribution." upon the principle that the major includes the minor.

The statute prescribes two notices, one to be published four the other eight weeks. Whether the one to be published for the latter period was so published or not does not appear, but the one before the Court, from its substantial conformity to the requisitions of the section containing the statute of non-claim, must be taken by the Court as sufficient compliance with the proviso of that section.

By the first statute (sec. 2,) the advertisement is merely directory, while by the second (sec. 6,) it is the condition upon which, on its being complied with, the statute applies as to barring debts or demands. As to the question, what shall constitute an exhibition of a debt or demand against an estate, we think there should be actual presentation of the claim within the time prescribed, or something done by the party equivalent to it.

The presentation need not be in any particular form, but sufficient to give such notice to the executor or administrator of the existence of the debt or demand, its character and amount, as would enable him with reasonable certainty to provide for its payment. Mere knowledge on the part of the executor or administrator of the existence of the claim is not enough. The party holding the claim or demand must pursue some measure to prevent his demand, and not remain passive, or sleep upon his right. The bringing a suit or action at law or in equity, we would regard as equivalent to an actual presentation, and we think that a debt, though not due, is embraced within the intention of the statute. In this last point, we are sustained by the decisions in Alabama. Jones' Ex'rs. vs. Lightfoot, 10 Ala. R., 26., King & Barnes vs. Moseley, 5 Ala. R., 610. Pinkston vs. Huie, 9 Ala., 262.

The court, in the case of Pendleton vs. Phelps, indicates an opinion in accordance with the one by us expressed, for it remarks:
"This is different from the case of a demand payable at a future pe- 107 riod. We think that the words "debts or demands," clearly cover debts not due. If A promises to pay B fifty dollars in a year from the date of the promise, it certainly creates a debt on the part of A. It is the obligation or contract that creates the debt. In the words of counsel it is debitum in praesenti solvendum in futuro."

It is said that the statute of two years does not bar equities, where there is no concurrent remedy at law, and more than the statute of five years, and that the heirs and distributees of Harrison's estate are trustees for the debt due by their intestate as a member of the firm or Harrison & Wilder.

By way of response to these propositions we will cite the case of the Executors of Fisher vs. the Executors of Tucker, 1 McCord Ch. R., 169.

It was in the first place decided by Chancellor Wattes, and afterwards affirmed on appeal in the Court of Appeals in South Carolina. The circumstances of that case are very similar to the one at bar. Heriot and Tucker were copartners in trade, and they became indebted to James Fisher in the sum of £1100. Tucker, one of the firm, died, leaving Heriot the surviving partner. A bill was filed against the estate of Tucker by the Executor of Fisher, the creditor, on not being able to procure payment from Heriot, alleging his insolvency. The defendants rested their defence upon the statute of limitations. The Chancellor uses this language: "The books furnish no case in which a Court of Equity has ever felt at liberty to dispense with the operation of the statute against a legal demand, unless there has been some extrinsic equity to authorize it. The cases are numerous to the contrary, but I will only refer to the following: In Read vs. Read, 5 Ves., 744, the Court would not, on a bill for mesne profits, decree an account for more than six years, because more could be recovered at law. And it is then said that the circumstance of being obliged to sue in equity, does not alter the nature of the action for mesne profits. And in Hovenden vs. Amnesly, 2 Sch. & Lef., 630, Lord Reddesdale says: "Courts of Equity are bound to yield obedience to the statute of limitations upon all legal titles and legal demands." "It is manifest that the present demand was originally a legal one, and the circumstance of bringing it into this Court will not, as was said by the Court in the case of Reade vs. Reade, alter its original nature. It is stated to 108 have been for goods sold to the firm of Heriot and Tucker, the remedy for which was exclusively a legal one while the partners were alive, or while the survivor of them was solvent." The Chancellor decreed that the bill be dismissed.

Sir Thomas Plummer, Master of the Rolls, says, that after a bar has been fixed by statute to the legal remedy, the remedy in a Court of Equity in analagous cases has been confined to the same period. He then stated it to be clear that had the claim in question before him been a claim of a legal estate in a Court of law, the remedy would have been barred by the statute of limitations, and it was therefore, clear, that being an equitable claim, the remedy was equally barred in a court of equity. 3 Brown Ch. R., 630. Angell on Lim., 24.

"Courts of Equity," says Lord Reddesdale, "are not within the words of the statute, because the words apply only to particular legal remedies, but they are within the spirit and meaning of the statute, and have been always so considered." Angell on Lim., 25.

"Whenever," says Thomas Plummer, "any statute has fixed the period of limitations, by which the claim, if it had been made, in a Court of law, would have been barred, the claim has by analogy, been confined to the same period in a court of Equity." And the Supreme Court of the United States say, that Courts of Equity are no more exempt from statutes of limitations than Courts of law. Ib. 26. Melicot vs. O'Donnell, 1 Ball & Beauty, 156. Thomas vs. Heirs of Harvie, 10 Wheat., 149. Ib. 168, 170. 3 Bro. Ch., C., 639, note. 4 Harrington, 274.

The contract of partnership is dissolved by the death of one of the partners. At law the estate of the deceased partner cannot be proceeded against by the joint creditors, because the contract being joint, all the original parties should be joined. Of course, the surviving partner cannot be, because different judgments would have to be given. The resort of the creditor against the estate of the deceased partner must be in equity. Now does this, as a result, change the original legal contract into such an equity as to prevent the bar of the statute? A change of remedy from one at law to one in equity, should not have such a result, and more especially in the face of the words of the statute "all claims or demands of whatsoever nature."

109 To say that the statute should not be a bar in a case like the present, would be an evasion of it. The pleadings create an issue of fact, whether the claim or demand was presented or not within the two years. It is not pretended that it was presented until the 6th December, 1841, being after the expiration of the term prescribed by the statute.

We consider the other point, that the legatees and heirs of Harrison are trustees for this demand, as untenable. There is certainly no express trust, and if one is merely constructive, the statute does apply.

In the case of Townshend vs. Townshend, 1 Brown C. C., 554, the Court say—"Then, as to trusts being an exception to the statute of limitations, the rule holds only between trustees and cestui pue trusts.. It is true that the trustee cannot set it up against his cestui que trust; but this is merely the case of a trustee by implication, and as such, affected by an equity—but that equity must be pursued within some reasonable time. Both courts, of law and equity preserve an analogy to the statute of limitations."

In Lockey vs. Lockey, Prec. in Ch., 518, the Lord Chancellor was of opinion, that when one receives the profits of an infant's estate, and six years after he becomes of age he brings a bill for an account, the statute of limitations is as much a bar to the suit, as it would be to an account of law.

In Webster vs. Webster, 10 Ves., 93, a bill for an account and payment of a debt was filed against defendant, who pleaded the statute, and though regarded in equity as a trustee, the plea was held a good one. See also 194-5-6 of Angell on Limitations.

These authorities are cited in the case in 1st McCord, already referred to, and the Court in that case also confirmed the views we have taken as to this last question.

With these views, we think, therefore, there was error in granting the decree in the Court below, and it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the bill of complainant be dismissed.

110 JOHN D. GRAY, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, vs. FREDERICK BELDEN, DEFENDANT IN ERROR.

A promise or undertaking by a defendant, whose property has been levied on and advertised for sale, to pay a sum of money exceeding in amount the legal interest of the debt for which the execution was issued, upon an agreement by plaintiff to stay the execution for a certain specified time, is a usurious contract; and the sum of money so stipulated to be paid cannot be recovered.

Error to the Circuit Court of Franklin County.

This case was tried at the Spring Term, 1849, of Franklin County Circuit Court, before the HON. GEORGE S. HAWKINS, Judge of the Western Circuit. The facts were these: Gray was security on a forthcoming bond, given by one Tobey, whose slaves were levied on, for a debt of $4,000, and replevied. The slaves were not forthcoming on the day of sale; the bond was returned forfeit and execution was issued against Gray, whose property was levied on, and advertised for sale. On the day of sale, Gray agreed with one T. J. Vickers, the holder of the execution, to give and did give him a note for the sum of $200, payable thirty days after date, upon the consideration that Vickers would stay the execution for that time; and the object of this stay is stated to be, that Gray might have time to go to Mobile, and get the slaves mentioned in the forthcoming bond, and have them sold, in discharge of the execution which had been levied on his own property. The note thus given was endorsed to Belden, the defendant in error, who brought suit thereon against the maker. The defence set up was usury.

On the trial of the case, defendant's counsel prayed the Court to charge the jury—

1st. That if they believe that the note sued on was given in consideration of a forbearance of the enforcement of a debt of $4,000 for thirty days, then it is an usurious contract.

2d. That if they believe the contract usurious, then they will find for the plaintiff only so much money as may be the legal interest of $4,000 for thirty days.

3d. If the whole note is for interest, no other consideration having been proved, then the jury will find generally for defendant—which instructions the Court refused to give, but instructed the jury in sub- 111 stance as stated in the opinion of this Court, pronounced by Justice Baltzell. To this refusal of the Judge to give the instructions asked. and to the instruction given, the defendant by his counsel excepted.

Thompson, for plaintiff in error:

The errors assigned in this case are,

1. The refusal of the Judge below to instruct the jury, as prayed by the plaintiff in error. And

2. The instructions given by the Judge below to the jury.

The facts proved set forth a clear usurious transaction. A forbearance to enforce an execution for a debt in consideration of a sum of money beyond the legal rate of interest, is usurious. In this case it fully appears that the note sued upon was made and executed upon the consideration of a stay of execution for thirty days, and was in addition to the legal interest.

If we have erred in our view of this case, the long sought for device to cover an onerous and illegal exaction for the forbearance of moneys, has been discovered in this transaction, but we feel confident that even this chevizance will fail in its intended effect.

The case of Cleveland vs. Dare, decided in South Carolina in 1824, is precisely analagous with the case at bar. In that case, defendant's property was levied on, and in consideration of a postponement of the sale which was advertised for September, 1823, to the ensuing sale day, just one month, defendant gave the plaintiff his note for $100. Suit being brought upon this note, the defence was, that it was an usurious contract, and it was so held by the unanimous opinion of the Court. See Harper's Law R., 407.

So, also, in North Carolina, in the case of Carter vs. Brand, where Brand had a judgment and execution against Carter, which had been levied, and Brand agreed to stay proceedings for eighteen days, in consideration of the sum of ten dollars over and above the interest. which was paid. In an action by Carter qui tam for the penalty given by the statute, the Judges, in conference, were clearly of opinion that it was a case of usury, and it was so adjudged. Cam. & Norw. Conf. R., 28.

The facts being ascertained whether a contract is, or is not usurious, is a question of law for the Court, and it seems to me, that upon principle and reason, the Court below have adjudged this case 112 usurious.

It is not necessary to prove a corrupt agreement, for a contract may be usurious, though the parties did not know that it was contrary to law. Thompson vs. Nesbit, 2 Rich. R. 73. Marsh vs. Martindale, 3 Bos. & Pul., 159.

The Court will find in the case of Thompson vs. Nesbit, cited above, a very ingenious expedient adopted with the view "to steer clear of usury," in the sale of a chattel, but which was nevertheless determined by the Court to be an artifice to gain usurious interest.

Davis, for the defendant in error:

The contract was not usurious:—1st. Because the evidence does not show any device or attempt to violate the statute. The intent must appear. If it does not, it is not usury. 9 Pet. S. C. Rep., 399, 400, 224.

The contract was not to give further time of payment alone, so that Gray might use the money, in consideration that he would pay a certain sum by way of compensation. The agreement was, that he might have a further time, for the purpose and with the intent to enable him to produce the property of Tobey, and substitute it for his own.

2d. The consideration to support the note is not forbearance alone. The plaintiff in the fieri facias jeopardized his debt, by agreeing to stay the execution—he incurred the risk of losing his preference—he incurred the hazard of the death or absconding of the negroes. "Staying the execution," means suspending the right to proceed on the judgment. Vickers could not have seized the property, and he had no right to have a levy on a forthcoming bond. The fieri facias should have been returned, in accordance with the agreement to "stay the execution;" and a new one could not have been issued, until the expiration of the time agreed on. If there was a good and valid consideration, over and above the forbearance, and one which, in itself, would have been sufficient to have supported a promise to pay the money; and if the parties in making the agreement, had in view the production of the negroes of Tobey, and not a prolongation of the credit on the debt, the contract is valid—the fact that the sum agreed to be paid was more than legal interest, does not, of itself, 113 render it usurious. A contract to pay more than legal interest—in consideration of the loan of money, and the performance of other acts —the waiver of rights—is not usurious. 2 Con. Rep., 341. 8 Con. Rep., 513. Ibid, 52. U. S. Dig., Supp. Jus., vol 2, page 906-7.

3d. The agreement was not for a loan—it was for the continuance of a loan. The parties looked not to the ultimate payment of the debt by Gray, but to its collection from Tobey. It was to enable Gray to cause this result, that the time given. He, (Gray,)at the time he made the contract, hoped to be able to produce the property of Tobey, and to make it pay the debt. The plaintiff had the right to collect the debt then from Gray, and to leave him to seek his redress by action against the principal. The agreement was a waiver by Vickers of his said right, and a benefit to Gray, saving his property from sale, and saving the circuity of action against Tobey.

The case here varies materially from that of a forbearance by a plaintiff to proceed against an original judgment debtor—when there is no benefit arises to the defendant, but the delay—the day of payment put off—and no object on the part of either party,but to extend the credit, or to alter time. Here there are other and important object to be answered, by the forbearance to proceed under the judgment on the forthcoming bond. The object to be attained, and that which was the chief inducement which led to the formation of the contract, was, that the debt might be collected out of the property of Tobey, the principal. The intention was not that Gray should pay the money at the expiration of the day of grace, but that he might relieve himself and his property from all liability; that he did so, is fairly to be inferred from the facts stated. If he did not, it was for him to have shown it.

BALTZELL, J.

This was a suit instituted in the Court below to recover from the defendant, Gray, the amount of a note executed in 1841, for two hundred dollars. The defence was usury. On the trial, the Court below instructed in favor of plaintiff, and refused various instructions asked by defendant, to which he excepted, and has brought the matter to this Court by writ of error. It is proper that the mode of consideration by Appellate Courts of a case so situated should be well considered and understood, and I propose to regard it upon authority 114 of the Courts in England and this country, professing to follow the common law. "At common law, a writ of error lay for error in law apparent on the record, but not for an error in law not apparent upon the record. If a party alleged any matter of law at the trial, and was overruled by the Judge, he was without redress, the matter not appearing on the record." 2 Institute, 42. To remedy this evil the statute was passed which gives the bill of exceptions. It is to correct an error in law." By C. J. Marshal, ex parte Crane, &c., 5 Peters, 199. The statute passed as early as 13 Edward 1, is in these terms, "Where one is impleaded before any of the justices, and doth allege an exception praying that the justices will allow it, which if he that hath alleged the question do write the same exception, and require, the justice will put their seal as a witness, the justice shall do so." 1 Starkie, 465. "The statute is silent as to the time of tendering the bill; it has been held on reason and principle that it must be done at the trial, for the party may have misled his adversary by not insisting on his objections at the time." Ibid. 465. "It is not to draw the whole matter into examination." Again, "It is only for a single point, and the truth of it can never be doubted after the bill is sealed." "It lies only to exceptions taken at the trial to the ruling of the law by the judge, and to the admission or rejection of the evidence." "Beyond this," say the Supreme Court of the United States, "we have no power to look into the bill on a writ of error, as it is a creature of the statute, and restricted to the points stated." Ex parte Crane, &c., 5 Peters, 199. 4 Howard, 298, 401, 292, 418, 541.

"The exceptions taken at the trial," say the Court of Appeals of Virginia, "present the only points for the consideration of the Court." The Supreme Court of New York, say, "Though a jury find a verdict against the evidence, the error cannot be corrected on a bill of exceptions; the remedy is by a new trial. It (the bill) does not draw the whole matter into re-examination, but only the points upon which it is taken, and the party must lay his finger upon these points." 1 Leigh, 86. 1 Wendall, 418. 1 Cowen, 622. 14 Johnson, 304.

"The proper function of a court on a writ of error, is to pass its judgment upon the points excepted to in the opinion of the Court below, and not to decide the law of the case in anticipation of its trial below," 16 Peters, 318.

Passing then from this point we proceed to regard a question of 115 no less importance; how the instructions themselves are to be treated, and about which the decisions of the Court are equally clear.

"The charge of the Court below, should be interpreted with reference to the testimony which is shown to have preceded it, upon which, in truth, it was prayed—with reference also to the reasonable conclusions which that testimony tended obviously to establish." "In examining the charge, its whole scope and bearing must be taken together. It is wholly inadmissable to look at detached passages. In short, we are to construe the whole as it must have been understood both by the Court and jury at the time when it was delivered." Rhett vs. Poe, 2 Howard, 481. 4 Howard, 245. 7 Peters, 390. Again, "The instructions were intended by the Court to be legal conclusions from all the evidence in the case. Our inquiry will be, are they so? And as legal conclusions, were they given in such terms as in no way to encroach upon the province of the jury to weigh the evidence as to the facts of the case." Gratiot vs. United States, 4 How., 110. "It is sufficient if the instructions given are applicable to the evidence before the jury, and the merits of the case as pretended by the parties." 3 Howard, 688.

The Court below, in the case before us, instructed the jury that "the statute of usury was inapplicable to the case—that the contract was an original one, and not for the payment of money, bringing it within the statute of usury——that the consideration was a good one and that if the jury are of opinion that the note was given altogether for the forbearance to push the execution, they will find for the plaintiff." The facts upon which these instructions were given, and upon which we must base our opinion as to their correctness, are succinctly stated in the testimony of W. G. M. Davis, which indeed is all the testimony in the case, as follows: "Merchant's Bank at St. Joseph had a fieri facias for about $4000 against Tobey, whose negroes were levied on and replevied, a forthcoming bond being given, and Gray was security on the forthcoming bond. The negroes were not forthcoming on the day of the sale, and the bond was returned forfeited, and execution was issued against Gray on this bond, and his property, negroes, &c., levied on and advertised for sale. On the day of sale, by agreement, Gray gave the note sued on to Vickers, payee and holder of execution, in consideration that Vickers would stay the execution for thirty days, in order to 116 give Gray time to go to Mobile, and get the negroes mentioned in forthcoming bond, and have them sold, in discharge of the execution against him, founded on the forthcoming bond."

Do these facts present a case of usury, or of a valid and binding contract, supported by a fair and good consideration? We see a defendant in execution, occupying the position of a security, and upon whose property an execution for the large sum of $4,000 had been levied, obtaining the short grace and suspension of a month, by an engagement to pay the large sum of two hundred dollars—the legal interest is about the sum of $26.66; so that this engagement would give the plaintiff more than eight times the amount of the legal rate of eight per cent. allowed by law. Is a proceeding of this kind usurious?

We confess we cannot regard it in any other light than as embraced by this statute. The statute, in its ordinary application, acts upon voluntary engagements, created by the loan of money, where the party may, if he thinks proper, reject the terms proposed, and seek out another mode of relief. With what additional force may it not apply to a case like the present, where defendant was wholly in the power of plaintiff—no option of declining his terms—no hope of relief elsewhere; a case, indeed, in which the plaintiff in execution held the power and the dominion without control. Such a position presented temptations which the law might well desire to restrain and prevent. When it is considered, too, that our laws forfeit the interest only, there is not the reluctance felt by the Courts, on occasions where the loss of the entire debt is the consequence: nor is there any want of authority directly on the point.

The case of Cleveland vs. Ware, decided by the Constitutional Court of South Carolina, presented facts identical with the present. Defendant's property was taken under execution by the sheriff, and advertised for sale. He agreed to give his note for $100, (the execution being for $1.400.) if plaintiff would indulge until next sale day. In an action on the note, the Court say—"He secured himself an interest on the debt at the rate of about eighty-five per cent. per annum—and if such a contract was good for one month, it must be for a year, and so on, ad infinitum." They sustain their decision by reference to Pollard vs. Schley, Croke Eliz., 20, referring to

1 Vesey, Jun., 53, and declare, without hesitancy, the note to be usurious. 117

To the same effect, is a case decided by the Court of Conference of North Carolina, Carter qui tam vs. Brand, in which the agreement was to pay £10, for a stay of eighteen days on an execution of £106, and the Court declared the agreement usurious, saying—"No part of the principal is put to hazard, but the whole is actually secured by the levy; nor is the agreement to pay the excess subject to any contingency, but positive and absolute." N. Carolina Confer. Rep., 28-30. These are too clearly in point to leave the question open to argument or consideration on general principles as a new question.

The case of Smith vs. Algar, 1 B. & A., 603, to which we have been referred as sustaining the contrary doctrine, was that of a third person, bargaining with the plaintiff to stay his execution, if he would pay him £107, but his agreement was not with defendant in execution, the party was not under the pressure of the execution—was free to contract or not, as he pleased—he had not borrowed from plaintiff, nor stood security for the borrower.

It is insisted that the plaintiff in fieri facias jeopardized his debt, and incurred the risk of losing his preference; but we find no evidence to this effect in the record. There is proof only of an agreement to stay the execution, none of a release or discharge of the levy—no delivery of the property to Gray—no proof of other executions, justifying the inference that there was risk of loss. The most we can regard in proof was, that there was a suspension of the sale under execution for thirty days.

Again: It is said the agreement was not for a loan. We do not understand the statute to confine usury to such a case merely. The third section provides, that "when any note, bond, &c., shall be upon or on account of any usurious contract, the interest shall be void, and the obligor forever exonerated from the payment of the same." Duval, 78-9.

Again: It is urged that the chief inducement to the cantract was the collection of the debt out of the property of Tobey, the principal. Our proper inquiry is with the action of the plaintiff, and whether the consideration with him for granting the extension of thirty days, was not a rate of interest prescribed under the statute as usurious. There was not only an obligation on the part of Gray to 118 pay the debt, but an execution against him. It was, in effect, as if a judgment had been obtained against Gray, and his principal, with an execution issued, and an agreement had been made with either for indulgence, under the terms prescribed by the plaintiff.

We cannot distinguish the case before us from the cases to which we have already referred as conclusive. We, threfore, think the instructions given by the Court below erroneous.

The defendant moved three instructions to the jury, which the Court refused to give, and the correctness of this ruling is also presented for our consideration.

The opinion expressed above affirms the correctness of the two-first, which it is unnecessary to notice more particularly.

The third instruction asked for was, "if the whole note was for interest, (no other consideration being proved,) the jury will find for defendant."

Is it competent for a Court to thus instruct a jury? If so, under what circumstances, shauld such an instruction be given? In a recent case, decided by that very able Court, the Exchequer of England, it is said—"the judge had a right to act upon all the uncontradicted facts of a case; it is not necessary to leave every part to the jury. It is only when some doubt is attempted to be thrown upon the credibility of the witnesses, or where some contradiction occurs, or some inference is attempted to be drawn from some former fact not distinctly sworn to that the judge is called upon to submit any question to the jury." 11 Meeson & Welsby, 217.

In Ewing vs. Burnet, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, plaintiff moved the Court to instruct the jury that he was entitled to recover, which was refused and excepted to. The Court say, "before this notion could be granted, the Court must have been satisfied that there was nothing in the evidence nor any fact which the jury could lawfully infer therefrom, which could in any way prevent plaintiff's recovery." 11 Peters, 50, 51.

The case of McNeille vs. Hilbrook, decided by the same Court Ch. Justice Taney, delivering the opinion, is full to the entire question. The defendant moved to instruct the jury, that the evidence given on the part of the plaintiff was not sufficient to entitle him to recover on three of the notes, and a second instruction.

The Court refused these instructions, and directed the jury that the 119 evidence was sufficient to entitle plaintiff to recover. The Supreme Court sustained the decision, saying "as to the first instruction, the negotiation as disclosed by the testimony was concerning the time of payment and not in relation to the amount to be paid, and there was an admission of the debt," &c.

"As to the second prayer, the Court would have been unquestionably bound to give it if there had been any testimony from which the jury could have inferred that that admission was an offer of compromise. The same reasoning applies to the direction which the Court gave. If there had been any evidence conducing to prove the fact insisted upon by defendant, the jury were certainly the proper judges of its sufficiency, and the Court could not, without encroaching upon the province of the jury, have instructed them on that point. But there was no contradictory testimony, nor any testimony in relation to the credibility of the witness." 12 Peters, 88.

In Toland vs. Sprague, the error assigned was, "that whether there was a stated account was a question of fact for the jury, and that the Court erred in taking that question from them." The Court say, "the answer is, there was no dispute about the facts." 12 Peters, 336. To the same effect was the decision of the Supreme Court of Florida, in Sessions vs. Stephens, 1 Florida Reps.

There are abundant other cases of the same Court affirming the same doctrine. In the case of Thompson vs. Nisbet, the Court of Appeals of South Carolina, say, "the facts are undisputed, and present a case for the judgment of the Court with the same certainty as if they had been found by a special verdict." "Whether a contract is usurious, is a question of law. If the facts be disputed, the decision of them is submitted to the jury with instructions and if on a clear and uncontradicted state of facts, the Court does not give judgment, it surrenders to the jury its proper function and authority to enforce the law." 2 Richardson, 75.

It is believed to be the received doctrine of all the Courts in the Union, where not inhibited by special, legal prohibition. We are then, of the opinion, that the third instruction should have been given. The judgment of the Court below, will be, therefore, reversed with costs, and the cause remanded for a new trial to be held therein, not inconsistent with this opinion.

[On a subsequent day, near the close of the term, Chief Justice 120
Douglas delivered the following opinion in this case for himself and Justice Lancaster, the object and design of which will be seen by reference to the opinion itself:]

We concur in the conclusion to which Judge Baltzell has arrived in the opinion pronounced in this case: that the contract sued upon was usurious: that the Court below erred in its instructions to the jury in regard to the question which there arose, whether it was usurious or not. But we did not deem it necessary to discuss the doctrine relative to the powers of the Court to charge a jury, or the nature of the instructions that may be given, as no questions of that kind were presented by the record. It was not pretended that the Court had exceeded its powers in charging the jury,or that it had departed from the evidence in the instructions it gave, the only complaint being that it had taken an erroneous view of the law applicable to the case made by the proof. We therefore thought it better to leave those questions to be discussed when a proper case should arise.

We did not, therefore, look into the authorities cited upon those questions. The course of argument an authorities cited, seemed well calculated to leave the impression upon the mind of the reader, that this Court entertains the opinion that a Judge in this State may charge the jury upon the facts of the case, and express to them his conclusions and deductions from the testimony adduced in the case, propositions to which we cannot assent. We have, therefore, looked into some of those authorities since that opinion was pronounced, and so far as our examination has extended, we think that when they are fully read, and their whole scope and bearing duly considered, they will be found generally to sustain the doctrine laid down in 11 Peters' Reps., 50, 51, which is one of the cases to which reference is made, though the part we quote is not cited. The Court in that case, immediately following the citation alluded to, said, "it is the exclusive province of a jury, to decide what facts are proved by competent evidence. It was also their province to judge of the credibility of a witness, and the weight of testimony as tending in a greater or lesser degree to prove the facts relied on. And these were matters with which the Courts could not interfere." And this we deem to be in accordance with sound principles, and well sustained by authority. The case of Thompson vs. Nesbit, cited from 2 Richardson

121 Law Reps., 75, was a motion for a new trial on the ground that "the evidence clearly established a case of usury, and his Honor should so have charged the jury, and the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence." The Court said, "the facts are undisputed and present a case for the judgment of the Court, with the same certainty as if they had been found by a special verdict." Whether a contract is usurious is a question of law. And either because the Court had not laid down the law to the jury, upon that question, with sufficient clearness and force, or because the Court considered the verdict to be contrary to law and the evidence (it does not appear which,) a new trial was granted. The Court in the case of Mitchel vs. Williams, 11 Meeson and Welsby, 216, also cited, (which was likewise a motion for a new trial) held that where there is an uncontradicted state of facts, or the facts are immaterial, the Court need not charge the jury upon them at all, a doctrine not in accordance with that which the case of Thompson vs. Nisbet seems to have been cited to sustain. And if this be sound law, (a question we need not decide) the Court in the latter case must be presumed to have granted the new trial, because the verdict was "against law and evidence," and not because the proper instruction was not given to the jury. In regard to the case of Sessions vs. Stephens, 1 Florida R., 239, it might, perhaps, be sufficient to say, that it was decided before our statute of January 3d, 1848, "To amend the act regulating judicial proceedings," which especially prescribes that "the Judge presiding on the trial of a common law case shall charge the jury only upon the law of the case," was passed. But it may not be improper to observe that much of the language of the bill of exceptions in that case, seems to be rather that of the counsel who drew it, than of the Court speaking to the jury, for by reference to the record, it appears that it contains the following passage, viz: "In this case it was clearly proven that Sessions took the note after it became due, and that before he took it the defendant had been garnished by one James Brannon. Held that plaintiff is not entitled to recover."

The language therefore, had undoubtedly been changed, and very likely in the hurry of business some portion of the charge was inadvertently left out; but if given in that strong language to the jury, without leaving to them the question whether such facts were proven or not, the Judge who tried that cause is satisfied upon the most ma-122 ture reflection that it was not justified by sound principles even before the passage of our statute above mentioned, unless the facts were fully and distinctly admitted. And we are clearly of opinion that such mode of charging is by that statute now clearly prohibited.

The Supreme Court of Iowa, in the case of Frederick vs. Gaston, 1 Green's Reps., 403, 404, said: "It is very evident to us, that the Court instructed the jury upon questions of fact, which we think the Court ought never to interfere with in jury trials. At common law, it is true, (Say the Court,) the facts and testimony were taken up in this order by the Judge, and placed in review before the jury, and the practice was frequently carried to such an alarming extent that the jury became mere machines in the hands of the Court, to reflect back a verdict, which the Court would more than intimate, by a particular reference to and application of the facts;" and after noticing that, in many States of the Union, it is the practice of the Courts to charge the jury upon the facts, say—"But, in this State, the Legislature, to protect the people against any such interference of the Court, upon matters of fact submitted to the jury, and to secure to the parties a just and perfect trial, have passed a law, by which the Courts are confined to instructing the jury upon questions of law." The statute provides that the District Court, in charging the jury, shall only instruct them as to the law of the case, (citing Revised Statutes, page 475, sec. 35,) and adding—"The only safe rule is to confine the Courts to the law;" and in this sentiment we fully agree with that Court, and we deem it very important that the boundaries between the power of the Court and the province of the jury should be distinctly preserved. In the case of the King vs. The Dean of St. Asoph, Lord Mansfield observed, "That the fundamental definition of trial by jury depended upon the universal maxim, Ad questionem juris respondent juratores, ad questionem, facti non respondent judices;'" and his Lordship added, "Where a question can be severed by the form of the pleadings, the distinction is preserved upon the face of the record, and the jury cannot encroach upon the jurisdiction of the Court—where, by the form of the pleadings, the two questions are blended together, and cannot be separated, upon the face of the record, this distinction is preserved by the honesty of the jury. The constitution trusts that, under the direction of a Judge, they will not usurp a jurisdiction that is not their province.

They do not know, and are presumed not to know, the law—they 123 are not sworn to decide the law—they are not required to decide the law. It is the duty of the Judge, in all cases of general justice, to tell the jury how to do right, though they have the power to do wrong, which is a matter entirely between God and their own consciences." 21 Howard's State Trials, 1039, 1040.

Mr. Hargrave, in a note to Coke on Litt,1551, after a dissertation on the subject, marked with his usual refined learning, states the result to be, "that the immediate and direct right of deciding upon questions of law is entrusted to the judges—that in a jury, it is only incidental—that, in the exercise of this incidental right, the latter was not only placed under the superintendence of the former, but are in some degree controlled by them, and therefore, that, on all points of law arising on a trial, juries ought to show the most respectful deference to the advice and recommendation of the judges." 2 Wynne Eunomous. Bushell's case, 6 Howard's State Trials, 999, 1008, 1013, 1014. Vaughan Rep., 135, S. C. Franklin's case, 17 Howard's State Trials, 625. The King vs. Woodfall, 5 Burrow, 2661. To all this we freely assent; but the principle here asserted by Lord Mansfield is to be taken in connection with what is said by the same learned judge and distinguished jurist viz: "That the fundamental definition of the trial by jury depends upon a universal maxim, which is without exception; though a definition or maxim without exception, it is said, is hardly to be found, yet his Lordship considered this to be a maxim without exception—'Ad questionem juris non respondent juratores ad questionem facti, non respondent judices.'" Worthington on Juries, 131, 132. "That declaration in our books, 'Ad questionem facti, non respondent judices, ad questionem legis, non respondent juratores,' taken literally (says the author,) is true; for if it be demanded what is fact, the Judge cannot answer it." Worthington on Juries, 129, 130, 27 Law Library, 42, 43.

Our statute was doubtless passed for the same purpose as that of Iowa, to secure to the parties a full and perfect trial, without interference of the Court upon matters of fact, and preserve the purity of jury trials. We have deemed it advisable to say this much upon this subject by way of protestando ex abundanti cautela, lest, hereafter, at any time it should be said that we had assented to doctrines which 124 tend to sustain a course of proceeding, not in accordance with the provisions of our statute above mentioned, which, in our opinion, governs the Courts of this State, upon the subject we have had occasion to consider. [Note.]

JASPER STRONG, APPELLANT, VS. GEORGE WILLIS, ET AL. APPELLEES.

A trustee cannot renounce, after having accepted the trust, but must execute the provisions of the trust deed.

A deed of trust conveying property to trustees, for the sole and separate use of the grantor's wife and children, free from the debts of the grantor, secures the property so conveyed against the debts and claims of the trustees executing the deed, and accepting the trust. A trustee executing such a deed and accepting the trust, cannot assail it as fraudulent, and subject the property to the payment of a debt due to himself from the grantor. An attempt to do so is a breach of trust—he cannot be both trustee and assailant of the trust deed.

Jasper Strong field his bill in the Circuit Court of Escambia County, against George Willis, Mary B. Dallas, Alexander J. Dallas, Jr., Byrd C. Dallas and Henrietta C. Dallas, alleging and setting forth—That, in the summer of the year 1838, he entered into a verbal contract with Alexander J. Dallas, since deceased, whereby it was agreed that he should erect and finish a dewelling house for the NOTE—Judge Baltzell requests the Reporter to state, that the foregoing opinion was not submitted to him, nor was it considered in conference with the Judges. Several weeks after the principal opinion was delivered by him as the judgment of the Court, the Chief Justice produced and read in open Court, the foregoing as the opinion of himself and Judge Lancaster, and this was the first time Judge B. saw it. He does not (he states) feel called upon to express his approbation of, or dissent from, the views taken, which he might have done, if the opportunity had been afforded him, according to the regular action of the Court. If the majority disagree with the sentiments or views expressed in an opinion, their course (in the opinion of Judge B.) is to recall and correct it. But they are concluded from dissent, after allowing an opinion to be read in Court as their judgment.

The Reporter would add, that there is no difference between the two opinions upon the only question in the case—that is, whether the contract sued on was usurious or not.

said Dallas on lot number 276, in the City of Pensacola; that he should keep an account of the expense of the work and materials furnished, and that said Dallas should pay him for the same, upon the completion thereof; that this contract and agreement were fully executed on his (complainant's) part, at an expense of upwards of six thousand dollars; that on the thirty-first day of December, 1838, a deed of trust was executed by the said Dallas, in behalf of his wife, Mary B. Dallas, and his children, the said Alexander J. Dallas, Jr., Byrd C. Dallas and Henrietta J. Dallas, whereby the said lot and building and other property were conveyed to complainant and G. Willis, (who is made a party defendant,) for the use and benefit of the said wife and children of Alexander J. Dallas; that complainant executed the deed and accepted the trust, but with no intention on his part to surrender any legal or equitable right which he might have to enforce against the property of the said Dallas the payment of his debt; that Alexander J. Dallas died in the year 1844, the debt to the complainant being due and unpaid, and that Mary B. Dallas, his widow administered upon his estate; that, in the year 1847, complainant obtained a judgment against the administratrix for the sum of four thousand one hundred and seventy-five dollars and 98-100, being the amount due him under the contract and agreement before referred to; that the execution issued on the judgment aforesaidwas levied on the lot No. 276, in the City of Pensacola, there being no personal property of the intestate in the hands of the administratrix to be administered, and no lands or tenements not conveyed by said deed of trust.

The bill then charges that the settlement attempted to be made by said deed was made upon the said wife of the intestate after marriage; and that with reference to all the beneficiaries under the said trust, it was purely voluntary and without valuable consideration and that the complainant is not barred or precluded from the payment of the debt due to him from the said Dallas, by reason of his having been a party to the said deed of trust.

The specific relief prayed for is, that the property levied on may be sold for the satisfaction and payment of the judgment at law, and that defendants be perpetually enjoined from setting up any claim to said property.

The following is the deed of trust referred to in complainant's bill, and prayed to be taken and considered as a part thereof:—

126 This indenture tripartite between Alexander J. Dallas of the first part, George Willis and Jasper Strong, their heirs, executors and administrators, of the second part, Mary Byrd Dallas, wife of Alexander J. Dallas, and Alexander James Dallas., Jr., Byrd C. Dallas, and Henrietta Constantia Dallas, children of the said Alexander J. Dallas; That is to say, Alexander James Dallas, Jr., by his former wife, and Byrd C. Dallas and Henrietta Constantia Dallas, by his present wife, Mary Byrd Dallas: Whereas, the said Alexander J. Dallas is desirous of providing more effectually for the support and maintenance of his said wife Mary Byrd, and his said children: Now this indenture witnesseth, that the said Alexander J. Dallas, for and in consideration of the premises, and for and in consideration of the natural love and affection which he hath and beareth towards his said children, Alexander James, Byrd C., and Henrietta Constantia, and for the purpose of providing more effectually for the support and maintenance of his wife, Mary Byrd, during her life, and for and in consideration of the sum of ten dollars to him in hand paid by the said George Willis and Jasper Strong, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, he, the said Alexander J. Dallas, hath given, granted, bargained, and sold, aliened, enfeoffed, conveyed, and confirmed, and by these presents doth grant, bargain, sell, alien enfeoff convey and confirm, unto the said George Willis and Jasper Strong, their heirs, executors, and administrators, the following pieces, parcels, or tracts of land, situated and bounded as follows, to-wit: a certain lot or parcel of land, situate, lying and being in the city of Pensacola, and know on the plan of the said city as number two hundred and seventy-six, (276,) containing eighty feet front on Intendencia street, by one hundred and seventy in depth. Also the following tracts of land, lying, situate, and being in the county of Escambia and Territory of Florida, viz: Fractional section twenty-nine, (29,) of township two, (2) range thirty,South and West containing thirty-eight acres and fifty hundreths of an acre. Also, Franctional section twenty-seven, (27) township two, (2) range thirty, (30) South and West, containing one hundred and nine acres. The aforesaid lands being in the district of lands subject to sale at Tallahassee, Florida. Also, a certain lot situated on Intendencia street in the city of Pensacola, and known and distinguished in the plan of the said city by the numbers or figures two hundred and seventy-five (275,) containing eighty feet front on In- 127 tendencia street, and one hundred and seventy feet in depth. Also the following negro slaves, to wit: A certain negro woman named Fanny and her future increase. Also, Lydia and her future increase. Also, a certain negro woman named Betsey, together with her future increase.

To have and to hold, the aforesaid pieces, parcels or tracts of land, together with their improvements and appurtenances, and also, the negro slaves aforesaid, with their future increase, unto the said George Willis and Jasper Strong, their executors and administrators In trust, nevertheless, to, and for the following uses, intents and purposes, and to and for no other use, intent or purpose whatsoever: That is to say, in trust to and for the sole and seperate use, benefit and behoof of the said Mary Byrd, wife of the said Alexander J. Dallas, and the said children, Alexander James Dallas, Jr., Byrd C. Dallas, and Henrietta Constantia Dallas, free and exempt from the debts, contracts, and incumbrances of the said Alexander J. Dallas, free and exempt from any control, right, title, interest or property on the part of the said Alexander J. Dallas, of in and to the same or the rents, issues, or increase or profits thereof, but the said several pieces, tracts or parcels of land, together with the improvements, rents issues, and profits thereof as well also the several negro slaves aforesaid, together with their future increase, profits and issues, to be and remain to the sole and separate use, benefit, and behoof of the said Mary Byrd, wife of the said Alexander J. Dallas, and the said children, Alexander James Dallas, Jr., Byrd C. Dallas, and Henrietta Constantia Dallas, and to be used and appropriated in manner and form as hereinafter prescribed, to wit: The rents, issues, and profits of the said several tracts, pieces or parcels of land, together with their appurtenances; also, the said several slaves, their future increase as aforesaid, shall be appropriated in equal proportions to the support and maintenance of the said Mary Byrd, and the said children, Alexander James Dallas, Jr., Byrd C Dallas, and Henrietta Constantia Dallas, for and during the life of the said Mary Byrd; and after the death of the said Mary Byrd, the said several tracts of land and the said negro slaves shall be equally divided between the said Alexander James Dallas, Jr., Byrd C. Dallas, and Henrietta Constantia Dallas. But the said Mary Byrd, wife of the said Alexander J. Dallas, shall have her elections to use, 128 occupy and enjoys and one of the aforesaid several pieces or parcels of land with its improvements, also any one of the several slaves aforesaid with her future increase, as an equivalent for her proportion of interest, or profit under this deed, although it may exceed in value and profits her rateable portion under this deed; and in the event of such an election being made by her, and exceeding the rents, issues, increase, and profits, then the remainder of the property shall be equally divided between the said children.Alexander James Dallas Jr., Byrd C., and Henrietta Constantia, but should such a selection fall short in value of her third or proportion of the rents, issues, increase or profits, the said trustees shall make good the deficit.

In witness whereof, the parties to these presents have hereto set their hands and seals at Pensacola, this 31st day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight.

A. J. DALLAS, [Seal.]
GEO. WILLIS, [Seal.]
JASPER STRONG, [Seal.]

To this bill the defendants filed a demurrer.

At the Fall Term, 1849, of the Circuit Court of Escambia County, Hon. George S. Hawkins, Judge of the Western Circuit, presiding, this cause having been by consent set down for final hearing, and having been heard on the bill and demurrer, it was decreed by the Court that the demurrer be sustained, and that the bill of complainant be dismissed for want of equity, and that complainant pay all costs, &c.

From this decree, the complainant prayed an appeal to the Supreme Court, and it was granted him.

B. D. Wright, for appellant:

In this case, the bill and demurrer present the following facts:

1st. In 1838, Alexander J. Dallas, deceased, employed Strong, the complainant, to build him a dwelling house in Pensacola. This Strong did, at large expense to himself, receiving from Dallas, but a small sum in part payment.

2d. In 1839, Dallas executed a deed of trust to George Willis and the complainant whereby he conveyed to them the lot whereon said house was built, and all his other property, in trust for Mary B. Dallas, his wife and his three children. 129

3d. That said deed of trust had no other consideration but the love and affection of the said Dallas for his said wife and children.

4th. That suit at law was afterwards brought against the administratrix of Dallas, and a judgment was recovered against her as such, by the said Strong, for the sum of $, the balance due to Strong, upon the contract for building the house.

5th. That execution issued on the judgment, and was levied on the house and lot in question—no other property of the intestate being found.

The object of the bill is to relieve the property of the pretended title growing out of the deed of trust, so that the same may be sold for the satisfaction of the judgment.

The only question in the case is, whether the deed of trust is available, as against the pre-existing debt of the complainant. And this depends upon the question whether the complainant's being a party to the deed of trust destroys, or otherwise affects his rights as a creditor.

A careful comparison of our statute with that of 13th Elizabeth, will show that the two statutes are identical in principle, and nearly so in terms. These statutes strike directly at all voluntary conveyances, and instead of requiring proof of the intent to defraud, (as was, to a certain extent, required at common law,) they infer the intent (as against pre-existing debts) from the voluntary nature of the conveyance. The common law opposed itself to actual fraud in all aspects; but the common law was not adequate to the preservation of the rights of creditors and purchasers; and so the statute has set up certain indicia of fraud; thus making it a question of law, rather than of fact. 7th Cowen, 304. 9th John. Rep., 342. Roberts on Fraudulent Conveyances, 83, 450, 451.

In the case of such conveyance, when the person making it is indebted at the time, the conveyance is void ipso facto; in case of subsequent indebtedness, (or a subsequent conveyance,) such voluntary conveyance is void by relation merely. In the earlier cases decided under 13th Elizabeth, some contrariety of opinion seems to have prevailed, as to the effect of family settlements upon the right of subsequent creditors, (the party making such settlements not being 130 indebted at the time.) 2nd Atkins, 13. 2d Ves., 10. 2nd At., 520.

But there never was a case since the passage of the 13th Elizabeth, where a merely voluntary conveyance was deemed good, as against the rights of a creditor existing at the time of the conveyance 1 At., 94. 2d At., 600.

This is not denied on the other side, but it is contended that a distinct inquiry is here presented, by the complainant's being one of the trustees. Let us examine. At law and in equity, the property in question was responsible for the debt of complainant, as against any one claiming under a merely voluntary conveyance—that is to say, such conveyance was void as to this debt. Strong had a right so to consider it.

If, then, the conveyance was void as to Strong's debt, the accident of his being one of the trustees does not give it validity, unless it be upon the ground that concealment is, in such cases, a necessary indicium of fraud; and so far is this from being the case, that even a purchaser, for valuable consideration, (under the 27th Elizabeth,) may treat a former voluntary conveyance as fraudulent, though he had full notice of such voluntary conveyance when he purchased.—5 Co. Rep., 60. Cowper, 278. 4th Atkins, 412.

The language of the statute is, "for the intent and purpose of defrauding," &c. Some of the decided cases go to the length of establishing the principle, that the "intent and purpose" here denounced, may exist in the purchaser, as well as in the seller, and that even a conveyance, for an adequate valuable consideration, shall be deemed void, as against pre-existing debts, where it is ascertained that the purchaser knew of the intent to defraud. Strong's assenting, then, (for his being a party to the deed amounts to no more,) to this deed of trust, does not in the least affect the "intent" of the other party. This must be judged of by the effect of the conveyance, which certainly is to "hinder, delay and defraud."

Assuming that this conveyance, then, was void, on account of its being voluntary, there is no force whatever in the objection that Strong is one of the trustees. His being so, does not make the conveyance more or less voluntary. The only difficulty in the case grows out of the misuse of the word "fraudulent." It matters not though the most perfect good faith existed in a transaction of this sort—still, if those badges of fraud (to wit, a voluntary conveyance 131 and indebtedness at the time) be presented by the case, they are conclusive.

W. Anderson, for appellee:

The deed from Dallas to Strong and Willis, in trust for the wife and children of the grantor, is sought to be set aside by Strong as fraudulent upon the ground that Dallas was indebted to Strong at the time of its execution.

It is to be observed that Strong was himself a party to the deed, he having accepted the trust under his hand and seal.

As a voluntary conveyance is not fraudulent of itself, it is necessary to inquire whether under the circumstances of this case Dallas committed a fraud either actual or constructive on Strong. "The mere fact of indebtment at the time does not, per se, constitute a substantive fraud to avoid the voluntary conveyance even in regard to prior creditors—but the question whether it is fraudulent or not is to be ascertained from all the circumstances of the case—and if the circumstances do not establish fraud, then the voluntary conveyance is deemed above all exception." 1 Story's Eq., pp. 354-5.

Dallas, making the conveyance to Strong, of course proves no concealment was designed. Strong, accepting and ratifying the trust, waives all objection to the conveyance, and negatives any fraudulent intent on the part of Dallas.

If there was an absence of fraud, the deed cannot be set aside 3 Desau, 1.

Strong is also estopped from denying the validity of this deed by being a voluntary party to it.

BALTZELL, J.

This is a suit in Chancery by the complainant, Strong, alleging indebtedness of the late Alexander J. Dallas, to an amount of nearly six thousand dollars, through a contract made in the summer of 1838, for the erection and finishing of a dwelling house on lot 276, in the city of Pensacola. The bill alleges that in December of that year, a deed of trust was executed by the said Dallas in behalf of his wife and children, whereby the said lot and building and property were conveyed to complainant and the defendant, Willis, as trustees for the use and benefit of the said wife and children. Complainant 132 alleges that "he became a party to the deed of trust by accepting the trust, but with no intention on his part to surrender any legal or equitable right which he might have to enforce against the property of the said Dallas, the payment of his debt abovementioned, and set forth," and he asks for a sale of the trust property. The defendants demur to the bill, and raise the simple question whether it is competent for a party, after having by his signature, accepted the trusts of a deed, thus to complain of it as fraudulent. It is purely a question of law, and to be decided as if the facts presented by the bill had been admitted by the answer. The office of trustee, his duty, rights, powers, and obligations are now well ascertained and understood (having been declared by the Courts in such terms) as to create an exclusive branch of equity jurisprudence. Amongst the rules established, we recognize the following:—"The trustee holds the estate for the cestui que trust, and to effect the purposes and objects declared by the deed." He cannot renounce, after acceptance, but must execute its provisions. He is bound to convey, at the direction of his cestui que trust, and may be compelled by suit to fulfill any particular act of duty. If the estate is assailed, his duty is to protect it—he may be enjoined from committing a breach of trust, and his laches or tort shall not effect the cestui que trust. Bearing in mind then, these principles, let us examine the trust deed in the case under consideration, to ascertain, the duties imposed and the trusts and covenants assumed by the trustees, and to see how far the individual right of one of them, as presented by this bill, may be consistent with them. The deed is in the usual form, and as a copy of it will be given by the reporter, we refer only to the material parts of it. The conveyance is declared to be in "trust for the sole and separate use, benefit and behoof of the sole and separate use of the wife and children, free and exempt from the debts, contracts and incumbrances of the said Alexander J. Dallas, free from any control, right, title interest or property of the said Dallas," and provides that the rents and profits of the land, &c., shall be appropriated to the support and maintenance of the said wife and children." This, undoubtedly, is an express declaration on the part of Willis and Strong, the trustees signing the deed, that the property shall not be disposed of to pay the debts of the grantor, amongst which clearly would be embraced debts

133 due to the trustees as well as to any one else. The property is not only not to be subject to the debts of Dallas, the grantor, but the trustees engage that it shall be appropriated to the support of the family. If assailed by a stranger, the duty of such trustee would be to defend and protect the property, and he would be compelled to do so.

Does he occupy a more favorable position, as far as his own rights are concerned? Can he, who has undertaken by his solemn act to defend this property, and carry into effect its objects and purposes of express and specific character, be permitted himself to turn round, repudiate the trust, and defeat and destroy it?

If the design of complainant was, as he states it to have been in his bill, not to surrender any equitable or legal right which he might have to the property, he should have insisted upon a declaration to that effect in the deed, and his neglect to do so, should be regarded as a waiver on his part. The deed is equivalent to a covenant or agreement on his part, that the property should be free from his own debt, as it undertakes to defend it generally against the debts, contracts and incumbrances of the grantor. Not a case has been exhibited to us in which a trutsee has been permitted in a Court of Equity to accupy such an anomalous position; and to allow it, would be to assume a position directly in opposition to all the leading and governing principles and rules upon which this branch of equity has been constructed. This would, indeed, be giving judicial sanction to such a design.

One of the rules alluded to above is, that, in attempting an injury to the trust property, the trustee acts without warrant, and in breach of his duty. What more serious injury—what more intolerable breach of trust, than to assert a right in the trust property, for his own individual purposes?—to ask that property, which, by his own act, has been confided to his care, to guard and protect for the wife and children of the grantor, shall be sold and appropriated to his own use?

Another principle, common to this as well as to every other branch of the law, is, that a man should not be permitted to allege his own fraud. If decedent was in debt, so as to make this deed a fraud as to creditors, complainant did wrong in aiding and sanctioning the act. It cannot be regarded as a fraud as to himself—for by his free act, his solemn deed, he has consented, as he had a full right to do, that the property should not be subject to his debts, but that he would look to other means for payment.

134 The case of a purchaser, for a valuable consideration, with notice of a prior fraudulent sale, is not that of complainant. As to him, such sale is in law a nullity, as if it never had been made. It is not a matter to which he is committed, and with which he had any connection or concern. It would be different, if such a purchaser had been pledged by solemn deed to sustain the very claim which he was asking leave of the Court to assail.

It may be a case of hardship for the complainant; but it is not the province of the Courts nor of the law to compensate the deficiencies of parties, or repair the consequences attending their neglect or inattention. If we mistake not, a law of the State provides a lien to mechanics, which might have been available to complainant—or he might, before undertaking the work, have required security—or, by declining the office of trustee, he might have occupied the position of a creditor, so as to assert the defects or fraud in a deed or deeds made to his prejudice or injury; but he cannot be both trustee and assailant of the trust deed; he cannot be both maintainer and holder of the legal title, and the asserter of its invalidity. For these reasons, we think the decree of the Court below must be affirmed, with costs.

ISAAC W. MITCHELL, APPELLANT, vs. FREDERICK R. COTTEN, EXECUTOR OF JOHN W. COTTEN, APPELLEE.

Under the discretion vested in the Courts by the act of November, 1828, section 50, in reference to the allowance of amendments in pleadings at any time before trial, the plea of the statute of limitations may be filed.

Admissions made by the counsel of a party must be made in his presence, and without objection, to be binding upon him. Admissions by counsel of the law will not affect his client's rights, if there should be error in the admission.

The act of 1833, in regard to usurious contracts, declares that "the interest on the same shall be void, and the obligor or obligors forever exonerated from paying the same." This provision making only the interest void, excludes the idea of making void the principal.

Concealment by a creditor from a surety of material facts, by which the surety 135 may be injured, or his rights affected, will invalidate the contract as to him, and discharge him from all liability. But the contract between the principal parties, of which a surety, without privity, can avail himself, for his discharge, on the ground of concealment, must be a valid contract as between the principals; and the act or transaction of which the surety seeks to avail himself for his discharge, must be such as lessens the ability of the principal to comply with his contract, or alters the rights of the parties, or enlarges the demand, to the prejudice of the surety.

The statute declaring that the whole interest only shall be void in a usurious contract, does not enlarge, but diminishes, the liability of the surety. An agreement therefore between the principals for usurious interest, to which agreement the surety was not a party or privy, does not discharge the surety from his liability on the principal valid contract between the parties.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of Leon County.

On the trial of this cause in the Court below, at the Fall Term, Hon. THOMAS BALTZELL, Judge of the Middle Circuit, presiding, the same issues were tried that were presented and tried on a former trial between the same parties at the Spring Term, 1847, of said Court. Two othr issues were taken and tried in this case, upon two additional and amendatory pleas, which the Court permitted the defendant to file, viz: The plea of the statute of limitations, and a plea of the discharge of Cotten, the surety, by reason of an alleged giving of time, and extension of credit to Doggett, the principal, without the knowledge or consent of the surety.

The testimony submitted to the jury was the same that was given on the former trial—a statement of which (as well as of the pleadings) will be found in the report of the case between the same parties, in the second volume of Florida Reports, page 136, and in the report of the case of Mitchell vs. Doggett, decided at January Term, 1847. See 1st Florida Rep., 356.

On the trial of this cause, plaintiff's counsel moved the Court to instruct the jury, as follows:

1. That the plaintiff may recover the consideration given for any usurious note or security on the money counts, provided there is no usury in the consideration itself.

2. If the jury believe, from the evidence, that the note of the first day of January, 1839, contained no usury, and was a valid contract in all respects, and was the consideration of the subsequent usurious contract, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover the principal sum of 136 said note, with legal interest thereon, up to the period of the making of the subsequent usurious contract, under the money counts in the declaration.

3. That our statute avoids only the interest on an usurious contract, and has nothing to do with interest or principal of a prior contract between the same parties, though such contract may be used as the consideration for a usurious contract; but the creditor is entitled to recover for his principal sum due and the legal interest up to the time of making such usurious contract.

4. The party setting up fraud, concealment, or giving time without consent of surety, or other matter in discharge of surety, must prove his allegations in discharge of himself.

5. That if the jury believe, from the evidence, that a promise was made by Henry Doggett, the principal debtor, to pay usurious interest in future for forbearance, such promise is void, and does not operate to discharge the surety, but both principal and surety are liable to pay the principal debt and legal interest up to the time of the making the usurious contract.

6. That both Cotten and Doggett being bound in the first instance, and the giving the note with the usurious premium being a subsequent and a distinct transaction, although the note declared on, or any part thereof, might be void, the pre-existing debt may be recovered on the money counts.

7. By our law, if the jury find usury, they can only deduct interest from the time the usury commences.

8. If two or more persons are jointly, validly bound, the law implies that the consideration passed to both of them.

9. That, under the statute of usury, a note or other security given upon a usurious contract, is not declared or made void, but the statute acts upon and makes void so much of the contract as relates to the interest secured thereby, both legal and the excess thereof; in other words, acts upon the contract, so far as the interest is concerned, from the time at which such illegal and usurious contract for extra interest is entered into and made.

10. That any acknowledgement or admission that the debt is a present and subsisting debt and unpaid, from which a promise to pay may reasonably be implied, will be equivalent to an express promise, 137 and will equally support the action; and when a general acknowledgement of a present subsisting debt is made, where nothing is said to prevent it, a general promise to pay may and ought to be implied.

11. That it is not necessary that the acknowledgement should state the amount of the debt—extrinsic evidence is admissible to prove that.

12. If the jury believe, from the evidence, that John W. Cotten, by his letter of the 25th November, 1844, acknowledged and admitted a present subsisting indebtment on account of the debt due by Doggett and Cotten specified therein, then that the law implies a promise therefrom to pay, and will save the bar of the statute, if within five years prior to the institution of the suit.

Which said instructions, excepting the tenth (10th) and twelfth. (12th,) the said Judge did then and there give in charge to the jury; and the said tenth (10th) and twelfth (12th) instructions, the said Judge did refuse to give in charge to the said jury.

And the said Judge did further instruct and charge the jury as follows, to wit:

13. "If you shall be of opinion, from the evidence, that at the "time of entering into the note sued upon for $15,955, of January, "1841, signed by H. Doggett and J. W. Cotten, that J. W. Cotten "was only security, and not primarily liable for the debt, by having re- "ceived part of the consideration, and another note was given by the "principal, Doggett, for the sum of $———, for part interest of said "note, as part of the contract, but extending the same two and a half "per cent. further, unknown to, and without any communication "with, the security, so that he remained wholly ignorant that twelve "and a half per cent. interest was in fact agreed to be paid by his "principal, instead of ten per cent., as agreed by the note executed "by the two, that this in law is a fraud on the security, invalidates "his note and agreement, and plaintiff has not a right to recover "thereon.

14. "That, under the decision of the Supreme Court, the note of "1839 is evidence of a debt against defendant, under the common "counts, and that plaintiff is entitled to recover thereon, unless pre- "vented by the statute of limitations.

15. "That the statute of limitations is a bar to the recovery of the "plaintiff on the note of 1839, five years having run upon it.

138 16. "That the letter of Cotten does not make a new promise, nor "revive any engagement of Cotten; its object seems to have been "to urge Mitchell to the early collection of the debt. To revive a "debt barred by the statute, there must be an express promise to "pay."

And the jury found a verdict for defendant.

And the said plaintiff, by his counsel, excepted and excepts to the refusal of the Judge to give in charge to the jury the tenth and twelfth instructions prayed and asked for by him; and also to the instructions and charge given to the jury by the said Judge, numbered thirteen, fourteen, fifteen and sixteen, as above set forth; and, inasmuch as the several matters hereinbefore stated and set forth, and his exceptions, do not appear of record, the plaintiff, by his counsel, presents this his bill of exceptions, and prays that the same may be signed and sealed by the Court, and be made part of the record; and it is done accordingly.

NOTE.—On the trial of the said cause, and after the evidence on both sides had been closed and submitted to the jury, the counsel for the plaintiff, who first addressed the jury and opened the cause, disclaimed and abandoned all right and purpose to recover under the first count of his declaration, and on the note dated 2d January, 1841, on which said count was founded; but stated that he claimed to recover under the general indebitatus assumpsit accounts, and on the note dated 1st January, 1839, for the sum of $13,186, for the amount of that note with interest, which said last mentioned note the said counsel then held in his hand and exhibited to the jury, as his then subsisting cause of action; and the arguments and addresses of the defendant's counsel were then made to the jury and the Court, on the state of plaintiff's case; and, further, the counsel for the plaintiff, who concluded the argument to the jury, maintained his right to recover on the note of 1841; and having denied that the plaintiff's counsel were precluded from maintaining their action on the said first count of their declaration, and on the note of 2d January, 1841, the cause of action therein declared on, by reason of any statement or admission made by the leading and opening counsel in his address to the jury, and denying that any such had been made. Thereupon the defendant's counsel moved the Court to instruct the jury as follows:

"That if the jury believe that the opening counsel for the plain- 139 tiff placed his ground of recovery on the note bearing date in 1839, and on the general indebitatus assumpsit counts, that it is not competent for the concluding counsel for the plaintiff, after the counsel for defendant have concluded their argument to the jury, to revive and urge the recovery of the note, dated in 1841. That the plaintiff is held to have abandoned that first count, and all recovery under it."

Which charge the Court refused to give, but allowed the plaintiff to claim before the jury a recovery on either and both counts, extending at the same time permission to the defendant's counsel to argue the case again to the jury, if they thought fit—of which permission, one of the defendant's counsel availed himself, so far as he thought proper.

To which ruling, defendant by his counsel excepted, and prays that the same may be certified and presented as part of the record of the case on the appeal of the plaintiff.

Brockenbrough, for appellant.

I

1. The Court erred in permitting defendant to amend his pleadings by filing the plea of the statue of limitations: Because the statute being a strict defence, the Court should not relieve the party by permitting him to amend by adding the plea. Angell on Limitation, 312, 313. Jackson vs. Varick, 2 Wend., 294. Johnson vs. Green, 4 Gill and Jo., 381.

2. The plea of the statute of limitations will not be received unless put in in due time, or amended if defective. La Motte vs. McLaughlin, 3 Har. and McH., 324. Perkins vs. Perkins' Ex'r, 1 Har. and McH., 400.

3. Defendant will not be allowed to add the plea of the statute. Cox vs. Holt, 2 Wilson, 253.

4. It is never allowed after issue joined. Hallegan vs. Golden, 1 Wend., 302. 1 Arch. Pr., 124.

5. On setting aside a judgment by default on affidavit of merits, the defendant will be required to withdraw the plea of the statute. Fox vs. Baker, 2 Wend., 244.

6. It is not allowed to be added to a plea of the general issue, in an action of trespass for mesne profits. 2 Yeates, 279.

II. 140

1. The Court erred in refusing the plaintiff's instructions, 10 and 12. Archbold on Plead and Evid. Pr., 28. Tanner vs. Smart, 6 Barn. and Cress., 603, 609. 2 Greenleaf Evidence.

III.

The Court erred in the instructions which it gave, numbered 13. 15 and 16.

As to 13, see Cotten vs. Mitchell, decided here last term, and 1 Comstock, 278.

As to 16, see cases cited before on 2d head, from Archbold. Barnwell and Creswell, and Greenleaf.

Also, 1 Espinasse, 435. Bailey et al. vs. Lord Inchiqui, and notes there cited. Perley vs. Little, 3 Greenleaf, 101. Porter vs. Hill, 4 Greenleaf, 42. Deshon vs. Eaton, 4 Greenleaf, 414. Bangs vs. Hall, 2 Pickering, 378. Whitney vs. Bigelow, 4 Pickering, 111 Moore vs. Bank of Columbia, 6 Peters, 93. Allen vs. Webster, 15 Wend., 289.

We have cited the strongest cases against us—the most stringent rule—we claim that Cotten's letter covers all. Otherwise it is a delusion—a vain thing. If he is not liable—if he never means to pay in any event—why write—why urge collection—why speak of liability—why of duty to his family—why press Doggett—why complain of time?

To say that he means to pay—"I owe it—press Doggett—but in any event I will never pay it"—is to force his words and wrest their meaning, to that which is palpably farthest from his thoughts.

Yet that must be done to bring that letter within the line of exclusion laid down by the cases.

IV.

But besides the necessary and clear implication of liability and duty and consequent promise of the letter itself, it refers to another paper, which is therefore a part of it—"the note you now hold * * since I last signed with him." It is proved to have been the note of 1841.

It is as much part of the letter as if incorporated in it. The letter thus gives us not only the implication, but the express promise.

It is no answer to say the note of 1841 is tainted with usury It is part of the letter.

141 1. And the usury then first commenced, and therefore he admitted he owes the debt before it began to run on usurious interest. The very allegation is, that usury was given for the further forbearance.

2. But if wholly void for usury or any other cause, it would still be proof of admission and promise—of those isolated facts—to bar the statute. Utica Ins. Co. vs. Kip, 3 Wendall, 373. Allen vs. Webster, 15 Wend., 289.

3. Apart from this, we have the note itself besides the letter, and the note is not void by any law. Only the interest on it is evaded.

4. Besides these, we have the evidence of Doggett evoked by themselves, which is conclusive, that Cotten owed, and promised in 1841.

V.

This letter seems conclusive in our favor on the money counts, or account stated. Upon it we must recover the debt due for eight years, and interest. He asks a statement of the principal and interest. To what purpose, if he never meant to pay it? He complains that the debt is constantly growing larger. Is this no promise? If we render that letter in common language, as all would interpret it, it is this: How much do I owe? I have been security a long time—nothing is paid—the debt increases—I wish to be relieved from my responsibility—Doggett must pay you—or give another note without my name—or you must sue him as you promised to do whenever I requested—and if he cannot, or will not pay, I must, and will.

Upon that we sue Doggett—that is consideration enough to support the promise, apart from his prior indebtedness. Landsdale vs. Brown, 4 Wash., C. C. R., 150.

We have shown his indebtedness to us from Flake—His subsequent obligation of 1839 to us, in discharge of his own former debt, nothing ever paid.

What is to prevent these facts and his letter from giving us our whole claim of principal and interest on the contract of 1839, or on the Flake notes? Certainly not the statute of usury. It is as foreign as the statute of wills.

The decision of this Court in this case last term, establishes this. It throws us back in conformity to universal precedent on the contract of 1839. There is no usury in that. We cannot mix contracts. The Court cannot decide that we may recover upon an old sound 142 contract, and then apply to us the law of a subsequent usurious contract upon which we do not recover—And say under the latter, we shall have no interest.

To say we shall recover on the contract of 1839, is to say we do not recover on the contract of 1841, which is to say we recover on a contract in which there was no usury and from which no interest can be cut off

Randall, for appellee:

This cause comes up to this Court a second time, upon new issues, in addition to the former ones, as presented in the case of Mitchell vs. Cotten, 2 Archer's Fla. Rep., 136. The new issues are—

1. Statute of limitations, p. 19, printed record.

2. Special plea of time given, or credit extended to principal, without the privity or consent of defendant, the surety. Ibid.

The jury rendered a general verdict for defendant on all the issues. P. 21.

The first error assigned by plaintiff is, that the Court below erred in allowing the filing of these additional pleas.

We answer, first—That the discretion of the Judge below in allowing and disallowing amendments of pleadings, is fully and expressly granted by statute of the State, viz: 50th section act of November 23, 1828, Th. Dig., 332, and it is not subject to revision.

The question is already settled by this Court. Stewart & Fontaine vs. Bennett, 1 Fla. Rep., 437.

But if the act of the Judge below was subject to revision in this case, it must be ruled that his discretion was rightfuly exercised:—

1st. Because it was for the first time, and owing to conduct of plaintiff on the former trial, that the occasion arose for the filing these additional pleas.

2d. As regards the plea of limitations, the Court is referred to the act of the Legislature of Florida, November 10, 1828, Sec. 12, Th. Dig., 444, to prove the absolute right of defendant's executor to have the benefit of this plea.

Defendant's counsel further submit to this Court, whether the terms of this act do not, "per se," raise a flat bar to plaintiff's recovery in this case, the right of plaintiff to recover being, by his own act, in two Courts, or trials, placed on the general indebitatus assumpsit counts—in other terms, "for a debt due upon an open account." 143

"In limine," defendant's counsel contend that the note of 1841, and the special count of the declaration, are not to be considered as any longer constituting a ground of recovery, because of the facts of the waiver and abandonment of that note and count on the former trial, and by the leading counsel of plaintiff at the last trial. See case of same parties, 2 Arch Fla. Rep., 136. Bill of Exceptions in printed record, p. 38.

The fact averred as occurring at the last trial, is directly and positively affirmed and proved by his Honor the Judge in the bill of exceptions, and cannot be gainsaid.

On sound principles of correct practice, the parties should be held to abide admissions thus solemnly made. For authorities, see Greenleaf on Ev., sections 27, 186, 205, 207. Young vs. Wright, 1 Camp., 140. Lord Ellenborough's opinion. Colledge vs. Horn, 3 Bing., 119. (11 Eng. C. L. Rep., 61.)

Second error assigned: The Court below refusing the 10th and 12th instructions asked by plaintiff, and granting the 13th, 14th and 15th instructions.

We say, the matters embraced by the 13th instruction were not concluded or rendered improper by any expressed opinion or judgment of the Supreme Court. That it was justified by the law and facts of the case, and for this we refer to the argument on this part of the case, on the former appeal between these parties.

Not considering that the note of 1841 is in question in this case, defendant's counsel have not argued that point.

But they further submit that, right or wrong, however the ruling of the Judge below in this 13th instruction may be regarded, that ruling, and the facts and case to which it applied, are entirely foreign to and without this case.

Defendant's counsel contend that prayers for instructions Nos. 10 and 12 are not strictly and accurately correct, as abstract propositions; but in regard to the proceedings and evidence in the cause, could not be granted by the Judge below. If the Judge had recognized them as true in the abstract, and to be granted, he must have, of necessity, further instructed the jury, that all the attendant proofs and evidences going to take from the acknowledgement and admission of defendant, Cotten, all effect whatever, because of the paper evidence 144 referred to being written under mistake of facts, in ignorance of the attendant circumstances, and of the deception and fraud practiced by plaintiff. This addition to the instruction would have rendered their prayer unavailing.

The question of promise or no promise to be implied in this case, (there being no express promise,) was one for the Judge, and not for the jury—the evidence being a letter not disputed. 2 Greenleaf, Ev., 357. By the latest English decisions in the Exchequer, a mere acknowledgement of personal indebtedness is not sufficient. By the American cases, "a liability and willingness to pay" must further appear, and neither of these last requisites can be inferred from Cotton's letter. These principles, too, are applicable properly to the principal debtor, and not to a surety. But Cotten's letter was written under an entire ignorance of the true facts, under mistake, induced by fraudulent misrepresentation.

Moreover, Cotten's acknowledgement applied to the note of 1841, and not to any other debt or security, and the Court will not extend it to anything but the note; and if that note fail, the acknowledgment or promise fails likewise. Clark vs. Dutcher, 9 Cow., 674.—Page's Adm'r. vs. Bank of Alex., 7 Wh., 35.

145 In this last case, testator repeatedly promised to pay the note, but the note failing, the Court would not extend the promise to any collateral liability, nor to the "general indebitatus assumpsit counts." It may be proper to add, that this last case did not turn (as is asserted) upon the peculiar principles of the law of Virginia, but upon the general doctrine of the common law.

But if the note had contained a promise, an express promise, yet being made in ignorance of the facts of the release of promisor by act of promisee, it would not be binding. Cockshot vs. Bennett, 2 T. R., 765-6. Goodall vs. Dally, 1 T. R., 712. West vs. Ashdown, 1 Bing., 164, (8 E. C. L., 282.) Cartwright vs. Williams, 2 Stark, 340, (3 E. C. L., 374.) This last case very strongly applies in the facts as well as the doctrine of the present case.

Even after payment, under such circumstances of fraud and mistake, money paid by party released in law may be recovered back. Buller vs. Harrison, Cowp., 555. Biez vs. Dickerson, 1 T. R., 285.

It is perfectly admissible and proper here to comment upon the diversity of views entertained by plaintiff's counsel in this and the Court below, upon what cause of action to ground their recovery—the leading counsel contending for the note of 1839, the associate counsel for that of 1841. They cannot both be right, for that would involve a monstrous absurdity. Mr. Thompson is right in holding on to the note of 1841, (if permitted, after what has occurred)—for if that be abandoned, unquestionably the right to recover is gone.—Plaintiff, Mitchell, having once voluntarily surrendered, given up to be cancelled, the note of 1839, can never again revive that note against the surety, independently of the bar of the statute of limitation; and this notwithstanding any promise, express or implied, from surety, in ignorance of the facts of his discharge. Cartwright vs. Williams, 3 E. C. L., 374, already cited.

If the pretention of leading counsel be allowed, principal will be held fixed, bound on the note of 1841, and the surety on that of 1839—thus severing and making diverse their liabilities.

Defendants never did contend for the doctrine of novation, as being borrowed from the civil law, with all its incidents, but to the extent invoked by them, it does prevail at common law.

1st. That two valid securities, the one taken as the substitute for the other, cannot both be in existence at the same time.

146 2nd. That when a new valid security is taken by creditor from principal, the surety on the old security, is no longer held bound by the first.

Not a case can be found in the books to the contrary. Smith's Case of Contracts, 49 Law Lib. Ap. 171. Burge, 167.

The note of 1841 is no nullity, was not void, in the sense of the New York and other cases. No law made it void, as it would have been in England and elsewhere, under certain usury laws.

But supposing there existed error in any of the foregoing rulings of the Court, none of these objections apply to the additional special plea filed since the first, and before the last, trial. The only instruction asked by any, was by plaintiff's counsel, touching "giving time or extending credit," and that was granted. That issue, with all the others, was found for defendant by the general verdict.

The Court below might have been applied to, if the facts warranted the application, for a new trial. Waiving that, plaintiff is without remedy for any mistake of jury. Their verdict cannot now be impeached. But we go further, and assert, that the facts of the case warrant the finding.

After the note of 1839 had arrived at maturity, plaintiff extended time and credit to principal by taking another valid security, viz: the note of 1841, by which he suspended his remedy against principal. And if, as we contend, the note of 1841 was obtained from Cotten by false pretences, by fraudulent misrepresentation, then that note, being void as regards him, can bind and conclude him to nothing. It is no evidence of his assent to the extended credit. This note of 1841 is the only evidence in the case, of any such privity or consent. As to the effect of Cotten's letter, that was written years after the time of credit extended, and was written in equal ignorance of facts, under the influence of the same fraud and deception—See the before cited cases of Cockshot vs. Bennett. Kennedy vs. Millban,k, 8 Bing., 38. West vs. Ashdown. Cartwright & Williams.

Cases referred to as doctrine of "giving time to principal, without assent of surety."

Wh., 554, (6 Cow., 636.) Mr. J. Story's opinion, p. 637.

In the argument thus far presented, the counsel for defendant have acted on the firm persuasion that the right of plaintiff to recover on the note of 1841 will be repudiated by the Court, because of the incidents attending the two trials in relation to that note. And they have not adduced the arguments and authorities heretofore offered to impeach the validity of that note on its intrinsic demerits. But as by possibility they may be mistaken in the first supposition, they beg leave to recall the objections heretofore presented, both in the Court below and in this Court, to the validity of that note, as regards the surety, Cotten.

It has been argued as if the objection was only founded on the usury laws, and existed because of the usury; whereas, the objection would be the same, and the surety's release would be equally assured, if no usury had been perpetrated in the excess of interest exacted. It has been asked from the Bench if a case can be shown from the books where the release of the surety was wrought by a subsequent exaction of usurious interest? We answer that our defence is not under any statute, but at Common Law.

When stringent statutes prevail, creating forfeitures and penalties, for imputed fraudulent exactions, no other resort need be had beyond the provisions of such statutes.

But in principle and reason, and under the most direct analogies, numerous cases can be cited precisely resembling the present. Let us now re-state the doctrine we assert, and some of the leading cases, promising, as the Court will see, that the doctrine is precisely the same in Courts of Law and Equity.

And first for a summary of it, see 1 Story's Eq. Jur., 329, 386, sec. 177. "The concealment from the surety of any of the terms of the principal contract, prevents any obligation arising from the engagement of the surety. It renders the engagement a nullity."

This covers the whole ground we contend for.

Our "principal contract" was the note of 1841—our then sole subsisting "contract."

Very material terms of that contract—a secret excess of interest beyond that apparent on its face—was concealed from the surety—and what is the consequence?

It "prevents any obligation arising," &c. 148

"It renders the engagement a nullity."

Does it merely create a forfeiture, as regards "the excess?" Certainly not. That would be inadequate—a very short measure of justice.

Look now to the first case formerly cited: Pidcock vs. Bishop, 3 Barn. & Cr., 606, (E. C. L.)

In that case it was not the excess of ten shillings per ton on the iron charged, which was forfeited, but the whole contract, the whole debt.

In that case, too, the excess did not even increase the ultimate responsibility of the debtor, for it went to pay an old debt, not to increase or create a new one. It never was a charge against the surety, and never could swell the amount of his liability directly, for his guarantee was for a limited amount, and the suit for less than the limit. Yet the Judges all declared it a fraud on the grantor, and vitiated his contract.

See language of Ch. J. Abbott, page 198—same of Bailey, J., 198-9.

In that case no such excess was actually paid by any one, but only stipulated to be paid—only charged in the "bill of parcels."

Can any distinction be found between excess of price and excess of interest?

Another strong case is Jackson vs. Duchain, 3 T. R. 551. Here there was no actual imposition practiced upon any one in respect to extortion, or excess of any kind. But yet the secret agreement between the creditor and the principal, without privity of surety, was the sole ground of invalidating the whole engagement. Neither was any stipulated excess in this case actually paid.

See reason for the decision in opinion of Ashurst, J., p. 553: "If surety had known of the private agreement, he would not probably have advanced the money."

The principle in that and the present case is "ex dolo malo, non oritur actio."

Other cases. Stone vs. Compton, 5 Bing. N. C., 142. Cockshott vs. Bennett, 2 T. R., 765-6. Smith vs. Bromley, 2 Doug., 696, (in note.) Jackson vs. Lomas, 4 D & E., 166. Leicester vs. Rose, 4 East., 372.

149 In several of the foregoing, neither principal nor surety were injuriously affected, in a pecuniary sense. Nor were the claims of the party released always of a meritorious character. In some instances the party relieved—discharged—was participant in the fraud.

In all, the relation was total from the whole engagement, or contract, and not from the excess.

Other cases. Archer vs. Hale, 15 E. C. L., 42. Henry vs. Stone, 2 Rand., 464. 3 Merivale, 277—opinion of Lord Chan. 7 Price, 223. See 1 Paine C. C. R., 305 to 335. Judge Thompson's opinion, 320—"Any agreement," &c.

Same, page 321—Any new debt increased, or demanded enlarged, &c., to prejudice of surety, &c., will discharge him, &c.

"These are controlling and undeniable rules, and universally admitted, both in Courts of Law and Equity."—Ibid.

And mark his conclusion: "But whether the alteration were for the benefit or prejudice of principal, cannot enter into the question." &c.

See also page 328, the answer to the suggestion that the sureties are not injured by the variation: "That they are only to be reached under the unaltered admitted terms of the original engagement.

And whether the alteration leaves them liable on the portion of the contract not altered. He decides the contrary. See his emphatic language on this point.

In conclusion, defendant's counsel respectfully submit, that their defence is at common law, and not under the statute of usury, and they conceive that much misapprehension would have been avoided if no reference had been made to cases of usury.

At common law, the obligations of sureties are "strictissimi juris," and entire candor and good faith are exacted from all who deal with them, under penalty of their entire release. Not a case can be found where the remedy stops short of their total discharge, when secret and fraudulent exactions are sought to be imposed upon their principal.

To stop with cutting off the mere excess, would be an inadequate measure of redress, would carry no adequate sanction.

In most of the cases, the excess never was charged to nor sought to be exacted from them. Yet the discharge was total.

150 Long, for appellee:

1. We deny that the Court below erred in permitting the defendant below to file the plea of the statute of limitations, after the cause was remanded from the Supreme to the Circuit Court. All amendments of pleading are in the discretion of the Circuit Courts, and cannot be assigned for error in this Court. Stewart & Fontaine vs. Bennett, 1 Florida Reports, 437, and authorities there cited. Our statute, however, is peremptory, which says, "The Court may, at its discretion, give leave to a party to amend his declaration, or other pleading in a cause, at any time before the case is submitted to a jury," &c. Thompson's Digest, 332. There is no exception to this discretion, excluding the plea of the statute of limitations. The discretion, then, is absolute, and this Court has no power to control it. Whether it would be wiser to allow this discretion to be so qualified as to be subject to revision by this Court, is for the Legislature to settle.

But we say the discretion exercised in this case was proper, and would not be altered, had this Court the power. The note of 1839 was not declared on in the declaration, or inserted in the bill of particulars, but another and different note was, namely, that of 1841. When this Court decided that it might be offered in evidence under the money counts, it was a virtual and important amendment of the declaration and bill of particulars. This is obvious—for it appears that the note of 1839 had been given up to Doggett ever since the 1st of January, 1841, when the note of that date was executed, and was so given and cancelled, in consideration of the note last mentioned. Of course its existence must have been unknown to plaintiff, when he filed his declaration. It was brought into the cause by defendant, to prove the real consideration of the note sued on, namely, that of 1841. When the plaintiff is allowed to regard it as set forth in the declaration and bill of particulars for the first time, does not common fairness require that the defendant shall be allowed to plead any defence which might exist in law and in fact? A discretion which should have refused this, would have been unjust and oppressive in the highest degree.

Again: If it be said that this note of 1839 was not offered as a written subsisting contract, but only as a piece of written circumstantial evidence, to prove the amount of money due at the time the note

tion, &c., and that as defendant knew he would bring the same into the cause, he is to be charged with the knowledge of the right and intention of the plaintiff to rely on the same, we have three answers. The first is, because the debt for which the note of 1839 had once been the evidence, was "extinguished," and the evidence cancelled and delivered to the maker, "by the substituted note of 1841," as expressly declared by the Court in the suit against the principal on this latter note. The language of the Court is, "The note of 1839 was extinguished by the substituted note of 1841," upon which latter note this Court then confirmed a judgment against Doggett, the principal. I think no case can be found where a note "extinguished" as to the principal, has been held binding on the surety. Counsel do not pretend that such a decision has ever been made; at least prior to the decision on this case, which they seem to understand. The defendant being a mere surety, as alleged in the pleas, established by the proof, and admitted by the plaintiff, had no right to expect an attempt to recover the original consideration, under the money counts specified in the note of 1839, on account of two other distinct principles of law. The first is, that whenever the suretyship of a joint and several obligor to a contract is established, the presumption that he received the money, or any part thereof, is fully rebutted. That is the exact meaning of the difference between a principal and a surety. He that receives the consideration is not a surety, but a principal. A surety can only bind himself in writing, by the statute of frauds, and if the written promise to "pay the debt of another," becomes invalid by any means, the surety is discharged. This most reasonable doctrine of the English Courts has been fully established in this country. An accommodation endorser and a surety cannot be made to pay the original consideration under the money counts, for the same reason, namely, that in neither case do they receive the original consideration. 7 Wheaton Rep., 35. 8 Taunt., 737. 7 John., 132. 4 Bos. & Pul., 351.

A third reason why the original consideration cannot be recovered against the defendant under the money counts, is found in the fact that he is an executor, to whom our statute applies. The money due upon the old note of 1839, fell due on the 1st day of January, 1840. and the testator of defendant died subsequent to the 10th of June, 1845, near five and a half years after the same was due. Our 152 statute requires the "Court before whom such suit shall be brought, to cause to be expunged from such account every item thereof which shall appear to have been due five years before the death of the intestate." Thompson's Digest, 444. Therefore, it seems plain that it was the duty of the Court to expunge from the bill of particulars the old cancelled note of 1839, without any plea of limitations. I am not prepared to believe that this court have decided, or for one moment meant to be understood as overruling, either one of these principles. If I am mistaken in this, I most respectfully ask the Court to reconsider these questions.

2. My colleague having so fully investigated the questions raised by the assignment of errors, in relation to the instructions given and refused by the Court, and having so fully vindicated the action of the Court in this respect, I will proceed to show that the cause is with the defendant, upon different and independent grounds."

The plaintiff contends that the verdict and judgment in this cause is wrong, because he has failed to recover upon either the note of 1841, or upon that of 1839. He does not pretend that he has any right to recover on both. That he has heretofore openly abandoned all attempts to recover on the note of 1841, is plain from this record. and from the assertion of this Court, in its opinion in this cause at the last term. At pages 147-8, the Court say: "The plaintiff, at the "trial of the cause in the Court below, abandoned the first count in "his declaration, which (as we have seen) was upon the note of "the 2d of January, 1841, and sought to recover only on the original "consideration." The bill of exceptions in this case shows that the same was abandoned on the last trial also, by the leading counsel, and that his associate differed with him in that respect, and "in his argument to the jury maintained his right to recover on the note of 1841," in the language of the record. This is about as much as saying that the associate counsel abandoned all hope of a recovery on the note of 1839, or the original consideration, and if so, we have the authority of the plaintiff's counsel for saying that no recovery can or ought to be had on either.

It is difficult to perceive how this Court is to determine whether a recovery can be had on either of these alleged causes of action—it being admitted that but one can rightfully be recovered on, unless 153 the plaintiff will point out which, and show why. If the note of 1839 is good, it is merely because that of 1841 is bad, and if that of 1841 is good, it is because that of 1839 is bad. Every reason and argument which tends to uphold the one, has the exact same force and tendency to destroy the other. If the associate counsel can show that the note of 1841 ought to be recovered on, he will thereby establish that the note of 1839 ought not; and if the leading counsel shall be able to prove that the note of 1839 ought to be recovered on, he will thereby establish that that of 1841 ought not. And hence this curious dilemma will ensue, that if each of plaintiff's counsel shall succeed in his respective aim to establish a right to recover on each, it will thereby conclusively follow that there exists no right to recover on either.*

Mitchell vs. Cotten, Executor.—Argument of Counsel.

3. It appears from the record in this cause, that all the issues are found for the defendant. It also appears that the two instructions refused by the Court (10 and 12,) refer alone to the plea of the statute of limitations. Therefore it is immaterial whether those instructions should or should not have been given. One issue in favor of a defendant is sufficient. In this case there are at least two upon each count of the declaration, to which there is no exception in the record.

The plea of the general issue was filed prior to our new rules, with notice of special matter, and applies to both notes and both counts in the declaration. That is found for defendant. Under this plea, all the proof in the cause was admissible, and the notice accompanying that plea recites all the facts which are proven, and they clearly make out a case of payment, satisfaction, extinguishment and release, as to the note of 1839, by the substitution of that of 1841. The rule on this subject is laid down in Chitty's Pleadings as follows:

154 most every matter might be given in evidence under the general issue, non assumpsit, on the ground, as was said, that the action was founded on the contract, and the injury is the non-performance of it, which disaffirms the continuing obligation of performance of the contract at the time when the action was commenced, goes to the gist of the action." 1 Chit. Plead., 472.

The 4th instruction asked by the plaintiff was given by the Court in these words: "The party setting up fraud, concealment, or giving time without consent of surety, or other matters in discharge of surety, must prove his allegation in discharge of himself." Now it is plain that the jury were not misled on these points, and they were all at issue under the general issue, and notice attached thereto, and two of the matters were also specially pleaded, namely, fraud in the concealment from Cotten, the surety, that a greater rate of interest was secretly contracted to be paid by the principal than was made known to the security, or expressed on the note, and also that time was given to the principal without consent of surety. The fraud and concealment of the true contract applied to the first count of the declaration, upon the note of 1841, and the giving time without consent is specially pleaded to each count, and to both notes. These matters were provable under the general issue, but they were also specially pleaded, doubtless to raise the question of law directly whether they constituted good defenses to the action, in case the plaintiff should signify any doubt upon the point, by demurring. This he did not dare do, but joined issue. It is no matter of surprise that the plaintiff should abandon the first count and the note of 1841, when these issues were so perfectly sustained by the defendant's proof. Then it was that the old cancelled note of 1839, being found among the papers of the cause, as a link in the chain of defendant's proof, was seized upon by the plaintiff, and offered in evidence under the money counts on the first trial; but as the Court refused to allow it to be read in evidence, the case was brought up to this Court to obtain this permission, which was then for the first time granted. Upon the last trial, the plaintiff was allowed to offer the note of 1839 in evidence under the money counts, but the proof under the general issue, and under the special plea of extension of time, were just as potent to bar the note of 1839 as it had been, and then was, to bar that of 1841.

I see no complaint made of the charge of the Court in relation to these issues, and being found for defendant by the jury, must stand. 155 Indeed, the record shows no hint or suggestion even, that the plaintiff considered the verdict upon these pleas unwarranted by the evidence. No motion for a new trial, nor any complaint of the verdict or charge of the Court upon these matters. This is decided by this Court in Mitchell vs. Chaires, 2 Florida Reports. Seeing that one good issue is as useful to a defendant, as a bar to the action, as a dozen, and that we have at least two unquestioned issues found in our favor, it is difficult, from the record, to imagine what useful purpose the plaintiff can have had in view in bringing the case to this Court. If it be said that the object was to settle the matters of law arising upon the instructions relative to the statute of limitations, we say, "sufficient for the day is the evil thereof."

It has been contended, rather vaguely, that instruction numbered 13, as given by the Court, is subject to objection. If I correctly understood the objections, they were as follows:

1. That the Court, in that instruction, takes from the jury the decision of the facts. This I deny. The facts stated hypothetically, are preceded by the distinct language, "If you shall believe from the evidence that," &c., and after reciting the facts thus hypothetically, concludes as follows: "this in law is a fraud on the surety, invalidates his note and agreement, and plaintiff has not a right to recover thereon." It is impossible to conceive of a charge less subject to the objection here made than this.

2. That the facts stated thus hypothetically in the instruction were not proved in the cause, and hence that their recital was calculated to mislead the jury. This objection is equally unfounded, for every fact recited is proven most distinctly, without the least conflict of evidence as to any. They are all the most familiar facts in the case, viz: that Cotten was a surety only, and that he was ignorant of the secret agreement between Mitchell and Doggett, the principal, that a greater rate of interest was to be paid than that stated on the face of the note of 1841. It was doubtless the clear proof of these facts which at the first trial induced plaintiff to abandon the note of 1841, and seek to recover upon that of 1839.

3. The third objection is, that the conclusion of law announced by the Court, namely, that such secret agreement "is a fraud upon the surety, invalidates his note and agreement," &c., is erroneous. The first answer to this objection is found in the numerous authorities ci- 156 ted by my colleague, directly in point, and the fact that not one solitary authority has been cited to the contrary. Indeed, this objection comes strangely from plaintiff in this place, and at this stage of the cause, for the first time. If these facts did not amount to a good defence, the special plea in which they are set forth in almost the very language of this instruction, should have been demurred to, and at least some authority cited, if any existed, overruling those cited on our side. By taking issue upon the plea stating these facts as a bar to the action, plaintiff has admitted the question of law, and cannot now be heard to question the same. The plaintiff's case is literally staked upon each and every issue joined in a cause. When the issue is found against him, it is rather late to inquire whether the plea constituted a good defence or not.

Briefly to recapitulate:

The note of 1841 cannot be recovered on because, 1. The plea of the general issue is found to be true. 2. Because the special plea of fraudulent concealment of the true terms of the contract from Cotten, is found to be true. 3. Because the special plea of extension of time without consent of Cotten, is found to be true.

These issues were found for defendant by the jury, under the distinct charge of the Court, that "The party setting up fraud, concealment, or giving time without consent of surety, or other matter in discharge of surety, must prove his allegations in discharge of himself," which instruction appears to have been given at the instance of plaintiff.

The note of 1839, or the "original consideration," cannot be recovered under the money counts in the declaration:

1. Because Cotten, the defendant, is only surety, and never received any part of the "original consideration."

2. Because the original consideration, or "note of 1839, was extinguished by the substituted note of 1841," the plaintiff having in fact sued and recovered thereon.

3. Because the issue of non assumpsit has been found for defendant upon the proof in the cause.

4. Because the special plea of extension of time to principal without consent of surety, has also been found for defendant.

5. Because the "original consideration," or money mentioned in

*The associate counsel for plaintiff, after relying upon the decision of this Court at its last term, to prove that the note of 1839 might be recovered on under the money counts, being asked in conclusion which one of the notes he considered himself entitled to recover on, replied, "I think we are entitled to recover on the note of 1841." This would seem to show that the plaintiff's counsel do not themselves believe that the decision of this Court has overruled either of the three principles of law, which we have shown prohibit a recovery on the money counts, the amount of money mentioned in the note of 1839.

157 the note of 1839, was due more than five years before the death of defendant's intestate, and therefore should have been "expunged" by the Court below from the declaration or bill of particulars, in pursuance of our statute on the subject.

Each of these reasons constitutes a perfect bar to the plaintiff's suit.

L. A. Thompson replied.

LANCASTER, J.

This cause was before this Court by writ of error, at the January term, 1848—see Report of that year from page 136 to 158, inclusive. It is now again here by appeal from Leon Circuit Court; but the questions raised by the bill of exceptions, which have been made part of the record in this cause, are very different from those then presented. After this case went back to the Circuit Court, upon the production of the mandate of the Supreme Court, it was ordered by the Court, in pursuance of said mandate, that the judgment theretofore rendered by the Circuit Court in this cause be reversed and set aside, and that the cause be docketed, and such further proceedings be had therein, as are in conformity, &c. After this cause was so docketed, and before trial, the defendant by his attorney moved the Court for leave to file two additional and amendatory pleas, to wit: A plea of the statute of limitations, and a plea averring that the promises and undertakings of John W. Cotten, defendant's testator, and on which this suit was brought, were made as surety of one Henry Doggett, and alleging that, for a valuable consideration given by Doggett, the principal, to Mitchell, the plaintiff, time was given, or a credit extended, without the knowledge or consent of defendant's testator, J. W. Cotten. After argument, the pleas were allowed by the Court, and the plaintiff by his counsel excepted thereto. And it is assigned for error, that the Court erred in permitting defendant to amend his pleadings, by filing the pleas before mentioned.

The act of November 23, 1828, sec. 50, see Thompson's Digest, 332, provides: "The Court may, in its discretion, give leave to a party to amend his declaration, or other pleadings, at any time before the case is submitted to a jury;" but it must be done instanter, and if of substance, the adverse party has a right to a continuance. The record shows, after leave given, the pleas were filed on the same 158 day, to wit, instanter; and the record does not show that any continuance was asked by plaintiff, by reason of the filing of said pleas. It was contended that the Court must, in any such case, exercise a sound discretion, in permitting the amended pleas to be filed—or, otherwise, it will be subject to reversal in this Court. It might be a sufficient answer to this objection to say, the record does not state the circumstances or reasons on which the Court exercised its discretion of permitting the pleas, by way of amendment, to be filed, and in the absence of such reasons, this Court will presume the discretion of the Circuit Court was soundly exercised. But the question was considered by this Court, in the case of Stewart & Fontaine vs. Bennett, 1 Fla. Reps., 446, and it was there held, that, after a "new trial the pleadings of both parties can be amended by leave of the Court." Now, after the former judgment of the Circuit Court, in favor of defendant; was reversed and set aside, the case docketed, and further proceedings ordered, it seems obvious that both parties could look to nothing but another, or new trial, and the case stood, in all respects, precisely like one on which a new trial had been ordered. The parties, therefore, had a right, by leave of the Court, to amend their pleadings, unless the decision in the case of Stewart & Fontaine vs. Bennett, is erroneous; but, on looking into that decision, we are inclined to think it correct, and to regard it as authority.

From what has been said, it will be perceived that this Court is disinclined to entertain or allow objections to the rulings of the Circuit Court, in matters appertaining to the pleadings, where a discretion is given them by law, and we might cite much authority for a similar practice in other Courts. We are, therefore, of opinion the exception we have been considering was not well taken, and do overrule it.

The action in this case is founded on a promissory note, in the words following, to wit:

"On or before the 1st day of January next, we or either of us, promise to pay Isaac W. Mitchell, or order, fifteen thousand nine hundred and fifty-five dollars, with ten per cent. interest from date, for value received, this the 2d day of January, 1841.

(Signed) "H. DOGGETT,
"J. W. COTTEN."

Mitchell vs. Cotten, Executor.—Opinion of Court.

The declaration of the plaintiff contains two counts the first is a 159 special count on the note above set forth, and the second contains the common money counts, and account stated. To this declaration, there were at the original trial eight issues joined, two pleas having been demurred out—all which is fully stated in the report of that case in the year 1848, at page 136-7, and for brevity, is here referred to. At the late trial, and from which this appeal is had, all the issues of fact in the former trial, and the two others in this opinion before noticed, came on to be tried. At the trial, plaintiff, as appears by the bill of exceptions, offered in evidence the note herein before set forth—a letter from J. W. Cotten to Dr. Mitchell, the plaintiff post-marked Tallahassee, Fla., Dec. 3, paid—10 cents, and dated 25th November, 1844, and also the praecipe, showing the commencement of the original suit, to wit, January 8th, 1845.

The defendant then offered sundry depositions and exhibits, and the testimony of sundry witnesses sworn to in Court, which may be referred to herein, but for brevity, will not be set out.

It is contended "in limine," by defendant's counsel in this Court, that the note of 1841 (before set forth) and the special count of the declaration thereon, are not longer to be considered as constituting a ground for recovery for plaintiff, because (as he says) of a waiver and abandonment of that note and count on the former trial, and by the leading counsel at the last trial. The only matter on the record touching a waiver by the plaintiff's attorney, will be found in the note appended to the bill of exceptions at the request of defendant's counsel, also signed by the Judge, and made part of the record and excepted to by defendant's counsel.

On the former trial, by reference to that record, it appears the Court instructed the jury, that the counsel for the plaintiff did not ask a recovery on the special count on the note, having conceded he could not recover thereon. And this, we apprehend, is as much as he at any time intended to admit. It was his intention, which he has followed with unwavering fidelity, to recover on the common counts, and whether he really entertained the opinion, he could not recover on the note and special count, or whether he desired to avoid that note, the interest of which by the testimony, he knew to be tainted with usury, and by recovering the consideration for which the note was given, on the common counts, to have interest divested of usury, from the date of that consideration, up to the time of judgment, 160 it is perhaps not material to inquire; but, admitting that counsel thought and conceded he could not recover on the special count, and the plaintiff's other counsel thought he could, and insisted on such recovery before the jury, to which insisting defendant's counsel were permitted to reply, and one of them did reply, ought such an admission to discharge and defeat any legal liability or obligation of the defendant, if plaintiff's counsel was mistaken in point of law, as to his client's rights? In the case of Colledge vs. Horn, 3 Bingham, 199, where it was sought to introduce proof of an admission by plaintiff's counsel, and the testimony had been ruled out: Best, C. J. says, "the question is one of great difficulty, and I avoid saying any thing on it until we have all the facts before us. At present, it does not appear whether or not the plaintiff was in hearing of the statement made by the counsel, or how far that statement was authorized." In the same case, Borroughs, J., says: "parties are every day bound by the acts and declarations of their counsel; if the plaintiff was in Court, heard what his counsel said and made no objection. I think he was bound." The other two Judges gave no opinion, but if we are to collect the law from this authority, which was cited by defendant, it seems that admissions made by the counsel, of a party, to bind that party, must be made in his presence and without objection. In the case of Young vs. Wright, 1 Campbell's N. P. C., 140, Lord Ellenboro said, "if a fact is admitted by the attorney on the record, with intent to obviate the necessity of proving it, he must be supposed to have authority for this purpose, and his client will be bound by the admission, but it is clear that whatever the attorney says in the course of conversation is not evidence in the cause." And Greenleaf on Evidence, as referred to, is to the same effect. The attempt here is not to bind the plaintiff by any admission of fact made by his attorney, to obviate the necessity of proof; but to bind him by his admission of law, wherein he concedes he could not recover on the note sued on and special count in his declaration. Whether he could recover on that count, is a question of law, and we presume it will not be seriously contended that admissions of counsel of the law, where there happens to be an error in the admission, can make the law. The record abundantly shows, notwithstanding the admission made, that the note sued on was read in evidence before the 161 jury, that one of plaintiff's counsel maintained his right to recover on that note, and under the circumstances, the Court permitted plaintiff to claim before the jury on either and both counts, extending permission to defendant's counsel to argue again before the jury, which one of them actually did. These occurrences do not, this Court is of opinion, amount to any waiver or abandonment of any legal right of recovery by the plaintiff, and ought not to bind him, as by one of his counsel he was still asserting his right to recover on the note of the second of January, 1841.

We shall next inquire whether that note was and is good and valid in law, and whether plaintiff is entitled to recovery thereon. For these questions are raised by the record and exceptions sent here for review. The note is the joint and several note of John W. Cotten and Henry Doggett, and is expressed to be for value received; and no question is raised on the record touching its execution, but every where in the record it is treated as a note of Henry Doggett and John W. Cotten, so far at least as their signatures to it are concerned. Suit was brought on that note by plaintiff, Mitchell, vs. H. Doggett and John W. Cotten, on the 8th of January, 1845, as appears by the praecipe in evidence in this suit, and as appears by the statement of that case in 1 Flor. Reps., 365. "Cotten, dying before trial, the suit abated as to him, but continued as to Doggett." In the decision of the case of Mitchell vs. Doggett, 1 Flor. Rep., 373, the question of usury being raised, this Court said "by the letter and spirit of the statute, whenever illegal interest is taken or contracted for, the whole interest is void." The 3d section of the Act of February 12th, 1833, Duval's Laws, 79, on which this decision was given, is in these words: "That when any note, notes, bond or bond, shall or may be upon, or on account of any usurious contract, the interest on the same shall be void, and the obligor or obligors forever exonerated from paying the same." It is worthy of remark as distinguishing this statute from almost all others in other States and countries, that while others declare a usurious contract wholly void, this provides and declares the interest only shall be void, carefully abstaining from any provision declaring the contract for the principal sum void on which usurious interest is taken or reserved. The decision of the point last referred to, as given by the Supreme Court in that case, was strictly consonant with our statute, 162 and therefore sound. These views were again sustained by this Court at January term, 1848, in the case of Mitchell vs. Cotten. The learned counsel for defendant, in their argument of this case, seem to have lost sight of the manifest distinction between other statutes of usury, where it is provided that the whole contract shall be void, and our's in which it is only provided the interest shall be void. Now a provision which, for usury, makes the interest void, excludes the idea of making the principal void, for expressio unius exclusio est alterius. But counsel for defendant, in this case, now and in 1848, and in the former case of Mitchell vs. Doggett, gave the same construction to the statute of usury, we now seek to establish, by contending that the note of the 2d of January, 1841, given by Doggett and Cotten to Mitchell, and on which the special count in the declaration in this case is founded, is good as against Doggett, the principal, but void as to Cotten, the security. Now if our statute made the whole contract void the note as against Doggett, would be void, and consequently void as against the surety also. But is is not denied in this case, that at the time of taking the note of 1841, although on the face of it, it was payable on or before the first of January next thereafter, with ten percent interest from date, (which at the time of the contract was lawful) there was at the time of making said note a contract made by Mitchell and Doggett, that over and above the interest mentioned in the note, Mitchell was to have the further rate of two and a half per cent, additional interest, which was usurious, and that on the same day Doggett executed another note to Mitchell for $398 87-100, being the interest on the principal sum for twelve months at two and a half per cent. Doggett says, however, and it is nowhere controverted, that the usury in his contracts with Mitchell began when he executed the note declared on in this suit, and gave the note for $398 87c., above mentioned.

It seems that the sum of fifteen thousand nine hundred and fifty-five dollars, mentioned in the note declared on, was due to the plaintiff by defendant on account of a prior indebtedness, at the day of the execution of that note, free from usury, if the uncontroverted testimony of Doggett, one of the obligors, is to be relied on. Upon which state of case, under the statute of usury, we have no hesitation to decide that both obligors as such, became at the time of executing the note declared on, jointly and severally legally bound to the plaintiff, Mitchell, for the principal sum named in said note, but for no inter- 163 est whatever if the interest reserved (which seems to be admitted) was usurious.

The question is raised in this case, that upon the note sued on, Cotten was only a surety for Doggett, the principal, (which from the testimony of Doggett and the course of the argument, we think appears manifest was the fact,) and as such surety his rights were different from those of his principal, and that a concealment from him of the terms of the principal contract prevents any obligation arising from the engagement as surety, and renders the engagement a nullity. Upon reference to Story's Equity Jur., 239, referred to by defendant's counsel, we find the doctrine laid down thus: "Any concealment of material facts, or any express or implied misrepresentation of such facts, or any undue advantage taken of the surety by the creditor, either by surprise or by withholding proper information, will undoubtedly furnish sufficient ground to invalidate the contract." And at page 330, sec. 225, same book, the doctrine is stated in a more general form, thus, "that if a creditor does any act injurious to the surety, or inconsistent with his rights, or omits to do any act when required by the surety which his duty enjoins him to do, and the omission proves injurious to the surety, in all such cases the latter will be discharged." The distinction between the position of defendant's counsel, and the authority of Justice Story, just cited, is a plain one. The counsel says "the concealment of any of the terms of the principal contract." The authority referred to, in substance says, the concealment of material facts by which the surety may be injured, will furnish sufficient ground to invalidate the contract, and we think in reason as well as authority, the doctrine as laid down by Justice Story, should prevail. Why should a surety in matter between his co-obligor and his obligee which cannot possibly injuriously affect his interest and obligation, insist on being informed?

We have liked into a number of authorities cited to see if the above principle has been at all extended to favor sureties. In Pidcock vs. Bishop, 3 Barn. & C., 606: Our Tickell applied to plaintiff John Pidcock, to supply him with pig iron on credit in the usual way, and agreed if the plaintiff would supply him he would pay them the market price and ten shillings per ton extra, in liquidation of an old debt due the plaintiff, John Pidcock. John Pidcock said he must consult his partners, but he thought they would require a guarantee 164
John Pidcock afterwards agreed the iron should be supplied, Tickell paying the company the market price and ten shillings extra to himself on his private debt, and requiring a guarantee for the price of the iron. Tickell furnished the guarantee of the defendant to be responsible for £200 value of pig iron to be delivered to Tickell, but the agreement of Tickell to pay John Pidcock ten shillings per ton, extra, on his private debt, was not communicated to the guarantor.

In this state of case, Abbott, C. J., says, "I am of opinion, a party giving a guarantee, ought to be informed of any private bargain made between vendor and vendee, which may have the effect of varying the degree of his responsibility." "The effect (in this case) would be to compel the vendee to appropriate to the payment of the old debt a portion of those funds which the surety might reasonably suppose would go toward defraying the debt, for the payment of which he made himself collaterally responsible. That being so, I am of opinion that the withholding the knowledge of the bargain from the defendant was a fraud upon him and vitiated the contract." The other Justices concurred. But they all proceed on the ground that the contract as between vendor and vendee was valid, and increased the liability of the surety, which was a fraud on him.

In the case of Jackson vs. Duchain, 3 D. & East., 553, Ashurst, J., said: "It is clear, both on the principles of law and equity, that when any friend advances money, to relieve another person from the pressure of his necessities, and the parties interested enter into a private agreement, over and beyond that with which the friend is acquainted, such agreement is void in law, as being a fraud on such friend." Here it is to be observed, that Welsh, who was desirous of benefiting his friend, agreed to advance £70, which he understood to be the full purchase money, (for certain goods), for such was the representation made to him, and £70 is expressed in the bill of sale to be the consideration. But now it turns out that the defendant was to give two promissory notes for a further sum, under a private agreement between her and the plaintiff, to which Welch was not a privy, and which, if he had known, he would not probably have advanced the money. This, therefore, was a fraud on him; and the principles of analogous cases go to show that this private agreement between plaintiff and defendant cannot be enforced."—

165 The other judges concurred. To apply the decision of this case to the one under consideration, it would make Doggett's extra note for $398 87 fraudulent as to Cotten, if he was not privy to it, and, therefore, as between Doggett and Mitchell, it could not be enforced. But our statute goes further, and declares that if that note was given for usurious interest, the whole interest shall be void, which diminishes Cotten's liability. It is worthy of note here, the advancement made by Welch, the principal, is not declared fraudulent, or void, but only the secret contract, to which he was not privy.

The next case to be considered is the United States vs. Robert Tillotson, 1 Parris C. C. R., from 306 to 335. The case in substance is this: One Hopkins had contracted with an agent of the United States to construct a fortification in the vicinity of Mobile Point, according to the terms, conditions and stipulations of a written contract, reference to which was to be had—and he dying, the right of performing his contract was assigned to his legal representative, one Hawkins. Whereupon Hawkins, with his defendant, Tillotson, and one Nicholas Gouverneur, as his sureties, entered into bond to the United States for $150,000 penalty, with the following condition: "That if the said Hawkins shall well and truly perform, or cause to be performed, all the covenants, undertakings and engagements contained in the said contract, so made as aforesaid, by the said Benjamin W. Hopkins in his life time, for the construction of the said fort, which remains to be fulfilled, and shall also faithfully and well account to the War Department of the United States, for all sums of money heretofore advanced by the United States, under and in virtue of the last mentioned contract, and also for such further advances as may be hereafter made to facilitate the execution of said contract, then this obligation to be void." &c. About seven months after the foregoing bond was made, Hawkins, the contractor, entered into a new contract with the United States, (without the privity of the defendants, his sureties,) as the Court says, materially changing the terms of the contract of Hawkins, for which they were bound, which new contract is set out in the report of the case, at pages 312 to 316; and it is only necessary to read the case, to see that the terms of the contract, for which the sureties were bound, were so materially variant, that, if the new contract was executed, the other could not be.

166 On this branch of the subject, Thompson, J., says: "But whether this alteration was for the benefit, or to the prejudice of Hawkins, (the principal,) cannot enter into the question—this was a matter upon which the sureties had a right to judge for themselves, and it was not in the power of the plaintiffs to transfer the suretyship from one contract to another, without the consent of the sureties. The first contract became functus officio, so far as it was altered by the second;" "but, admitting the first contract in part to remain in full force, the second was an essential alteration or modification of it and cannot be binding on the sureties in this new shape; such a rule would be placing it in the power of the principal to draw his sureties into responsibilities they never assumed, contrary to the law in relation to principals and sureties." Again, at page 320, it is said—"Sureties cannot be made responsible beyond the scope of their engagement. Any agreement between the creditor and principal, which varies essentially the terms of the contract, without the consent of the sureties, will exonerate them from their responsibility; any new debt incurred, or the demand enlarged, or any act done to the injury and prejudice of the surety, will discharge him from all liability." Again, at page 333, the same Judge says: "The law is particularly watchful over the rights of sureties, and will not countenance any transaction between the parties that shall lessen the ability of the principal to comply with his contract, or that shall alter the rights of the parties to enlarge the demand, to the prejudice of the sureties."

The principles to be deduced from these authorities and others referred to, which have been examined, but to avoid prolixity, will not be further mentioned, are not variant from those on this point extracted from Mr. J. Story's Eq. Jur. In all the cases it is fairly collectible, that the contract between the principal parties, of which a surety without privity can avail himself for his discharge, as between the principals, must be a valid contract.

In the case before us, the surety if, indeed, not privy, seeks relief from a contract which, as between the principals, was not valid; and he seeks to make that invalid contract the ground of discharging him from the payment of a sum of money, which he validly bound himself to pay. By the usurious contract for interest, which was illegal, Doggett, the principal, did not lessen his ability to comply with his obligation to pay that which was legal; neither are the rights of the 167 parties altered or enlarged, to the prejudice of the surety, but to his benefit, for thereby he is discharged from the payment of all interest until judgment. As to the surety, it is not different from what it would have been, had a release of all the interest been given by the plaintiff to Doggett, one of the obligors—for the other would, as surety, be entitled to the benefit of it; but it would be monstrous to say, that such a release being given, without the privity of the surety, (the other obligor,) or a partial payment made, without his knowledge, would defeat his liability as surety, or obligor; every partial payment alters the rights of the parties, but not to the prejudice of the surety—and whether he is a privy to it or not, as his liability is thereby diminished, his consent will be presumed. Even in the case we are considering, the consent of Cotten, the security, to the usurious transaction, between his co-obligor and Mitchell, the plaintiff, is to be presumed, as he thereby saves several thousand dollars in interest he had contracted to pay. His counsel, however, place him in the attitude of refusing to consent, because they insist on a release from his entire obligation; but failing of this, it is presumed they will insist on, as well as consent to, the other—as the simple interest to the 2d January this present year, will alone amount to $14,395.30, at the rate specified in the notes. The statute before recited provides, "that, on any usurious contract, the interest shall be void, and the obligor or obligors forever exonerated from the payment of the same"—the penalty in this act extends as well to the one obligor as to the other, and enures to the benefit of both; but it is the measure of redress for both.

The argument has proceeded upon the assumption, that the contract of Mitchell and Doggett for usurious interest was concealed from Cotten. Doggett testifies that there was a secret undertaking between himself and Mitchell for usurious interest, which was not made known to Cotten, but there was no bargain between witness and Mitchell to keep it from his knowledge; and to a cross interrogatory, he says Cotten may or may not have known of the secret stipulation of witness to Mitchell—did not learn it from witness, nor does he recollect ever to have conversed with Cotten upon the subject—from which it is inferable, if Cotten did not know of the stipulation, it was rather inadvertent than intentional, as nothing passed between the parties, manifesting a design to keep it 168 from him.

We close our review of the point under consideration, by reference to our decision in this case between the same parties at the January term, 1848, see Report p. 148—"The rule undoubtedly is, that a surety is not to be held beyond the precise terms of the contract; that the creditor has no right to increase his risk without his consent. But in Tudor vs. Goodloe, 1st B. Munroe's Reports, 324, as cited in 2d Vesey Jur., 540, in note by Charles Sumner, it was held, that "a promise by the principal to pay usurious interest in future, (the precise case before us,) is void, and does not operate to exonerate the surety, and this is in accordance with general principles." And see further same case, p. 149, "Where a surety which is given on a loan of money is valid at its creation, no subsequent agreement of the borrower to pay usurious interest or premium for the further forbearance of the loan will invalidate the original security, but the subsequent usurious interest will be void." Crane vs. Hubbell, 7 Paige's Reps., 413. Mitchell vs. Doggett, 1 Fla. Rep., 374, 376, 377.

We have been thus particular in giving, in a more extended manner, our views of the circumstances under which a surety will be discharged from his liability, because, although this Court at the former trial of this cause, in January term, 1848, expressed clearly and substantially the same views and opinions we now assert, and again in the case of Mitchell vs. Doggett, above referred to; yet these views and opinions appear to have escaped the attention of the learned Judge before this cause was tried in the Circuit Court. And that Judge gave the following instruction, number thirteen, which was excepted to by plaintiffs counsel: "If you shall be of opinion from the evidence, that at the time of entering into the note sued upon for $15,965, of January, 1841, signed by H. Doggett and J. W. Cotten, that J. W. Cotten, was the only security, and not primarily liable for the debt, by having received part of the consideration, another note was given by the principal for the sum of $ for past interest of said note, as part of the contract, but extending the same two and a half per cent. further, unknown to and without any communication with the security, so that he remained wholly ignorant that two and a half per cent. interest was in fact to be paid 169 by his principal, instead of ten per cent. as agreed by the note executed by the two, that this in law is a fraud on the security, invalidates his note under agreement, and plaintiff had not a right to recover thereon." The position assumed in the foregoing instructions, as law, are directly contrary to what is asserted in this opinion as law, and to what, according to our best information and judgment, we believe the law to be. We hold, therefore, the exception well taken, and that the opinion of the Court giving said instruction, must be reversed and set aside. There were other instructions asked by plaintiff and refused by the Court, and others not asked which were given by the Court, numbered 10, 12, 14, 15, 16, and the rulings of the Court thereon were excepted to by plaintiff's counsel. These exceptions were elaborately discussed before this Court, but the decision of them is not deemed material to this cause.

At the trial of this case in the Circuit Court at November term, 1849, the jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find verdict for the defendant;" and the defendant's counsel insists, this is evidence that all the issues were found for the defendant. At the trial of this case in the Circuit Court, the instruction, No 13, above set forth, and there given, precluded the jury from finding a verdict for the plaintiff on the first or special count of his declaration. Here there is a bill of exceptions made a part of the record, in which the whole testimony is embraced, together with the rulings of the Court, in which respect it is entirely unlike the case of Mitchell vs. Chaires, Exr., 2 Flor. R., 22. And we can have no difficulty in perceiving with instructions as given, the jury without particular inquiry as to the proof of any plea, felt bound to render the verdict they gave; nor can we suppose, with the evidence before them, they would ever have consented to the truth of some or most of the pleas pleaded in bar, but for the instruction given. We think if an instruction was given to the jury as follows: "If, from the testimony, you are of opinion the note declared on in the first count of plaintiff's declaration was executed by the defendant's testator, as co-obligor and surety, and that an agreement was entered into between his co-obligor and principal, Henry Doggett, for usurious interest with the plaintiff, Mitchell, on the note sued on, without his knowledge, the Court charges that such agreement for usurious interest, was a void contract, and from the day of such agreement made void all interest on the 170 note sued upon, but did not injuriously affect Cotten, the surety, nor in any manner increase his liability to Mitchell, the plaintiff, nor diminish the means of his principal, Doggett, to pay and discharge said note declared on, and said note remained and remains a valid subsisting obligation. as well against Cotten, the security, as against Doggett, the principal, for the principal sum named therein, but for no interest whatever. And if you find the matters stated in the first part of this instruction, you will find a verdict for the plaintiff on the first count of the declaration for the principal sum named in the note, but for no interest." Such an instruction, for the reasons contained in this opinion, wouuld, we think, be lawful and right to be given.

It is therefore considered by this Court, and it is hereby ordered and adjudged, that the decision given herein by the Circuit Court, and from which this appeal was taken, be reversed and set aside, that this cause be remanded for a new trial, and that proceedings be had thereon in conformity with the opinions and principles in this opinion contained.

ISAAC W. MITCHELL, APPELLANT, VS. F. R. COTTEN, EXECUTOR APPELLEE.

ON PETITION OF REHEARING.

[After the decision of the foregoing case of Mitchell vs. Cotten, and on the last day of the term of the Court, the counsel for appellee filed a petition for a rehearing in said cause, assigning therefor, in substance, the following reasons:]

1st. That the Court erred in deciding that the matters and things and defence set up in the sixth plea did not constitute a bar to the plaintiff's right of recovery:

1st. Because at the first trial of said cause, the said sixth plea was demurred to—the demurrer was overruled by the judgment of the Court, and afterwards the plaintiff replied to said plea.

2d. Because, after issue joined thereon at said first trial, verdict was found thereon for the defendant.

3d. Because, at the first trial of said cause in this Court, at January term, 1848, it was assigned for error, that the Court below erred

"in overruling the plaintiff's demurrer to the defendant's sixth plea, 171 then said, "As to the first error assigned, viz: That the Court erred
"in overruling the plaintiff's demurrer to the defendant's sixth plea,
"it is sufficient to observe, that the judgment upon said demurrer
"was respondeat ouster, and thatplaintiff (as it appears by the record)
"answered over by filing his replication to that plea and thereby "waived his demurrer thereto. On overruling a demurrer, if the "demurrant resorts to ulterior pleadings on the same point, de-"murrer is waived. Burdet vs. Burdet, 2 A. K. Marsh, 143
"Morrison vs. Morrison, 3 Stewart's Rep., 144. Breese, 19.

"The same doctrine was maintained by this Court in the case of "Mitchell vs. Executor of Chaires, at the present term. A decis"ion overruling a demurrer cannot be revised, if afterwards it is "withdrawn and issue joined to the country. Acre vs. Rose, 3 Stew"art, 288. Trigg vs. Shields, Hardin, 168. A plaintiff cannot de"mur and reply to the plea. Riley and another vs. Harkness, 2
"Blackf., 34. Harris vs. Weaver, 1 Blackf., 77, and authorities there cited. Stephen on Pleading, 296. See 2 Florida Rep., 145."

Therefore the petitioner contends, that the said sixth plea and the matters and things therein alleged and found by the jury, are and were by the foregoing decision of this Court, "res adjudicatae."

2d. This Court erred in deciding at the last trial of the cause here, that the matters and things set forth in the sixth plea (being the same identical matters of fact set forth in the charge of the Court below, number 13, as the ground of defendant's discharge from all liabilty) did not constitute a valid bar to plaintiff's action, because the question of law involved therein was for that reason not assignable as error in this Court. Therefore petitioner contends, that if the question had not been adjudicated by the Court, the same ought now to be determined in the same manner it was determined at the former term of this Court, and for the same reasons and on the same authority above referred to.

3d. That of the charge of the Court below, number 13, did contain error, it could only be legally applicable to the plea of the general issue, the law embraced in the sixth special plea having been, adjudicated by this Court being no longer open to question by the Judge below—and if in truth that error may have been influential on the verdict of the jury, it could only have affected their finding under the plea of the general issue, while the bar arising under the finding on 172 the sixth plea and on pleas 7, 8, and 9, would, notwithstanding, constitute a flat bar to plaintiff's recovery.

4th. That the proposition advanced. in the opinion and judgment of this Court, that the matters and things alleged in the sixth plea and found by the jury, did not constitute a defence to the action, was not duly considered by this Court, the same not having been fully argued at this term by counsel for appellee, for the reason that they regarded it no longer as an open question.

5th. This Court erred in reversing the judgment if the Court below, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury in defendant's favor on the issues joined on the 7th, 8th and 9th pleas, setting forth in divers ways the giving of time by plaintiff to Doggett the principal, without the consent of defendant, the surety—Because,

1st. There was no motion for a new trial on account of any defect of proof or misfinding upon those issues.

2d. Because there was some evidence in the record (and the bill of exceptions does not state that it embraced the whole evidence) and the jury being the judges of its sufficiency, and having been expressly charged by the Court, "that the party setting up the giving "of time, &c., must prove his allegations in discharge of himself," they must be presumed to have correctly found under such instruction.

LANCASTER, J.

In the matter of the petition for a rehearing in the case of Isaac W. Mitchell vs. Frederick R. Cotten, executor, filed on this the last day of the term, we have to regret that time it not afforded to the Court to deliberate and examine authorities, as the subject from its importance would induce us to desire to do; but the remembrance that the sum in controversy is very considerable—that, as it stands, the plaintiff can recover no interest, until he recovers judgment, and that the delay of a year will subject him to considerable loss, in the use of the sum in controversy, we are inclined to dispose of the questions raised by the petition, before the final adjournment of the Court.

The first ground assigned for the rehearing is, that the Court erred in deciding that the matters and things set up as a defence in the sixth plea did not constitute a bar to the plaintiff's right of recovery, 173

because the matters and things contained in said plea were, by the rulings of the Court, in the same case, between the same parties, re adjudicata. 2 Fla. Rep., 145. By reference to that case, it will be seen that the objection taken to the decision of the Circuit Court in overruling the plaintiff's demurrer to the defendants's sixth plea, was interposed after the plaintiff had filed a replication to the plea, and had, as the Court there decided, waived his demurrer. The validity of the plea was not decided, nor did the Court look into it, to ascertain its value, as a bar to the action; but it was only held, as he, the plaintiff, had taken issue on it, and there remained no demurrer to it, there was no issue of law on the matter, properly before the Court.

In regard to the second ground set up in the petition, it is to be remarked, that at the trial at this term, the charge or instruction No. 13, therein referred to, was contained in the bill of exceptions, and stated to have been given by the judge to the jury at the trial below, and to have been excepted to by plaintiff; this, therefore, brought the doctrines it contains directly and unavoidably before the Court, for review and adjudication. Their judgment thereon will be found in the opinion delivered; and they do not perceive any valid objection to the assignment of that instruction as erroneous, because the same identical matters of fact, or of law, are set forth in the plea, as a bar to the action, which are contained in the insertion No. 13. This Court certainly did not, in this case, at the former trial, 2 Florida R., 145., make any decisoin as to the legality of defendant's plea No. 6, but declined to consider it. If, therefore, tha plea, in the facts it alleges, and the bar to the action which it thereby seeks to maintain, is identical in principle with instruction No. 13, above mentioned, it follows, if the opinion delivered at the present term in this case is correct in law, that plea does not present a good legal bar to the action; that the issue it presents is an immaterial issue, and if found for the defendant, could conclude the plaintiff nothing; and if the other material issues were found for the plaintiff, then judgment non obstante vere dicto ought to be given for plaintiff on that issue; but as the finding was a general verdict for defendant, then a venire facias de novo was the proper remedy.

The third remedy raised is supposed to be mainly answered; but 174 it may be remarked, that let that instruction No. 13 have relation to what plea or pleas in this case it may, they will separately be affected to the extent they, or either of them, may be in conflict with the law, as contained in the opinion delivered in this case at this present term of the Court.

The 7th, 8th and 9th pleas of defendant, are pleas which allege (in various ways) that Mitchell, the plaintiff, for a value consideration, gave delay of payment to Doggett, the principal obligor, without the knowledge and consent of Cotten, the surety. H. Doggett was examined as a witness touching the matters in issue in those pleas, and in answer to the 10th interrogatory, says: "Witness saith he was not in Florida, and did not see the said Mitchell about the time mentioned in the interrogatory, or make any contract with him about further time." Cotten, in his letter to Mitchell, dated 25th of November, 1844, says: "You were so kind as to tell me, in the last conversation we had upon this subject, that, whenever I desired it, you would proceed to collect, and I now say that unless, &c., I shall certainly wish you to proceed, as quick as possible, to collect your money from Col. Doggett." Again: "I have no wish to have Col. Doggett pushed, and my permitting the note to run so long, is, I think, satisfactory proof of that fact." There is no testimony of any witness in the case, but what is made by Henry Doggett and John W. Cotten, going to sustain the issues on the three above mentioned pleas, and Doggett himself, the witness of defendant, says "he made no contract with Mitchell about further time." It also abundantly appears, that Mitchell commenced a suit soon after Cotten desired him to do so. Will the counsel ask the Court to shut their eyes, and suppose testimony on which these issues could or might have been found for defendants?

It is said the bill of exceptions does not state that it embraced all the testimony given in the case. At page 36 of the printed record, at the end of the testimony, it is said, "This being the whole testimony offered," &c.

The fourth ground of the petition is, that the matter and things alleged in the sixth plea, and found by the verdict of the jury, did not constitute a defence to the action—was not duly considered by the Court, the same not having been fully argued to this Court at this term, because appellee's counsel no longer regarded it as an open question. The answer is, the 13th instruction was before the Court, 175 and elaborately argued, and maturely considered by the Court, and the law arising thereon announced in the opinion delivered. It is the determination on that 13th instruction which affects the 6th plea of defendant, and counsel must have been as well apprized of the effect of reversing that instruction at the argument as they are now.

The fifth ground of the petition has been mainly replied to, in our review of the third.

But suppose we are mistaken, and the jury, on the testimony before them, meant to find these issues, Nos. 7, 8 and 9, or one of them, for defendant, we can only say, it does not appear plainly to us; but it appears much more probable, that the plea of the statute of limitations with them formed a bar to the second count; and the sixth plea, under the 13th instruction, formed a bar to a recovery on the first count. And upon the whole case, justice appears to be advanced by ordering a new trial. It is, therefore, ordered by the Court, that the rehearing petitioned for in this case be denied.

THE UNION BANK OF FLORIDA, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, VS. THE HEIRS AND TERRETENANTS OF JEREMIAH POWELL, DECEASED, DEFENDANTS IN ERROR.

The act of November 10th, 1828, requires that a scire facias or action of debt against executors or administrators, or other persons having charge of the estates of deceased persons, upon any judgment against their testators or intestates, shall be brought within five years from their qualification. All such judgments, after the expiration of five years from the qualification of the executors, administrators, &c., are presumed to be paid, unless some proceeding shall have been had in the intermediate time.

It is not necessary to state in a plea of this statute, that no proceeding had been taken within that time. To avoid the bar, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to show such proceeding.

The 18th chapter of 13th Edward 1st, which gives the elegit, is not in force in this State, because it is inconsistent with the statute of this State which provides for the sale of land on execution. But the chapter which gives the writ of scire facias is in force here by virtue of the act of November 6, 1829, adopting the common and statute laws of England, which are of a general and not local nature, with certain exceptions and provisions.

A judgment at law, or a decree in equity, is a lien upon the lands of a debtor 176 which binds from its rendition. This lien is not lost by the death of the debtor, but it continues only upon the compliance by the creditor with the provisions of the laws regulating the exhibition and enforcement of demands against the estates of decedents.

Lands are assets, under the laws of this State, and it is the duty of the executor or administrator, in case there should be a failure of personal assets, to make application in the mode pointed out by law, for the sale of the lands. This is not a matter of discretion with him.

Upon the death of the ancestor, the fee vests in the heir, but he takes it subject to the payment of debts.

Lands being held to be assets in this State in the hands of the personal representatives, it is not necessary in a proceeding by scire facias against the heirs and terretenants to make the executor or administrator of the deceased, a party. It is questionable whether it is necessary to make the heirs and terretenants parties to a proceeding by scire facias to subject the lands. Unless they can be regarded as persons in charge of the estate and the lands in their hands assets, they are not properly made parties.

Error to Leon County Circuit Court.

This case is stated in the opinion of the Court. The judgment in the Court below was rendered at the Spring Term, 1849, Honorable THOMAS BALTZELL, Judge, presiding.

The case was argued in this Court by R. S. Hayward and L. A. Thompson, Esq., for plaintiff in error, and by M. A. Long, Esq., for defendants in error.

R. S. Hayward, for plaintiff in error:

The Court below erred in overruling plaintiff's demurrer to first plea of defendants, because—

1. The plea is no answer to the scire facias. The scire facias was a proceeding in this case, to revive a judgment against the heirs and terretenants of Jeremiah Powell, were bound by a judgment against him and others. The plea urges as a ground for not charging these heirs and terretenants, that certain persons qualified as executrix and executors of Powell, and that said scire facias did not issue within five years next after such qualification. Now, this executrix and these executors are not parties to this proceeding—they are not mentioned in the scire facias or declaration; and if it had been ne-

177 cessary that the scire facias should have been issued against them, and not against the heirs and terretenants, the failure to name them in the scire facias would have been good ground for a plea in abatement.

2. The plea is sufficient. It is based upon the act of November 10th, 1828, Thomp. Dig., p. 444, sec. 3, § 2, which says "no action of debt," &c. The plea should have stated, not only that five years had elapsed from the qualification of said executrix and executors to the suing out of said scire facias, but that no proceeding had been had upon said judgment within that time.. The law does not absolutely require that scire facias shall be sued out against executors or administrators within five years, but that that shall be done, or some proceeding had upon the judgment, in order to do away the presumption of payment. It would be hard, if, whilst we are endeavoring to make our demand out of the survivors in this case, the statute of limitations should be running on to bar us of our ultimate rights against the executors of the deceased, in the event of the insolvency of the survivors. This point is before your Honors, in this case of Oscar Fillyau and wife vs. Henry Laverty.

But the principal question which arises upon demurrer to defendant's plea is this: Could the executrix and executors of Powell have been properly made defendants to this scire facias? If they could, then the above statute of limitations may have been correctly pleaded in bar of our action—if they could not, then their plea was demurrable. The judgment upon which this scire facias issued, was founded upon a written contract—it was a joint judgment; and by reference to 1st Chitty's Pleadings, page 50, it will be seen that, "in the case of a joint contract, if one of the parties die, his executor or administrator is at law discharged from liability, and the survivors alone can be sued; and if the executor be sued, he may either plead the survivorship in bar, or give it in evidence under the general issue." If the contract were several, or joint and several, the executor or the deceased may be sued at law in separate action, but he cannot be sued jointly with the survivor, because one is to be charged DE BONIS TESTATORIS, and the other DE BONIS PROPRIIS." Vide note 4 Chitty's Pleadings, p. 50. This authority is conclusive upon the point that the executrix and executors of Powell could not have been made defendants in the scire facias. Clearly, then, the 178 statute of limitations, applying to executors and administrators, can not be properly pleaded as a bar to our proceeding against the heirs and terretenants. This statute, however, it may be urged, not only operates as a bar to persons suing executors or administrators, but also applies to those who sue "other persons having CHARGE of the estate of a testator or intestate." This clause was never intended to apply to heirs and terretenants, who have the estate itself, and not the charge of it. It refers simply to curators.

I have shown that the executors or administrators of a deceased party to a joint judgment, cannot be proceeded against at law. The next question presented in the cause is this: Can we subject the lands of Powell, in the hands of his heirs and terretenants, to the payment of the claim of the Union Bank of Florida?

By the law of England, "where judgment is had against several defendants, and one of them dies before execution, since the charge upon the judgment survives as to the personalty, thought not as to the realty, the plaintiff may have scire facias, framed upon the special matter, viz: against the survivor, to show cause why the plaintiff should not have execution against him of his goods, and chattels, and of the moiety of his land, and against the heirs and terretenants of the deceased, to show cause why the plaintiff should not have execution of the moiety of the lands of the deceased, without mentioning any goods." 2 Saunders R., p. 72.

This proceeding against the moiety of the lands in the hands of and survivors, and the moiety in the hands of the heirs and terretenants, originated under the statute West. 2, 13 Edward 1st, which gave the scire facias and elegi, and enabled the plaintiff to extend half of the land of each of the parties defendant, until his debt was paid. Our writ of fieri facias gives us a more extended remedy, by rendering all the lands subject to sale; so that where in England, the plaintiff in scire facias proceeded against half the lands only, we ask here to have execution of the whole.

Such is the English law, and such is the law of this State, except so far as it has been altered by statute.

Let us see how far our statutes have qualified the right, which, under the law of England, we had. The statute of this State, passed in 1833, Thompson's Digest, page 202, section 7, par. 2, declares that "real estate shall be considered assets," &c.

Paragraphs three and six further provide, Thompson's Digest, 202. 179
These are the principal enactments of 1833, relative to the making realty assets in the hands of executors and administrators. It is considered assets, and after personal assets are exhausted, may be sold to pay debts, under an order from the Judge of Probate. This was certainly a very imperfect state of the law, when we consider that the same statute which made lands assets in the hands of the executor or administrator, did not require the executor or administrator even to inventory the real property of his testator or intestate; and the bond, which the law of 1828, Thomp. Dig., page 197, par 9, required him to give, was only conditioned for the making a true and perfect inventory of all and singular the goods and chattels, rights and credits of the deceased, which shall come to his hands, and further to make a just and true account of his administration of such goods, chattels, rights and credits, and to pay over the balance, &c.

Under such a state of the law, if the executor reduced land to possession, under an order of Probate Court, and sold it, and kept the money the only remedy which creditors or heirs would have, viz: suit on his bond, would be entirely unavailable, because his bond does not cover realty.

But the statute of 1841, Thomp. Dig., page 203, section 7, paragraphs 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, went further, and required the executor or administrator, when it became necessary to sell real estate for the payment of debts, or to make more equal distribution amongst the heirs or devisees, to petition the Circuit Court, setting forth the reason for his application, &c. Whereupon, the Court will order citations to all the heirs or devisees, who may appear and answer, and oppose the application, and take testimony, as in Chancery cases, to controvert the allegations of the petitioners. It becomes indeed as a Chancery cause, between the heirs or devisees, and the administrators or executors, and if the executor or administrator succeed, the Court appoints commissioners, (not the executor or administrator,) but commissioners, to sell the real estate, and the petitioner never gets nor can get possession of these assets, from the commissioner, until he enters into a bond, (another bond from his ordinary administration bond,) for the faithful payment and application of the fund arising from the sale made by the commissioners, according to the decree of the Circuit Court, rendered in the cause. The law of '41 does not entrust petitioner with the realty, it regards him as antago- 180 nistic to the heirs; it seems designed to protect the heir from his encroachments, and it will not even allow the proceeds of sale, and never the land itself, to reach his hands without some security, additional to his bond for the adminstration of his goods, chattels, right and credits; nor to apply one cent of said fund to the payment of any debt, except as ordered by the Court in its decree. And further, upon the coming in of the report of the commissioners, the Court will render a final decree in the cause; and, if the terms of the sale have been complied with, will direct the commissioners, (not the executor or administrator,) to convey.

The above is a brief expositon of the substance of the law of 1841, and from this view, I think we may conclude, that there are several conditions precedent to lands becoming assets in the hands of the executors or administrators: 1. Petition. 2. Hearing and good cause shewn. 3. Decree. 4. Bond. Even then, he only gets the monies from the commissioners, which are henceforth regarded as assets.

If this be true, may not lands be pursued by a judgment creditor, (who has a lien upon them by a subsequent statute to that making them assets,) unless executor or administrator file his petition? May not lands be liable to a judgment creditor, if upon petition heard, it be decreed by the Circuit Court, that the personalty is sufficient and that the realty be not sold. A judgment creditor has a lien upon lands, and I contend that these lands go to the hands of the heir charged with the judgment. Again, suppose the Executor fail to give the bond required, do not the lands continue in the hands of the heir? (See Fitzpatrick et al. vs. B. and W. Edgar, 5 Ala. R., p. 503.) If they continue in the hands of the heir, are they not subject to the lien of a judgment? The lien of a judgment upon lands is analogous to that of an execution upon personalty. See the case of Moseley vs. Edwards, 2 Florida Reps., where the lien of a judgment upon lands being declared to be a lien as at common law, is regarded as notiable to be divested by laches, as in Alabama. Fitzpatrick et al. vs. B. and W. Edgar.

What change has our statute effected in the law of England? I answer simply this: that all debts not in judgment, must be presented with us to the executor or administrator; whereas in England, the lands descended were liable in the hands of an heir to a judgment Union Bank vs. Heirs of Powell.——Argument of Counsel.

181 against him on the bond of his ancestor, in which he was expressly named. This alteration, and only this, has been effected by the Legislature of Florida. Thus far goes the case of Gilchrist, Judge, vs. Fillyau and wife, 2 Flor. Reps., p. 94, and no further. That case declares that an heir cannot, in this State, be sued on the bond of his ancestor, because bond debts are with us no higher dignity than simple contract debts; and because lands, being only sub modo assets, it would be impossible for an executor to know whether the personal estate were insufficient or not, and consequently so to report it as required by law, unless these demands were brought against him. True, the Court seems to decide that lands are assets under our law of 1833, confirmed by 1841, but I do not understand that the Courts regarded them assets, unless, in case of insufficiency of personalty, they are sold by commissioners, and the money paid over to them. For the case of Gilchrist vs. Fillyau was decided by the authority of an Alabama decision, (in which State the law is declared to have furnished a copy for us,) and in that case the defendant pleaded, "That since the scire facias was sued out the estate had, according to the statute, been reported insolvent." See, also, the argument of Elmore, counsel, and the decision of the Court, in the case of Fitzpatrick et al. vs. B. and W. Edgar, 5 Ala. Reps. In the former case, in 1 Stewart, the Court say: "Our statutes have pointed out another mode for subjecting the lands to the payment of debt. If the personal estate be sufficient, the administrator or executor shall make his report accordingly, and the land shall be sold by order of the Court. This court does not abridge the rights of creditors, for as the administrator cannot have fully administered, if, on a deficiency of personal estate, he fails to make his report as required, so that the lands may be resorted to, the remedy is more ample than at common law." What was the remedy at common law? Suit against the executor to subject the personalty alone to the payment of the debt. How was the remedy enlarged by the statute of Alabama? By making it the duty of the executor or administrator to report the personalty insufficient, and to apply for sale of realty and if he did not do this, he and his securities were liable on his administration bond. Suppose he neglected to do this, did the realty become assets in his hands? I imagine not—it remained with the heir, and the executor and his securities paid the debt. But what was the condi-
182 tion of the bond? It was that he should well and truly perform all the duties which are, or may be by law required of him. Clay's Ala. Dig., p. 221, sec. 3. This condition is broad enough to cover a case of refusal to make application for the sale of realty. But suppose, in Florida, the executor or administrator should fail or refuse to make the application spoken of in the statute, would the creditor have a remedy by suing him on bond, the condition of which is only to administer faithfully the goods and chattels, rights and credits which come to his hands? I cannot think he would be able to recover in such a case. Notwithstanding the Alabama law was, in this respect, so much more perfect at the time of the decision in 1 Stewart, p. 193, than our own is, the Legislature, deeming it unequal to the attainment of the desired object, passed subsequently the following act: "Whenever an executor of any deceased testator," &c. 5 Ala. Reps., p. 501, which case see passim—and again in 1843, the Legislature of the State passed another law requiring the Court to demand of an executor or administrator a bond for administration of goods and chattels, &c., together with realty. Clay's Ala. Dig., p. 229, sec. 44. The first of these statutes set forth in the opinion of the Judge, in the case of Fitzpatrick et al. vs. Edgar, before cited, is the only law of Alabama which ever gave any remedy against the heirs—for by the common law, the heir could only be made liable in a real action, and the stat. Wes. ? was never adopted there. There is consequently this distinction to be taken between the law of Alabama and the law of this State—that there the lands were never liable in the hands of the heir, unless the remedy were expressly given by statute, and here, the right to pursue them in the hands of the heir exists, unless expressly taken away by statute.

I have before remarked that the remedy of the bond creditor of the ancestor is thus taken away by statute—or in other words, the statute of Florida has, to that extent altered the law of England. Let us go one step further, and enquire if our statute has made any alteration in the English law in relation to the method of proceeding on the part of a judgment creditor. In 2d Saunders, p. 72, it is laid down, that where a judgment is had against one who dies before execution, upon a return of nihil to a scire facias against his personal representative, a scire facias will lie against his heirs and terretenants. In such a case, I should suppose that, under our law, nihil could not be returned to the executors or administrators properly, so long as heirs 183 had any real estate which the executors might, upon application, reduce to assets, and consequently this final resort against the heirs, in such an event, would be superfluous.

But where judgment is had against several parties to a joint contract, the executors or administrators of a deceased party, as I have before shown, are not liable at law—they cannot be charged jointly with the survivors, because you cannot have execution de bonis testatoris and de bonis propriis. Such a judgment being no charge upon the executor, if the personalty were sufficient to pay all the other debts of the estate, he would not reduce the land to assets on account of said judgment; the heirs, I imagine, could successfully resist his application so to do, if he desired it, because he (executor) is not bound for such a debt, and the lands have descended to the heirs under our statute of descents—or in other words, the fee has been cast upon them, subject to the charge of such a judgment. To this it may be answered, the executor is liable in equity—but I submit to this Court that we are judgment creditors, whose claim is made by statute a lien upon land. Ours is not an equitable lien, to be enforced, after great and expensive litigation, in a Court of Chancery—it is not such a lien as can be deferred to junior incumbrances, and postponed even to simple contract creditors, as might be the case if we were driven in to equity, but it is a statutory lien, and one which our statute declares shall be a "lien as at common law, which words, this Court has decided, mean something. Case of Moseley vs. Edwards, decided at the last term.

From this, I think it fairly deducible that the law of England has undergone no change, through the medium of our statutes, with respect to the remedy against the survivors, and the heirs and terretenants of a joint judgment debtor. Our statute in such case gives no remedy against executors or administrators, and until it provides one, and thus alters the practice, which, by virtue of our adoption of the English statutes, must be pursued, this proceeding is regular and sustained by law.

M. A. Long, for defendant in error:

1. Two principal questions arise in this cause. The one is, whether in Florida, a scire facias can be maintained against the heirs and terretenants of a deceased person, against whom and others 184 a joint judgment had been rendered before his death, to have execution of the real estate of the deceased. This arises upon demurrer to defendant's plea, which reaches back to the declaration. I contend that upon a full view of our several statutes, it will appear that this remedy is obsolete in this State, or more properly speaking, has been superseded by another and a better.

In England, "where a judgment is had against one who dies before execution, it is said that a "scire facias will not lie against his heirs and terretenants, until a nihil is returned to a scire facias against his personal representative." 2 Saund. Rep., 72. But "where there are several defendants, and one of them dies before execution, since the charge upon the judgment survives as to the personalty, though not as to the realty," &c., "the plaintiff may have a scire facias framed upon the special matter, namely, against the survivor, to show cause why the plaintiff should not have execution against him of his goods and chattels, and of the moiety of his lands, and against the heirs and terretenants of the deceased, to show why the plaintiff should not have execution of a moiety of the lands of the deceased, without mentioning any goods." Ibid.

Now I ask the Court to observe, that where the judgment is against one only, who dies before execution, no scire facias can be had against the heirs and terretenants, without first attempting to make the money out of the personal property in the hands of the representative of the estate. In default of sufficient personalty in the hands of the executor or administrator, the lands are resorted to in the hands of the heir (who is the oldest son) and terretenants, because the same in that country does not go to the executor and administrator, and could never be subjected at all to the payment of judgments, if resort was not had to him, to whom alone they directly descend.—"By the laws of Florida, there is no such thing as primogeniture; the land descends in parcenary, and is expressly declared assets in the hands of the administrator or executor, and after the exhaustion of the personal assets, may be sold to pay debts due by the estate, besides being liable with personal property to an execution existing upon any judgment against such executor or administrator," is the language of this Court in the case of Gilchrist vs. Fillyau and wife. 2 Fla. Rep., 95.

185 It is obvious, therefore, that there is no necessity in Florida for a scire facias against the heirs and terretenants, in order to subject the land to the payment of a judgment against one person who has died before execution—the whole estate, real and personal, being in the hands of the executor and administrator, subject to all debts. Until the debts are all paid, and the surplus, if any, distributed, a resort to the heir is not only useless, but impossible, for up to that time the land is in the hands or possession of the administrator. The land remains assets in the hands of the administrator until all the debts are paid and the administration closed. It is little short of absurd to say that during the administration, and before the debts are paid, that the same land is subject to the same debts in the hands of the heir. Lands cannot constitute assets in the hands of different persons at the same time.

It will be noticed also, that in the above extracts from Saunders' Reps. in relation to cases where there are several defendants, and one dies, that the reason why the scire facias is allowed against the heirs, is because "the charge upon the judgment survives as to the personalty, though not to the realty." Therefore, in cases where the personalty of the survivors may be insufficient, in the apprehension of the plaintiff, he may have scire facias against the heir to compel him to "show cause why plaintiff should not have execution of a moiety of the lands of the deceased, without mentioning any goods." The goods are not mentioned, because not in the hands of the heir. Now, I say, that this reason for pursuing the heir does not exist in this State, under our system. "The charge upon the judgment," to use the language of the book, survives as to the realty as well as to the personalty, in this State. "Since the charge upon the judgment" does survive as to the realty, the plaintiff may not have a scire facias against the heir. He has no use for such a remedy, or any other, even in equity, until it shall appear that he has exhausted all the real and personal estate of the survivors. In the case before the Court, the survivors have not been pursued at all, as they might have been, according to the case cited on the other side from 1 Cowen's Reports. "At the common law, the charge upon the judgment being personal, "survived; so that where there are two or more defendants in a "personal action, and one dies after judgment, execution may issue "against the survivor, without a scire facias. The execution, how-186 "ever, must be taken out against all defendants, otherwise it will "not be warranted by the judgment. 1 Lord Raymond, 224. 2 "Tidd., 10, 29. The reason given is, there is no alteration of the "record, nor any new party made liable to the execution."

If the plaintiff should fail to realize his judgment from the survivors upon the execution so issued against them, it would then be time enough to inquire whether any remedy existed against the estate of the deceased, by bill in equity or otherwise. It may be true, that the death of one of several persons, against whom a judgment at law has been obtained, totally extinguishes the same as to him, and certainly is so, I apprehend, if the position of the counsel be correct, that his death destroys all right to collect the same out of the personal estate. This is obvious, because our statute requires all the debts of intestates to be paid out of the personal property, if there be sufficient for the purpose, allowing the land to be resorted to only in the event of a deficiency of personal property. This most wise and important principle of our law would be repealed in every instance in which a judgment like the present should exist. Now, if the British statute of 2 West. does allow the remedy in that country, which the plaintiff has pursued in this instance, I think it manifest that the same is inconsistent with our statute, which directly prohibits a resort to the land in any case until the personalty is exhausted, and therefore the British statute must give way to our own. The first section of the act of 1829, Thompson's Dig., 21, which declares what portions of the statute and common law of England shall be of force in Florida, has this proviso: "The said statute and common law to be not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States, and the acts of the General Assembly of this State." The principle and reason of the position assumed by the plaintiff in this case, seems to be totally inconsistent with the principles and reason of our system. It is plain that the right to resort to the heir in any case in England, resulted from the fact that the land could not otherwise be applied, to any extent whatever, towards the satisfaction of any debt of an intestate. It is also equally plain, that the land descended to the heir or oldest son directly, and never constituted assets in the hands of the administrator of the deceased, solely in consequence of a fundamental principle of the British Government, to wit, the preservation of a wealthy landed aristocracy. "When the Emperors," says Blackstone, 2 Com., 183, "began to create honorary feuds, or titles 187 of nobility, it was found necessary, (in order to preserve their dignity,) to make them impartible, or (as they styled them,) feuda individua, and in consequence descendible to the oldest son alone."

If this proceeding can now be sustained, it could be in any case, even before an administrator could be appointed to represent a deceased person's estate, and thus subject the land to sale, although there be sufficient personalty to pay the judgment, and when there was no one authorized to use it for that purpose. This monstrous consequence of the principle contended for on the other side, forcibly illustrates the danger to our whole system of legislation on this subject, by adopting one of the incidents of a principle of the British system totally repugnant to our own. When we repudiate the principle, we must also the incident. I beg to refer the Court to its own clear and forcible exposition of this subject, in case of Gilchrist vs. Fillyau and wife, herein before cited. Most of the reasoning in that case is equally applicable in this.

The 13th section of the act of 10th November, 1828, (Thompson's Digest, 444,) provides that "no action of debt shall be brought against any executor or administrator, or other person having charge of the estate of a testator or intestate, upon a judgment obtained against his testator or intestate; nor shall any scire facias be issued against any executor and administrator, or other person having charge of the estate as aforesaid, to revive such judgment, after the expiration of five years from the qualification of his executor or administrator, or such other person having charge of the estate; and all such judgments, after the expiration of five years, upon which no proceeding shall have been had, shall be deemed to have been paid and discharged."

The first reflection upon this statute is, that it clearly contemplates the enforcement of judgments rendered in the life-time, against the executors and administrators of testators and intestates, and not against heirs or terretenants, unless they are embraced under the terms "or other person having charge of the estate." If those terms do not embrace them, then they are not embraced, and I think they are not, from the fact that the scire facias here spoken of is to revive the judgment, and not to have execution of the land, as is here attempted. The case cited on the other side from Alabama Reports seems to be relevant only in this, that, where a particular mode of 188 collecting or enforcing a judgment is pointed out by our statute, the same must be pursued in all cases. It will be seen that there is no exception in this statute embracing judgments, or allowing them to be enforced against any one else than the representative of the estate. We have already seen why a scire facias in England against the heir was allowed, namely, that the lands of the survivors were not subject to the judgment, which is different in this State; and, therefore, there exists no shadow of reason for making any distinction in this respect between joint and separate judgments—for in each case, whatever is to be paid, is to be paid out of the land, in default of sufficient personalty.

The counsel on the other side say they must resort to the land, because they say they have no right to the personal effects. Now it seems plain that, if they were right in this, it would follow that they have proceeded against the wrong party. We have already seen that, until all the debts are paid, and the administration closed by final distribution, the lands remain in the hands of the executor or administrator. The tenants in possession of the land hold under the executor or administrator; for, as this Court remark in the case of Gilchrist vs. Filyau, "The rents and profits of the land constitute "a fund for the payment of creditors, and as they must by our laws "look to the executor or administrator for payment of their demands, "how could that fund be made available, unless the estate from "which it springs be made amenable for the debts? and the law "points out the mode in which it is to be accomplished. The rents "and profits are incident to the land, and it is obvious that the law "intended the whole estate to be subject to the payment of the "debts." 2 Florida Reports, 97.

This construction of our statutes, seems to amount to a very positive adjudication, that all creditors must look to the executors or administrators for payment of their demands, from which it follows that if the plaintiff has any debt at all, he must enforce the same against the person upon whom the law has cast the whole estate, real and personal, for the purpose of paying debts. It is equally plain, that if the plaintiff has any existing debt, on account of the judgment against the deceased, it is the debt of the estate, and not that of the heirs or tenants. If the plaintiff is correct in saying that he has no remedy 189 against the executor of the deceased, it is plain that he has none whatever, from the nature of the thing, and the decision above quoted.

2. If the plaintiff's judgment against the deceased was extinguished by his death, as I think, virtually admitted by the plaintiff's counsel, and as is very probable, then the Court need not inquire into the second question raised in this record, viz: that the judgment as to Powell "shall be deemed to be paid and discharged," because no proceedings were had on said judgment within five years from the appointment of the executor in this case. But, because the Court may choose to consider this point, I will make a few suggestions. This language seems to imply something more than an ordinary statute of limitations to the remedy, and much more than a mere presumption of payment arising from the lapse of time, which might be rebutted by proof, as recognized in equity. Webster defines the word deem to mean "to think, to judge, to be of opinion, to conclude on consideration," &c. "Deemed—thought, judged, supposed." This judgment, then, is by the Court to be "thought, supposed, judged," and "concluded on consideration," "to be paid and discharged;" or in the language of Webster in defining the latter word, "paid, released, acquitted, performed, executed." This statute must be "regarded as one of repose, and specifying a period after which litigation must cease," as remarked by the Court in the case above cited.

I will only remark, in conclusion, that the formal objection taken to the plea of this statute, namely, that it does not aver that no proceedings were had on said judgment until the suing out of this scire facias, is untenable. This fact abundantly appears from the judgment itself, the writ of scire facias, and the declaration of the plaintiff. If a writ of execution had been issued against the survivors, as I have shown was proper, there would have been no particular sense in calling on them by this writ to show cause why one should not issue.

I think, upon a review of the whole question, this Court must confirm the judgment of the Court below, and thereby give symmetry and consistency to our statute-system of settling up estates of deceased persons, and of paying "all debts of whatsoever nature."

L. A. Thompson, in reply, contended:

1. That the section 13 of the act of November 10, 1828, on which the plea is framed, applies only to executors or administrators, or 190 others acting in a like fiduciary capacity, in the charge or care of the estate of any testator or intestate, and cannot be pleaded by heirs or terretenants.

The phrase, "or other person in charge of the estate," is clearly not intended to include heirs and terretenants—for they are not in charge of the estate of the testator or intestate, but they are in possession, and claim as owners and proprietors, although the lands may be subject to liens created or suffered by the former proprietor.

The defendants cannot claim the bar as one given them, nor as coming within the relative and generic meaning of the terms used in the statute.

II. That they cannot claim the benefit of the bar derivatively, through the executor or administrator—because to do this, it must be on some demand which is a charge on the proper fund committed to the executor, and this judgment is not such a demand.

The law of Florida gives the personalty to the executor or administrator as a fund to pay debts with; and if the same be insufficient, it authorizes a condemnation of the real estate to supply the deficit. Thomp. Dig., 202, 203, Sect. 6 & 7. Gilchrist vs. Filyau, 2 Fla. R., 94.

It is assumed as incontrovertible, that the executor cannot proceed to condemnation of real estate to pay a debt which is not chargeable upon the primary fund in his hands. The law directs him to pay from the personal property which goes to him, using the slaves last, and if this is insufficient, then to condemn the realty by the judgment of a Court, convert it into personalty, and apply it. Surely, then, no Court would grant the prayer of the petition to pay a debt, if that debt did not constitute a charge upon his peculiar and proper fund, or had been barred by the statute of non-claim.

The judgment on which this writ is procured, did not form a charge upon the personalty of the deceased, but being joint against the testator and other persons, it survived against the lands and personalty of the survivors, and against the lands of the deceased only. 2 Tidd Pr., (9th ed.,) 1122. 2 Wms. Saund., 51, n. 4. Woodcock vs. Bennett, 1 Cowen R., 738. Erwin vs. Dundas, 4 How. S. C. R., 77. Panton vs. Hall, Carthew, 105.

It is supposed that our statute differs from the common law, as to what are charges upon the fund in the hands of the executor and the 191 mode of administration. This is an error. Our statute only directs the order in which debts are to be paid, and like the common law, makes all debts, whether due by record, specialty, or simple contract, payable out of the personalty. If it is not so provided in express terms; it results by necessary implication.

The provisions of the common law on this subject, will be found in 2 Wms. on Executors, 651-2, 656, 666, 674.

The personalty of the deceased being discharged, and his lands only remaining chargeable, the object of this proceeding is to enforce the lien given by the act of February 12, 1834. Thomp. Dig., 351, upon those lands in the hands of the heirs and terretenants.

It is conceded, that if this claim was a charge upon the fund committed to the administrator, that is, the personalty, and the bar had attached then, as in the case of the statute of non-claim, these parties could claim the benefit of it derivatively; this, however, is the very position which we deny. It would have been an act of mal-administration in him, if he had paid it.

DOUGLAS, C. J.

This is a proceeding by scire facias issued out of the Circuit Court of Leon County against the heirs and terretenants of Jeremiah Powell, deceased, upon a judgment obtained by the plaintiff in the Superior Court of Leon County at its November Term, A. D. 1838, against John Westcott, Jr., George W. Fletcher, William S. Paulin, James D. Westcott, Jr., and Jeremiah Powell, for the sum of $1783 50-100, &c. Since which time (as appears by the declaration herein filed, which is in the usual form,) the said Jeremiah Powell has departed this life. The defendants put in a number of pleas to this declaration, one only of which, however, is presented for our consideration.

That plea alleges that "heretofore, to wit, on the 15th day of January, A. D. 1840, in the County of Leon, aforesaid, Violet Powell, Nathaniel Hamlin, and John W. Adams, duly qualified as executrix and executors of the last will and testament of Jeremiah Powell, deceased, and letters testamentary were thereupon issued to the said Violet Powell, Nathaniel Hamlin, and John W. Adams, by the Judge of the County Court of said County of Leon, sitting as a Court of Probate, and that the said scire facias was not sued out by said plain- 192 tiff within five years next after the said Violet Powell, Nathaniel Hamlin, and John W. Adams, qualified as executrix and executors of the said last will and testament of the said Jeremiah Powell, as aforesaid, and this," &c. &c.

To this plea, the plaintiff filed a demurrer, to which there was a joinder, and after argument had thereon, it was considered and adjudged by the Court, that this said demurrer be overruled, and that the plaintiff take nothing by his bill, &c.

The first question presented for our consideration according to the course of argument at the hearing of this cause, is, whether this plea, as pleaded, is a bar to the action. It is urged in a printed argument (which is now before us,) and which does much credit to the gentleman who prepared it, that the plea is insufficient. It is based upon the act of November 10th, 1828, Thompson's Digest, page 444, sec. 3, no. 2, which says, "no action of debt shall be brought against any executor or administrator, or other person having charge of the estate of a testator or intestate, upon any judgment obtained against his testator or intestate, nor shall any scire facias be issued against any executor or administrator or other person having charge of the estate as aforesaid, to revive such judgment, after the expiration of five years from the qualification of such executor or administrator, or of such other person having charge of the estate, and all such judgments, after the expiration of five years, upon which no proceedings shall have been had, shall be deemed to have been paid and discharged, saving," &c. "The plea, (it is insisted) should have stated not only that five years had elapsed from the qualification of said executrix and executors to the suing out of said scire facias, but that, no proceeding had been had upon said judgment within that time."

The general rule in pleading laid down by Chitty, vol. 1, page 229, is in these words: "In pleading upon statutes, where there is an exception in the enacting clause, the plaintiff must show that the defendant is not within the exception; but if there be an exception in a subsequent clause, that is matter of defence, and the other party must show it, to exempt himself from the penalty." The same principle is laid down in 5 Bac. Ala., title Statute L. 1 East., 646, in note. Rex vs. Pratten, 6 Term Reps., 559.

Union Bank vs. Heirs of Powell.—Opinion of Court.

193 But the case at bar does not seem to come within this rule. The peculiar provision of our statute seems to render it necessary that the plaintiff should, by his declaration, show that some proceedings have been had on the judgment within the five years, and that those proceedings have been unavailable, in part at least; otherwise he will show that he is proceeding on a judgment that has in fact been paid, or that in law is deemed to have been paid and discharged. For instance, in this very case, the plaintiff sets out in the declaration the record of the judgment in the Court below, rendered on the 9th day of November, A. D., 1838, more than seven years before the commencement of this suit, which was not instituted until more than six years had elapsed after the said Violet Powell, Nathaniel Hamlin and John W. Adams, had been duly qualified as executrix and executors of the last will and testament of the said Jeremiah Powell, deceased. If any proceedings were had upon that judgment in the meantime, they form a part of the record, and should appear in it; as no such proceedings appear by the record to be had in five years after the qualification of the said executrix and executors, as set forth in the plea we are considering, or before the commencement of this suit, and none are alleged in the declaration to have taken place, it is to be presumed that none were had, and the law, therefore, decrees the judgment to have been paid and satisfied. The words of the statute are—"Shall be deemed to have been paid and discharged," saving, &c. The word "discharged," as defined by Webster, in his Dictionary Ed. of 1848, page 339, means "paid, released, acquitted, freed from debt, performed, executed." The plaintiff, therefore, is endeavoring to recover a debt, which, according to his own showing, appears to have no existence. He might have relieved himself from this dilemma, by showing (if the fact were so) that a fieri facias had been issued on this judgment, and returned nulla bona, or only in part satisfied; or that other proceedings were had, if any had been had; this would have placed him rectus in curia. As it is, he seems to have no standing in court. This case, too, appears to come within another rule of pleading, viz: that matter which comes more properly from the plaintiff, need not be stated in the plea. Griswold vs. National Ins. Co., 3 Cowen, 96. But it is contended that the law does not absolutely require that scire facias should be sued out against executors or administrators within five 194 years; it is admitted, however, that it must be done, or some proceeding had upon the judgment, in order to do away the presumption of payment.

Another important question arises in this case—one which the learned counsel for the plaintiff seems to consider as decisive of the one we have discussed, which is this: "Could the executrix and executors of Powell have been properly made defendants to this scire facias?" "If they could, then it is admitted that the above statute of limitations may have been correctly pleaded in bar of this action." The argument is, that "the judgment upon which this scire facias issued, was founded upon a joint contract—it was a joint judgment; and in case of a joint contract, if one of the parties die, his executor or administrator is at law discharged from liability. and the survivors can alone be sued; and if the executor be sued, he can either plead the survivorship in bar, or give it in evidence under the general issue." "If the contracts were several, or joint and several, the executor of the deceased may be sued at law in a separate action, but he cannot be sued jointly with the survivor, because one is to be charged de bonis testatoris, the other de bonis propriis." And 1st Chitty's Pleadings, page 50, and note 4, is cited as conclusive of this case; and were it not for several provisions of our statutes, which have an important bearing on this question, we might, perhaps, so consider it, although we do not very clearly perceive the soundness of the distinction contained in the latter proposition—"because one is to be charged de bonis testatoris, and the other de bonis propriis; for we find it expressly laid down by the law of England, "that when judgment is against several defendants, and one of them dies before execution, since the charge of the judgment survives as to the personalty, though not as to the realty, the plaintiff may have scire facias framed upon the special matter, viz: against the survivor, to show cause why the plaintiff should not have execution against him of his goods and chattels, and a moiety of his lands, and against the heirs and terretenants of the deceased, to show cause why the plaintiff should not have execution of the moiety of the lands of the deceased, without mentioning goods." Underhill vs. Deveraux, 2 Saund. Rep., 72—citing Panton vs. Hall, which was decided by Lord Holt, in Trin. Term, 1st Will & M., Carew's Reps., 105, in which, it seems, this doctrine was first held; and if a scire facias might be framed upon the special matter in such a case, we are at a 195 loss to see why the same thing might not be done, if, by the provisions of the law, the executors or administrators ought to be made parties with the survivors, or the heirs and terretenants of the deceased, or both. In 2 Tidd's Pr. 1120, it is said, that "where there were two or more defendants, and one of them died after judgment, and before execution, it was formerly holden, that the plaintiff was put to his scire facias against the personal representatives of the deceased; and Yelverton, 208, is cited. In turning to the case of Spencer and Woodward vs. The Earl of Rutland, which is the case referred to, we find it laid down, per totam curiam, Yelverton Justice, "that, although the writ of error is but to discharge the plaintiff, yet, if the judgment be affirmed, the charge will fall on the executor of him that is dead, and does not survive to the other; and, therefore, the executor of Woodward must be made party, that he may plead in salvation of the testator's goods."

Now, although this case seems to have been overruled by Lord Holt, in the case cited from Carthew, yet, we shall see by and by, that it has a bearing upon this case. And in a note to the case of Trethewy vs. Ackland, and Green vs. same, 2 Saund. Reps., 67, it is said, "at common law, the plaintiff might take the goods of the survivor in execution by a fieri facias. But under the statute of Westminister 2, he must sue out an elegit against the lands of the survivor, and also of the heir and terretenants of the deceased, and must sue out a scire facias against the survivor, and the heir and terretenants of the deceased. For it seems that where the lands of several are charged with a debt, it shall not lie wholly upon the survivor, as if a recognizance be acknowledged by several, the lands of all are thereby become chargeable, and execution must be equally made, and if one dies, the creditor must bring a scire facias against his heirs and terretenants and also against the survivors. But it is otherwise, where the lands are not bound, as if two enter into a bond and one dies before judgment, the survivor shall be charged," citing Lompton vs. Callingwood, 4 Mad., 315. So, where judgment in debt was had against two, one died, the plaintiff brought scire facias against the survivor only; the defendant pleaded that the other had left lands and an heir upon whom they had descended, and demanded judgment if he should be compelled to answer, without the heir being warned. To which the plaintiff demurred, and judgment 196 was given that the defendant should answer, for the judgment is against the person. And although by the statute of Westminster 2, which gives the scire facias and elegit, he may charge the lands and make the judgment real; yet it is at his election to proceed against the personalty if he will. But if he will take out execution upon the real lien, the charge must be equally against both. The proceeding against the moiety of the lands in the hands of the survivors, and the moiety in the hands of the heirs and terretenants originated under the statute of West., 2, 13 Edward 1st, which gave the scire facias and elegit, and enabled the plaintiff to extend half the lands of each of the parties defendant until the debt was paid.

Our statute gives a more extended remedy, by providing that lands and tenements (as well as) goods and chattels, shall be subject to the payment of debts, and shall be liable to be taken in execution and sold. Thompson's Digest, page 355, sec. 2, no. 1; and therefore it is contended, as in England, the plaintiff in scire facias was entitled to proceed against half the land, he may here have execution of the whole. This question depends entirely upon the provisions of our own statute. The 18th chapter of 13 Edward 1st, which gives the elegit, is not in force in this State, because it is inconsistent with divers provisions of the act of our General Assembly, and especially those which provide for the sale of land on execution. But the 45th chapter, which gives the writ of scire facias, is in force here by virtue of the provisions of the act of November 6, 1829, which adopts the common and statute laws of England which are of a general and not a local nature, with certain exceptions and provisoes. See Thompsons Digest, page 21, sec. 1, no. 2. The act of 12th February, 1834, ibid., page 350, 357, sec. 4, no. 1, declares, that "every judgment at law and decree in equity which shall be entered and pronounced in any of the Courts of this State, shall create a lien and be binding upon the real estate of the defendant or defendants." How far this provision applies to judgments rendered against executors or administrators, it is not necessary now to determine. The difference between the effect of a judgment in England under the statute of elegit, and a judgment or decree rendered in this State under our statute, was noticed by the Court in the case of Moseley vs. Edwards, at the last term, 2 Flor. Reps., 434. Under

Union Bank vs. Heirs of Powell.—Opinion of Court.

197 the former, the lien did not attach until the writ was issued and levied; it then had relation back and cut out all intermediate incumbrances, and remained a lien until the debt was discharged. Our statute, by the natural import of its terms, makes a judgment at law or decree in equity, a lien upon the lands of the debtor, which binds from its rendition. It is not supposed that the death of a defendant destroys his lien, as remarked in the case of Filyau and wife vs. Laverty, decided at the present term. We see no good reason why the death of a defendant should make the plaintiff's condition any worse than it was before; his lien continues, but he may lose it by his laches. "All debts and demands of whatsoever nature against the estate of any testator or intestate, which shall not be exhibited in two years, shall be forever barred; provided, that the executor or administrator shall, by advertisement to be published once a week for the space of four weeks, in some newspaper printed in this State, give notice to all persons having claims or demands against the estate, that their claims and demands will be barred at the expiration of the period aforesaid, unless exhibited within the same." Thomp. Dig., page 206, no. 6. A party who claims a debt against an estate by virtue of a judgment, and does not exhibit it to the executor or administrator within that time, renders himself liable to have the bar of non claim set up against him. So, if he lets his judgment stand five years after the qualification of the executors or administrators, or other person having charge of the estate, without any proceeding being had upon it, he renders himself liable to a plea of the statute, and may lose the benefit of his lien. If his lien continues, the question is, how is that right to be enforced in such a case as this? Were it not a joint judgment upon a joint contract, the case would be attended with less embarrassment; being such a judgment on such a contract, it is by no means clear of difficulty. Our statute provides that real estate shall be considered assets in the hands of executors and administrators. Duval's Comp., 186, Thomp. Dig., page 202, sec. 7, no. 2.

In England, on scire facias to heirs and terretenants, the executor and administrator was not made a party, because, according to the ruling of Lord Holt, in Panton vs. Hall, above cited, which has ever since been followed, the personalty surviving, the remedy to recover it must survive; but the remedy against the lands could only be 198 against the survivor, and the heirs and terretenants of the deceased, and not against his personal representative. The reporter in that case, says, "that all the personal charge shall survive against John Hall alone, was agreed on all sides," (though the authorities in the margin are quite the contrary,) citing Yelv., 208, and other authorities. There the lands are not assets in the hands of executors and administrators for the payment of debts, but descended to the heir or eldest son, upon the principle of primogeniture. "When the Emperors, (says Sir William Blackstone, 2 Commentary, 183,) began to create honorary feuds or titles of nobility, it was found necessary (in order to preserve their dignity) to make them impartible, or (as they styled them) feuda individua, and in consequence descendible to the eldest son alone." Here all "the real estate is to be considered assets in the hands of executors or administrators—assets, sub modo or conditional assets. Gilchrist, Judge, &c., vs. Fillyau and wife, 2 Flor. Reps., 99. They are all assets for the payment of debts in all cases where the personal estate is exhausted, and may become so before. The act of 17th February, 1833, sec. 4, Duval Comp., 137, Thomp. Dig., 203, no. 3, enacts "that the Judge of Probate or officer discharging the functions of ordinary, may order and decree a sale (in like manner as to supply the deficiency of personal assets) of the real estate of any deceased person, in preference to a sale of slaves where it may be necessary for the payment of just and lawful debts, or demands against his estate, and when it may be deemed most beneficial to the heirs, legal representatives or devisees of the estate." The act of March 4, 1841, Thomp. Dig., 203, 204, no. 6, declares "that it shall be unlawful for any administrator of any deceased intestate, or the executor of any deceased testator, who has not power by the will of the testator, to sell real estate for the purpose of paying debts, or to make more equal distribution amongst the heirs or devisees or legatees, to file a petition in the Circuit Court of the County in which the letters of administration or letters testamentary were granted, &c., for the sale of the real estate." This act is set forth, and the views of this Court so fully expressed upon it in Gilchrist, Judge, &c., vs. Fillyau and wife, above cited, 2 Florida Reps., 96 to 100, that it is deemed unnecessary to enlarge upon it here. This Court, in that case, held that it did not repeal the act of 1833, further than changing the mode by which executors and administrators, were enabled to sell real estate for the payment of debts 199 where there is a deficiency of personal assets; on the contrary, that the law of 1841, is a virtual affirmance of that of 1833, which asserts that lands shall be assets; indeed its provisions as there held, are more extensive, as it enables an executor or administrator, to sell real estate to make more equal distribution, &c. It is clearly the duty of the executor or administrator, in case there should be a failure of personal assets, to make application for the sale of lands in the mode pointed out. It is not a matter with him (said the Court) of mere discretion; being assets, they must carry with them the incidents of assets; the rents and profits of the land constitute a fund for the payment of creditors, and it is obvious that the law intended that the whole estate should be subject to the payment of debts. 2 Flor. Reps., 97. Upon the death of the ancestor, the fee vests in the heir by our statute of descents, but he takes it subject to the debts of the testator or intestate. If the testator or intestate has entered into any written agreement or contract for the conveyance of real estate (in this State) the executor or administrator, (and not the heir) is by statute authorized and empowered to execute such conveyance.

Had the law in these respects been the same in England that it is here, we think that the ruling of the Court there would, in a case like this, have been different. They hold that where any new person is either to be better or worse by the execution, there must be a scire facias, because he is a stranger, to make him a party to the judgment. As in the case of an executor or administrator, Pennyoir vs. Brace, 1 Salk., 319, 1 Lord Raymond, 244, Holt, Ch. J., held that a capias, or fieri facias, being in the personalty, might survive, and might be sued against the survivors, without a scire facias; otherwise of an elegit, for there the heir is to be contributary. Ibid—citing 2 Inst., 471. Dyer, 175. Mad. Cases, 138, and 4 Mad. 404.

Now, an executor or administrator should be made a party to a scire facias here, for the same reason, viz: because he is contributary, and he is a new person, a stranger to the judgment, and to be better or worse by the execution; and it is laid down as a general rule, that, in all cases where the inheritance or freehold is affected, the tenant of the freehold is to be made a party. 8 Bac. Abr. Ed., 1848, page 612. Yelverton says, (page 209) "the executor must be made a party, that he may plead in salvation of the testator's goods." 200
Is it not quite as important that he should have an opportunity to plead in salvation of the testator's lands, where they fall into his hands as assets?—assets for the payment of debts, and it may be for distribution? He cannot plead plene administravit, until the real, as well as personal, assets have been exhausted; he is required to pay all the debts of the estate, which are fairly and justly due, and the order in which they are to be paid is prescribed. First—the necessary funeral expenses; debts due for board and lodging, during the last sickness of the deceased; next physicians' and surgeons' bills, and debts incurred for nursing and other attendance, and for medicines by an apothecary, during the last sickness of the deceased; next judgments of record, rendered and docketed in this State in the life-time of the deceased, and all debts due the State; and, finally, all other debts, whether by specialty or otherwise, without distinction of rank. Thomp. Dig., page 206, No. 3 & 4. Duval's Compilation, 175, 186, The lands are, therefore, assets in the hands of the executors, for the payment of this very judgment, if it has not been paid, or is not by law deemed to be paid, and is not otherwise barred; and if the personal assets in their hands cannot be reached in this case, because, as contended, the judgment does not survive as to them—yet it does, by the rules of the English laws, survive as to the realty; and these executors, standing in the place of the heirs in that regard, so far as the debts due by the estate are concerned, they should have been made parties to this scire facias, and had an opportunity to plead in salvation of these lands.

Whether it was necessary that the heirs and terretenants should have been made parties or not, may be more questionable; it may be proper to remark here, that if these lands can be considered assets in their hands for the payment of this debt, then they are persons, other than executors, in charge of the estate, and are properly made parties to this proceeding; but if the lands are not assets in their hands for the payment of the debt, then the scire facias will not lie against them. We have seen, that if "they have the estate itself," as is contended, it is subject to the payment of this debt, and the executors hold it as assets for that purpose, and have a right to the rents and profits; they hold it not only for the payment of this debt in particular, but for the payment of all the debts of the testator, which were due or owing at his death, and not yet paid, or barred by any statute of limitation, and the heirs, so far as they are in charge of it, hold it for the same purpose.

In the case of Reynolds, administrator, et al., vs. Henderson, administrator, 2 Gilman's Reps., 118, which was a scire facias against the heirs, terretenants and administrator, to enforce the payment of a judgment rendered against the intestate in his life-time, where the question of lien arose as here, service was upon all, and held regular, and so we consider it in this case.

In the case of Bell and others, vs. The Heirs of Robinson, 1st Stewart's Reps., 193, 195, the Chief Justice, delivering the opinion of the Court, said: "Our statute of 1812 gives to judgments and decrees a lien on the lands and tenements, &c., and directs that the clerk shall frame the execution accordingly." The Clerks of our Courts, without any such express direction by statute, have framed an execution to meet the provisions of the statute, which subject lands to levy and sale on execution, and this is in accordance with a rule of law as old as the institution of a Court of Chancery, that where a case arose, and there was no writ to suit it, the Clerks in Chancery should frame one.

We do not, therefore, perceive any insuperable difficulty, were it necessary in such a case as this, again to change the form of the execution, so as to make it reach either the real or personal, or both, in the hands of an executor or administrator.

We are not so strongly attached to technical rules, as to be unwilling to overturn them, when they stand in the way of the administration of substantial justice; and our statutes have opened a way for us to do so. Whether, however, such a change in the process may be necessary, or can be made, we shall leave to be decided when a proper case shall arise, and the question shall be directly presented.

From the view we have taken of this case, we consider the plea a good bar to the action; but were it otherwise, we should feel constrained to act in consonance with the rule, that, upon demurrer, the Court will give judgment for the party, who on the whole case appears to be entitled to it, and against the party who committed the first error. Egberts vs. Dibble, 3 McClean's Reps., 86. Greathouse vs. Dunlap, Ibid, 303. Rosenberg vs. McKaine, 3 Rich. Reps., 145. Parkhill vs. The Union Bank, 1 Florida Rep., 131. Stephen on Pl., 144. 1 Chitty's Pl. 707, and authorities there cited in note 1096; and for the reasons above stated, adjudge the declaration bad.

The judgment of the Court below is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

Per curiam.

SIMON TOWLE, COMPTROLLER, APPELLANT, VS. THE STATE OF FLORIDA, ex rel. FISHER, SHERIFF.

The law requiring a prosecutor to be set at the foot of an indictment for assault and battery, is not merely directory. If it is not done, the indictment for that cause is defective and may be quashed. But if it is not quashed, and process issues upon it, the officer, who is not bound to inquire into the regularity of the proceedings, is entitled to his costs, and the State is bound to pay them, if the party is acquitted.

The writ of mandamus is not the mode by which such a claim is to be enforced against the State. In the absence of any specific provision upon the subject of claims against the State, which the Comptroller rejects or refuses to allow, the only redress is by application to the Legislature.

Where a purely ministerial act is to be done, and there is no other specific remedy, a mandamus will be granted; but where the person against whom a mandamus is prayed is invested with judicial power, or acts in a deliberative capacity, or has the power and right of deciding, the writ will not lie, except to compel him to proceed to the discharge of his duty, by deciding according to the best of his judgment.

The Comptroller of this State, in the administration of the concerns of his office, is required to exercise judgment and discretion, and the Courts cannot act directly upon him by mandamus, and thereby guide and control his judgment and discretion.

The act creating the office of Comptroller vests him with discretion to be exercised in the examination of accounts, claims, or demands against the State. When, in the exercise of his discretion and judgment in any particular case, he rejects an account, the writ of mandamus is not the appropriate remedy.

Appeal from decision of the Circuit Court of the County of Leon, made at the Fall Term, 1849, awarding a mandamus against the Comptroller.

The facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the Court.

Hogue, for appellant.

1. It was error in the Circuit Court to award a mandamus in this case, because, upon the principles governing in cases of this character, the writ does not properly lie. Where a discretion is vested in an executive officer, by law a mandamus will lie to compel him to proceed to the exercise of his discretion, but not directing him as to the mode and manner of its exercise, or as to the decision he should make. This is a matter for his own judgment.

2. The laws of Florida (see Thomp. Dig., 31, and the pamphlet laws, 1848,) give to the Comptroller the power of allowing or disallowing in whole or in part, claims presented against the State, and no provision is made for an appeal from his decision. Without such provision, his decision must be final, subject only to review and reversal by the legislative authority, to which, if a party feels aggrieved, he can apply for redress.

3. A mandamus only lies to compel the performance of a mere ministerial act enjoined by law, or appertaining to the duties of the officer. But where the officer is left to the exercise of his discretion as to whether he will or will not perform the act, it is impossible, upon principle, to coerce performance by mandamus. It is no answer to this to say that the fees of officers are ascertained by law, because still the Comptroller is the judge as to the question whether a particular claim presented is or is not a charge against the State. If this be true, why is he authorized to "admit or reject, allow or disallow." To support these positions, and to show the principle ruling in such cases. I cite Kendall vs. United States, 12 Peters, 524. 10 Pick., 245-6. 2 Va. Cases, 92. U. S. Dig., 3d vol., p. 9, art. 4, § 99—in some of which cases, it will be seen, a mandamus was granted; but the principle which I have laid down was fully recognized as the criterion by which it is to be determined in every case presented, whether the writ is the appropriate remedy. See also the case of Brashear vs. Mason, 6 Howard Sup. Court Reports.

To show that other States have thought it necessary to provide for appeals from the decision of the auditor of public accounts, I refer to 1 Robinson's Practice, page 33.

Maxwell, for appellee:

The relator, Fisher, filed his petition, complaining that the Comptroller refused to allow certain accounts of his against the State, and asking for a mandamus. The accounts were for services as Sheriff, in apprehension, &c. of the persons therein named, who were indicted for assault and battery, and were made up of the fees given by the statute for such services.

The Comptroller answers, admitting the rejection of the accounts, but denying power of the Court to control his action in the matter, on the ground that the statute prescribing his duties and powers invests him with discretion in such cases, not subject to the supervision of the Courts. He answers, further, that if the Court can exercise the power claimed for it, this is not a case in which it will do so, because the statute (Thomp. Dig., 522,) requires a prosecutor to be endorsed on indictments for assault and battery, who shall be liable for costs, on failure of the indictment, and as this was not done in the cases on which the accounts here presented were founded the State is not liable for them.

Upon the petition and answer, the Court below decided that the mandamus shall issue, from which the Comptroller appealed.

The question first arising is, as to the power of the Court to grant the mandamus. Our constitution gives it "original jurisdiction in all matters, civil and criminal, within this State," not excepted by that instrument, (Thomp. 53) and there is no exception against awarding a mandamus according to the common law, which is of force here. "Jurisdiction in all matters, civil and criminal," is certainly a grant of power broad enough to cover a proper case of mandamus. This will more fully appear by reference to the nature of the writ. It is a "command, * * directed to any person, corporation, or inferior court of judicature, * * * requiring them to do some particular thing therein specified, which appertains to their office and duty, and which the Court * * has previously determined, or at least supposes to be consonant to right and justice." This is the definition of Blackstone, (Vol. 3, p. 110.) Lord Mansfield, in 3 Burr, 1266, says: "This writ ought to be used upon all occasions, where the law has established no specific remedy, and where in justice and good government there ought to be one." And this law is founded upon what Blackstone calls a general and indisputable rule, "that where there is a legal right, there is also a legal remedy by suit or action at law, whenever that right is invaded;" in other language of his, it is a "settled and invariable principle in the laws of England, that every right, when withheld, must have a remedy, and every injury its proper redress."" 205

Now, in a clear case of right—for instance, if the legislature had, in so many words, directed the Comptroller to allow and pay this account—these principles would assuredly give the remedy by mandamus, if he refused, because there would be no other legal remedy open to the relator. So it is too, where the statute in general terms allows specified fees for certain services. If the services be performed, and the fact comes before him properly authenticated, there is no discretion left the Comptroller. He is but acting in a ministerial capacity, and must obey the directions of the law. He may have discretion in reference to accounts against the State, where the statute has made no specific regulations as to the charges. Then it would be for him to judge whether the account were too large or not; and the most a Court could do in such a case if the Comptroller refused to entertain it, would be by mandamus to direct him to audit and allow what was proper.

The discreation claimed for the Comptroller exceeds that given him by the statute—see Thompson's Dig., 31; and is certainly not intended to be given where the law itself specifies what shall be allowed, as in the cases of officers of the Court.

The Court, then, having the power to issue the writ of mandamus against the Comptroller in a proper case, the only question remaining is, whether this is a proper case, for its exercise. The facts are not disputed. The relator performed the services, charged for them only what the statute allows, and presented his accounts duly authenticated. The case was one of assault and battery, in which the State failed. The costs, therefore, were chargeable against her, unless the law provides to the contrary. The Comptroller insists that the statute, (Thomp., 522,) which directs that in cases of assault and battery, &c., a prosecutor shall be set at the foot of the indictment, who shall be liable for the costs, if the prosecution fails, does provide to the contrary. But this cannot be so. (The sheriff must execute the command of the Court. It is not his province to inquire whether it has been issued irregularly or improperly.) To require a prosecutor, who shall be liable for costs, is not to say the officers shall be denied their costs, if one is not set at the foot of the indictment. The statute merely enjoins a duty upon the Grand Jury, and the officers should not suffer, if they fail to perform it. He has no option, but must execute the command of the Court. Now, shall he be made the victim of the neglect of the Grand Jury?—Shall he suffer wrong and injustice in the loss of his fees, because others have not done their duty? The statute could not intend any such mischief. 206

This much is certain—the sheriff could not do otherwise than perform the services required of him, and in such case he requires a right against some party to his costs. To deny him that right, is to do him injustice. Now, to what party can he look for these costs? To none other than the State, for she was the party that failed before the Court. As there is no right without a remedy, and no remedy in this case but by mandamus, it seems clear that the Court below did not err in awarding it.

DOUGLAS. C. J.

This is a suit instituted in the Circuit Court of the Middle Circuit of this State, wherein Alfred A Fisher, Sheriff of Leon County, by petition complains, that at the October Term of that Court, in the year 1848, one Elijah B. Clark was indicted by the Grand Jury for an assault and battery; that the petitioner rendered whatever service was required of him in the prosecution of said Clark, for which service he was entitled to the fees given by the statute, which, according to his account annexed, amount to $58 52-100. That said Clark was acquitted, and said fees are properly chargeable to the State, there being no prosecutor endorsed on said indictment. That he, the petitioner, had presented the said bill of costs to Simon Towle, Comptroller of the State, to be audited and paid, but the said Towle refused to allow the same. Wherefore, he prayed the Court to grant a writ of mandamus to be directed to said Simon Towle, Comptroller, &c., commanding him to allow and pay the said bill of costs, or else to show good and sufficient cause why the same should not be allowed and paid.

It does not appear by the record whether the alternative mandamus so prayed for, was granted or not. But on the 9th November, 1849, the said Simon Towle, Comptroller, filed his answer, admitting the facts charged in the petition, so far as related to the rendition of the services and the correctness of the account exhibited therefor, but denying that the State was bound to or ought to pay it, and shows for cause that the law requires "in all cases of assault and battery, trespass and libel, that a prosecutor shall be set at the foot of the indictment, who shall be liable for costs on failure in the prosecution." That the account of the relator was "for costs" in a case of assault and battery, coming precisely within the provisions of that law, that a prosecutor should, therefore, have been set at the foot of the indictment, and he would be the party liable to pay the account of the relator and not the State." The Circuit Court held the answer of the respondent insufficient, and awarded a peremptory mandamus against him the said Simon Towle, Comptroller, &c., commanding him forthwith to audit, allow and pay the said bill of costs of said petitioner, amounting to the sum of $58 52-100. From which judgment the said defendant appealed to this Court, and has assigned for error— 207

First. The Court erred in awarding a writ of mandamus in this case.

Second. The Court erred in deciding that it was a proper case for mandamus.

We deem it proper to state "in limine" in this case, that the Comptroller was right as to the requirement of the statute—that a prosecutor should be set at the foot of the indictment in such a case, nor is the provision, according to our view of the matter, merely directory; it is a positive requisition, and an indictment returned without a prosecutor endorsed upon it, is invalid, and might be quashed on motion; but if the defect escapes the notice of the defendant and his counsel—or if they do not choose to avail themselves of the error, and process issues upon it, the officer of the Court is not bound to inquire into the regularity of the proceedings; his duty is to obey the mandate of the writ. Tarlton vs. Fisher, 1 Douglas, 671. Camp. vs. Moseley, et al., 2 Flor. Rep., 195. Gott vs. Mitchell, 7 Blackford Reps., 270. Parsons vs. Loyd, 3 Wilson's Reps., 345, 376. In this last case, Lord Ch. J. De. Gray remarks in substance, that the plaintiff was illegally imprisoned under a judgment sued out against him, which is a mere nullity—he has been unlawfully injured, and must have a remedy—but he has none against the officer who is not to exercise his judgment touching the validity of the process in point of law, but is obliged to obey the commands of the Courts, &c. The case in 7 Black., 270, goes further, and shows, that if the Sheriff has notice of the irregularity of the process, still if the writ was legal upon its face and showed jurisdiction in the justice, the officer was bound to obey it. Here the process was regular, no question arose about it, the Sheriff was bound to obey it. To withhold the payment of his fees, for the cause assigned, would be to punish him for the wrong of some one else, if indeed any fault was committed, but non constat—that any was committed; the whole may have been the result of inadvertance. The fees of the Sheriff, at all events, so far as appear by this record, should have been allowed and paid, and the Comptroller, we have no hesitation in saying, came to a wrong conclusion, when he decided that the State ought not to pay these costs, and therefore reject the account. 208

But the more important question is, whether it is competent for this Court to correct the error—in other words, is it a proper case for a mandamus. "The principle is admitted (said Tucker, Justice, in the Attorney General vs. Turpin, 3 Hen. and Mun., 557,) by every writer on the law of Nations, that the Commonwealth can neither be made liable to its own citizens in its own Courts, beyond the tenor of its own engagements, nor be sued in its own Courts in any other manner than that expressly permitted by law. "But although a State cannot be called upon to defend itself in a foreign Court, or in its own Courts, without its consent, the honor and justice of every State require that an independent tribunal should be appointed within itself, to decide upon all claims against the public, and not leave them to the decision of a popular assembly, improper from the nature of its existence, as well as from their numbers, to decide upon contracts made, that is to say, to decide what the contracts are, and whether they will perform them or not. Pendleton, President in Comm. vs. Beaumarchais, 3 Call, 369. The Legislature of Virginia has provided such a tribunal, by allowing an appeal from the auditor of publice accounts to the judiciary. Ibid. That is, by a petition of the party who may feel himself aggrieved by a decision of the author, to the High Court of Chancery of the Superior Court of law holden in the city of Richmond, according to the nature of the case, for redress 2 R. C., 1819, page 2, sec.6. 1 Robinson's Prac., 33.

Towle vs. The State.—Opinion of Court.

209 The mandamus being in its nature what is termed a prerogative writ, issuing only from the tribunal which represented judicially the King himself, was extended originally to matters rather of a general public nature, than to such as affected the rights of a particular subject, as to cases of some breach of the peace, disobedience of law, or neglect of official duty, and, therefore, we are to construe, rather as an extension than as a restraint of its original uses, what is given by Comyn, Titl Mnadamus A. where he says, "The Court of King's Bench has power, by writ of mandamus, to correct all extra judicial errors which tend to a breach of the peace, oppression of the subject, or other mis-government." But long subsequently to Comyn, we find the Court of King's Bench, 3 Burr, 1267, remarking, that "within the last century, it has been liberally interposed, for the benefit of the subject, and the advancement of justice." This case, which was decided in 1762, was a mandamus to trustees, to admit a dissenting minister; (2 Term Rep., 259,) and Lord Mansfield observed, that "a mandamus is a prerogative writ, to the aid of which the subject is entitled, upon a proper case previously shown to the satisfaction of the Court. It was introduced to prevent disorder from a failure of justice, and defeat of police; therefore, it ought to be used upon all occasions, where the law has established no specific remedy, and where in justice and good government there ought to be one." This remark, however, is to be qualified by the contemporaneous observation of the same learned judge, which he frequently repeated, that "it was a very beneficial writ, but that the best mode of preserving it, was to be sparing in the use of it." And the fact that there is no other remedy does not seem to be sufficient in every case to justify the use of it; for in Rex vs. The Justices of Wilts, 2 Chittys' Reps., 257, where a mandamus was refused, Baley, Justice, in reply to the counsel, that there was no other remedy, said: "There are many cases where there is no other remedy against the Sessions, where we should not interfere;" and in Wilson vs. The Supervisors of Albany, 13 John. Rep., 414, the Court in refusing a mandamus, said: "It may be a hard case, and the party may be remediless, but that consideration cannot induce us to grant an unfit remedy." The principles which govern the Courts in issuing wris of mandamus (said Ch. Justice Tilgham, in Griffith vs. Cochran, 5 Binney's Reps., 103,) are well understood, and the counsel who argued this case
210 have not differed in that respect. Where a ministerial act is to be done, and there is no other specific remedy, a mandamus will be granted to do the act which is required; but where the complaint is against a person who acts in a judicial or deliberative capacity, he may be ordered by mandamus to proceed to do his duty, by deciding according to the best of his judgment; but the Court will not direct him in what manner to decide. This was the principle adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the United States vs. Lawrence, 3 Dallas' Reps., 42, where it was sought to compel a District Judge to issue a warrant to arrest an alleged deserter from the French naval service, under a treaty stipulation, and in which it was clear an unanimous decision of the Court that the District Judge, having acted judiciously in deciding that the evidence was not sufficient to authorize his issuing a warrant, the Supreme Court, however it might differ in opinion from the Judge as to the sufficiency of the proof, had no power to compel him to decide according to the dictates of any judgment but his own. In the case of the Life Insurance Company of New York vs. Adams, 9 Peters' Reps., 602, the same principle is recognized, and Chief Justice Marshal said: "On a mandamus, a Superior Court will never direct in what manner the discretion of an Inferior Court shall be exercised, but will in a proper case require the Inferior Court to decide. In the case of The Commonwealth vs. The Judges of the Common Pleas of Phila. Co., 3 Bin. Reps., 237 to 286, the Court held, that "a mandamus cannot go to an Inferior Court to compel them to make any particular decision, but merely to decide."—"Where a Judge acts in his judicial capacity, as in deciding on the propriety of issuing a warrant, the Supreme Court will not grant a mandamus to compel him to decide according to any judgment but his own." 6 Bac. Abr. Ed. of 1848, page 437, title Mandamus.

In this case, The United States vs. Lawrence, 3 Dallas, 42—Ex parte Roberts, 6 Peters, 216—Ex parte Davenport, 6 Peters, 661. Life & Fire Insurance Company of New York vs. Wilson, 8 Peters, 291—Ex parte Martha Bradstreet, 8 Peters, 588—Life & Fire Insurance Company New York vs. Adams, 9 Peters, 573—Postmaster General vs. Trigg, 11 Peters, 173—Ex parte Jesse Hoyt, 13 Peters, 279, were cited.

A Court may be compelled by mandamus to proceed to judgment, but it must exercise its discretion as to what that judgment shall be. 211
The Board of Police of Attala Co., vs. 9th Smedes & Mar. 90
Where the Court or officer has a discretion, the Supreme Court will not grant a mandamus to control that discretion. 6 Bac. Abr. Ed., 1848, page 420, title Mandamus, and authorities there cited.—In Ex parte Hoyt, 13 Reters, S. C. R., 290, Mr. Justice Story, delivering the opinion, said: "It has been repeatedly declared by this Court, that it will not, by mandamus, direct a Judge what judgment to enter in a suit, but only will require him to proceed to render judgment."

There seems to have been at one period much uncertainty and confusion in regard to the application of a writ of mandamus, but it arose from the character of the persons to whom the writ was to be directed, and the objects sought to be accomplished by it, rather than from the nature of the acts complained of. The broad distinction between a direction to an inferior tribunal to act, and a direction to it how to act, seems to have been at all times well observed, at least until very lately. Judges of Onedia C. P. vs. The People, 18 Wendell, 96.

We have noticed that in the case of The People vs. Superior Court of New York, 5 Wendell, 114, Mr. Justice Sutherland, who delivered the opinion of the Court, advanced the following propositions:

First. That a writ of mandamus lies where a party has a legal right, and no other appropriate remedy.

Second. That it does not lie to an inferior tribunal, where such tribunal has the right of exercising its discretion.

Third. That the discretion which the Supreme Court cannot control is one governed by no fixed legal principles.

Fourth. That in all cases where an inferior Court is bound to proceed according to established legal principles, and it is alleged that an error has been committed, the Court has power to issue a mandamus—and if error has intervened, the same obligation exists to issue the writ, as to reverse or affirm a judgment upon a writ of error.

This case, which was a mandamus to the Superior Court of New York, requiring it to vacate an order made by it for a new trial, on account of newly discovered evidence, is disapproved and overruled in the case of the Judges of the Oneida C. P. vs. The People, 212 above cited, and all except the second proposition—on which the Court in the last case bases its decision—triumphantly refuted. The former is said to be the first case in which a manifest tendency is disclosed to extend jurisdiction by mandamus, over the judicial acts of an Inferior Court, which was acknowledged as acting within the scope of its own powers; and the Court of Errors, in reviewing it, remark upon the fourth proposition, that where the action of a Court is prescribed "by established legal principles," it is not a case of legal discretion, but of legal necessity, and can only occur where questions of law, and not questions of fact, are involved.

The case of Decatur vs. Paulding, 14 Peters S. C. Reps., 521. was an application for a mandamus to the Secretary of the Navy, to compel him to pay to Mrs. Susan Decatur a pension which she claimed under a resolution of Congress. Mr. Justice Cranton, after stating reasons somewhat at length why the writ ought not to have been issued, said, "The origin of the opinion that public money could be reached through such instrumentality, is of recent date. Its history will be found in the case of Stockton & Stokes vs. the Postmaster General; money was not there asked in a direct form, and the Court put the case on the express ground that the defendant "was not called upon to furnish the means of paying any balance that was awarded against the Department by the Solicitor of the Treasury. He was simply (say the Court) required to give the credit," and this was no more an official act, than the making of an entry by the clerk, by order of a Court of Justice; it was in every just sense a ministerial act." Ibid, 516, and 12 Peters, 614. "Had it not been placed on this narrow ground the decision could not have been made."

In the case of Brasher vs. Mason, which was another attempt to compel the Secretary of the Navy, by means of a writ of mandamus, to pay a claim against the Government—the Supreme Court of the United States say, "In the case of Mrs. Decatur vs. Paulding, 14 Peters, 497, it was held by this Court, that a mandamus would not lie from a Circuit Court of this District to the Secretary of the Navy to compel him to pay a sum of money claimed to be due to her as a pension under a resolution of Congress. There was no question (say the Court) as to the amount due, if the plaintiff was properly entitled to the pension, and it was made to appear affirmatively on 213 the application, that the pension fund was ample to satisfy the claim. The fund was also under control of the Secretary, and the money payable on his own warrant. Still the Court refused to inquire into the merits of the claim of Mrs. D. to the pension, or to determine whether it was rightfully withheld or not by the Secretary, on the ground that the Court below had no jurisdiction over the case, and therefore the question is not properly before this Court on the writ of error. The Court say "that the duties required of the Secretary under the resolution were to be performed by him as the head of one of the executive departments of the government, in the ordinary discharge of one of his official duties; that, in general, such duties, whether imposed by the act of Congress or by resolution, are not mere ministerial duties; the head of an executive department of the government, in the administration of the important concerns of his office, is continually required to exercise judgment and discretion, and the Court could not by mandamus, act directly upon the officer and guide and control his judgment or discretion in the matters committed to his care in the ordinary discharge of his official duties." "The Court distinguish the case from Kendall vs. the United States, 12 Peters, 524, where there was a mandamus to enforce the performance of a mere ministerial act, not involving on the part of the officer, the exercise of any judgment or discretion." And the principle of the case of Mrs. Decatur was held to be decisive of that of Brasher vs. Mason. See 6 Howard's S. C. Reps., 101, 102; and so we deem it decisive of this case.

The comptroller of this State, in the administration of the important concerns of his office, is continually required to exercise judgment and discretion, and this Court cannot, by mandamus, act directly upon him and guide and control his judgment and discretion in the matters committed to his care in the ordinary discharge of his official duties. The question in the case of Mrs, Decatur, as here, was one purely of law, was she entitled to the pension claimed? there was no question as to the amount due, if she was properly entitled to the pension, and by reference to the case it will be seen that this question rested entirely upon the construction of an act and a resolution of Congress. To show that the Comptroller has discretion and judgment to exercise, it is only necessary to refer to the act creating the office, act of July 23, 1845, pamphlet laws, pages 16, 17. Thomp-
214 son's Digest, pages 31, 32, Nos. 5 and 6, by which it is made "the duty of the Comptroller to examine, audit, adjust and settle the accounts of all the officers of this State, and any other person or persons or corporation, in any wise entrusted with, or who may have received any property, funds or moneys of this State, or who may be in any wise indebted or accountable to this State for any property, funds, or moneys, and require such officer, person or persons, or corporations to render full accounts thereof, and to yield up such property or funds according to law, or pay such moneys into the treasury of this State, or to such officer or agent of the State as may be appointed to receive the same, and on failure to do so, to cause to be instituted and prosecuted, proceedings, criminal or civil, at law or in equity, against such person or persons or corporation, according to law."

"The Comptroller of this State may demand and require full answers on oath from any and every person, party or privy to any account, claim or demand against or by the State, such as it may be his official duty to inquire into, and such answers he may require to be in writing and to be sworn to before himself or before any judicial officer, or justice of the peace, or clerk of any Court of this State, so as to enable said Comptroller to decide as to the justice or legality of such account, claim or demand." To decide, of course requires reflection—the exercise of judgment and discretion; it is not a mere ministerial duty. Discretion implies "knowledge and prudence, that discernment which enables a person to judge critically of what is correct and proper, united with caution; nice discernment, and judgment directed by circumspection."

Coinciding in opinion with that high tribunal whose authority we have just now invoked, that it is not the province of the Court below or of this Court to control the exercise of that judgment and discretion, and that the remedy here sought is inappropriate, we are clearly of opinion that the judgment of the Court below should be reversed. The remedy of the party, if the views which this Court have expressed, and the reasons given for them, do not satisfy the Comptroller that he ought to pay this claim, is a memorial to the General Assembly, which has power to afford him relief. But we entertain the hope that what in right and justice appertains in this behalf, will be done without the necessity of the relator's restoring to that proceeding. And we take occasion further to remark that as the ques- 215

tions presented in this case had not before been so made as to be authoritatively decided in this State, it was proper that the Judge to whom application was made for the writ in this case should have granted it: that they might be brought here to be discussed and settled.

The judgment of the Court below is reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to that Court to dismiss the writ.

Per curiam.

JOHN B. DOGGETT, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, VS. MARCELLUS JORDAN, DEFENDANT IN ERROR.

The 12th section of the act "to regulate judicial proceedings," gives to a plaintiff the option of proceeding to judgment against one or more defendants served with process, and dismissing as to others not served, or of continuing the cause for the purpose of perfecting service upon such as have not been summoned. A plaintiff cannot, however, take judgment as to one or more who have been served, and an alias writ for others not served.

The return by the officer, "Not in the County," does not warrant an abatement or discontinuance as to one or more of several joint defendants. The return required by the statute to authorize this proceeding must be in the words of the law—"Does not reside in the County."

Error to Leon County Circuit Court.

Judgment was rendered in the Court below in this case in favor of the defendant in error, at the Spring Term, 1849.

The question upon which it was brought up by writ of error to this Court, is one altogether of pleading and practice, and disconnected from the merits of the case. The nature of the question presented appears in the opinion of the Court.

Branch, for plaintiff in error.

Lang & Walker, for defendant in error.

LANCASTER, J.

This suit was brought by Jordan, the defendant in this Court, against the present plaintiff, John B. Doggett, and one Henry Doggett, jointly, as defendants below. A summons was regularly issued 216 against both defendants, and was afterwards returned by the Sheriff "Executed by serving a copy hereof on John B. Doggett. Henry Doggett does not reside in the county. April 16th, 1846."

Afterwards, the plaintiff, Jordan filed his declaration against both defendants, of a plea of trespass on the case on promises, &c. And afterwards, on the 25th day of May, 1846, on motion of the plaintiff, by his attorney, it was ordered that an alias summons issue for Henry Doggett, one of said defendants, returnable to the then next term of the Court. And afterwards the Sheriff, at November Term, 1846, made return on the writ issued in pursuance of the above order of the 25th of May, in the following words, to wit: "Not in the county." And it appears further on the record in this cause, that at April Term, 1849, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, Jordan, against the defendant, John B. Doggett, for the damages assessed by the jury, and for his costs, &c.

The error assigned is, a departure in the judgment, from the writ and declaration, which renders said judgment reversable. That the writ and declaration being against John B. Doggett and Henry Doggett, and the judgment against John B. Doggett alone, there should have been some order or judgment of Court, showing what disposition had been made of said suit as to Henry Doggett.

In this case the declaration discloses a joint cause of action, and was filed, as appears by the record, after the original writ or summons was returned, and after it was shown by that return that Henry Doggett did not reside in the county.

The 12th section of the act to regulate judicial proceedings, of November 12th, 1828, Thom. Dig., 327, provides, "When an original writ or summons has been sued out against two or more defendants, and returned by the Sheriff or other officer, served upon one or more defendants, and that the other defendants do not reside in said district or county, as the case may be, it shall be lawful for the plaintiff at his option, to proceed to judgment against those upon whom process has been served, or to obtain from the Court time to perfect service, and to order additional originals and copies to be directed to the sheriffs of the counties in which the other defendants reside, to be served and returned as is directed in this act." After filing his declaration on the 25th of May, 1846, the plaintiff, by his attorney, 217 moved and obtained an order for an alias summons to issue against Henry Doggett, one of the defendants. This, under the legal option, extended to him by the section above recited, he had an undoubted right to move for and obtain. But it is conceived that a sound consideration of said section also includes the idea that by selecting to have an alias, he waived the right to proceed to judgment against the one on whom service had been perfected, for the option given implies—take which course you will, but you cannot pursue both. The return, as to Henry Doggett, was such an one that the plaintiff might have moved under the above recited section to dismiss as to him, and have proceeded to judgment against the other, but in that case he could not have had his alias writ against the other. He pursued the alternative of an alias, upon which the sheriff returned "Not in the county," which is plainly and materially different from "does not reside in the county," which last the law requires, to entitle the plaintiff to dismiss as to one, and take judgment against the other.

We have, moreover, been unable to discover any where in the record any order dismissing the suit as to Henry Doggett. It is laid down in 7 Cranch, 194, in the case of Barton vs. Petit & Bayard, that "the general rule certainly is, that if two or more persons are sued in a joint action, the plaintiff cannot proceed to obtain judgment against one alone, but must wait until the others have been served with process, or until the other defendants have been proceeded against, as far as the law authorizes, for the purpose of forcing an appearance. In England, the plaintiff must proceed to outlaw the defendants who have not been served, before he can proceed against those who appear." In the case in Cranch above referred to, it is stated in the opinion delivered, that a certiorari was awarded to the Circuit Court of Virginia, on a suggestion of diminution; it appeared, by the clerk of that court, that an alias capias issued against Thomas Fisher, which was not returned; but the plaintiff's attorney caused the suit to be abated as to the said Fisher, upon information he had received that said Fisher was no inhabitant of the District of Virginia—the Court say: "Had the marshal returned the writ, and stated this fact, the law would have abated it as to Fisher—in which case, the objection to the subsequent proceedings, as to Barton, would have been removed. But since the plaintiff could not have supported his action originally against one defendant 218 on a joint cause of action, where it appeared by his own showing, or by plea in abatement, after stating a joint cause of action, he ought not to be permitted to abate or discontinue his action against one, unless authorized to do so by the return of the process against that defendant. If he does so, it furnishes good ground for reversing the judgment.

The case of Barton vs. Petit & Bayard, from which we have extracted so copiously, is in almost every particular similar to this; it varies, however, in this: The plaintiff, from evidence satisfactory to him, by his attorney caused the suit to be abated, for the imputed non-residence of a co-defendant in the District of Virginia; but the Court said that the fact must appear by the return of the marshal, when the law would have abated it as to him. The return, "not in the county," does not warrant, by the law of Florida, an abatement or discontinuance as to one of two or more joint defendants. But the plaintiff never caused a discontinuance to be entered of record as to Henry Doggett; it does not appear as to him to be discontinued. If the fact be, that, at the time of the return of the alias summons, Henry Doggett was not a resident of the county, and the plaintiff desired to have a discontinuance as to him, he ought to have satisfied the sheriff of the fact, and procured an amendment of the return—have discontinued as to him, and then he might have proceeded against the other defendants. This has not been done, and he has taken judgment against J. B. Doggett alone—which is held in the case in 7 Cranch, referred to, to be error. Authorities to the same import might be multiplied, but they are not deemed necessary.

The judgment of the Court below must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Note—Since the above decision was delivered, I have been shown a decision made by this Court at last term, to which the Court was not referred in the arguments of this case; but that decision was made on what then appeared to the Court to be a different state of the record. If there was any misunderstanding of the Court in that case as to the record, I cannot say—but by the statement of it, there made, the decision was right. This case shows a different state of record, and I cannot see that the decision ought to be changed.

James M. Gilchrist, Judge, &c., for the use of John M. W. 219 Davidson, Appellant, vs. Banks Meacham, Administrator of William D. Harrison, Deceased, Appellee.

A scire facias on a judgment on a guardian's bond, suggesting other and further breaches of the condition of the bond, and praying execution for the damages thereby sustained, is a continuance of the old suit.

In scire facias, therefore, against the administrator of a surety to a guardian bond, on a judgment rendered against such administrator for the penalty, he is estopped to set up any defence which existed anterior to the judgment.

Where the judgment recited in the scire facias was rendered in the spring of 1844, and the administrator pleaded a discharge from his administration, bearing date the 16th February of the same year—Held, that the plea was bad, because the matter of defence existed anterior to the rendition of the judgment.

Appeal from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the County of Gadsden, at Fall Term, 1849.

The nature of the proceeding in the Court below, of the defence set up, and all matters necessary to be stated, are set out at length in the opinion pronounced by this Court.

Thompson, for appellant.

This is a proceeding by scire facias on a judgment rendered May 8, 1844, by the Superior Court of Gadsden County, in favor of David L. White, Judge, &c., against the defendant, on a guardian's bond, for the penalty of $8,000—suggesting other and further breaches of the condition of said bond, and praying execution for the damage sustained by such breaches.

The defendant inter alia pleaded—

4thly. That he was discharged from his said administration on the 16th day of February, 1844.

5thly. That he was discharged from his said administration on the 16th day of February, 1844, and this suit is not brought within five years after the date of said discharge.

To which pleas, the plaintiff demurred, and the Court below overruled the demurrer, and gave judgment for the defendant, and this decision and judgment is now assigned for error in this Court.

The discharge set up in these pleas being alleged to have occurred 220 on the 16th day of February, 1844, anterior to the judgment set forth in the scire facias, we maintain, is not available to the defendant as a defence.

It is a maxim in law, that there can be no averment in pleading against the validity of a record—therefore no matter of defense can be pleaded, which existed anterior to the recovery of the judgment. 1 Chitty's Pleading, 521, 522. Tidd's Practice, 1130, 1131, and authorities cited in the margin. Moore vs. Bowmaker, 2 Marsh R. 392. McFarland vs. Irwin, 8 John. R., 61. Henriques vs. Dutch West India Company, 2 Lord Raymond, 1532. Allen vs. Andrews, Cro. Eliz., 283. Cook vs. Jones, Cowp., 727. 2 Saund. R., 72 —n.

The judgment of May 8, 1844, is conclusive upon the defendant—that he was then the administrator of the estate of William D. Harrison, and estops him to deny the fact. The plea sets up a discharge prior to the judgment, to wit: on the 16th February, 1844, which is inadmissible, because its effect is to impeach the verity of the judgment.

The demurrer should have been sustained by the Court below.

DuPont, for appellee:

This is a writ of scire facias to show cause why execution should not issue upon alleged breaches of a guardian bond, given by W. H. Wilder. A judgment had been recovered for the penalty of the bond against the defendant, as administrator of W. D. Harrison, deceased, who was one of the sureties on the said bond, and at the relation of two other parties interested in the said bond; and this proceeding is instituted under the provisions of the statute of 8 and 9 William 3d.

The pleas are as follows, viz:

1st. "Nul tiel Record."

2d. "Non detinet."

3d. "Plene administravit."

4th. "Discharge from office of administration."

5th. "Statutory bar by limitation."

6th. Partial payment, (special.)

Plaintiff took issue on the first, and demurred to the balance of the defendant's pleas. In the progress of the cause, the defendant with-

221 drew his third plea, and the plaintiff thereupon withdrew his demurrer thereto. The plaintiff also withdrew his demurrer to the sixth plea, upon the defendant having amended the same; so that the only question upon this appeal is in regard to the judgment of the Court upon the second, fourth and fifth pleas.

The grounds of demurrer to the second plea are as follows, viz:

1st. That the plea is inapplicable, the recovery set forth in the scire facias being the foundation of the suit.

2d. That the said plea is contrary to what is admitted by the judgment.

For the defendant, it is contended that the "covenants or conditions" of the bond, and not the former judgment for the penalty, constitutes the foundation of the suit; and in this connection it may be advisable to inquire into the history of "debt on bond," prior to the passage of the statute of 8 and 9 William 3d.

Prior to the passage of that statute, the plaintiff not only had judgment for the penalty of the bond; but was entitled to take out execution for the whole, without any regard to the damages which he had actually sustained by the breach of the covenants, and the only remedy of the defendant against so unconscientious a demand was by application to a Court of equity. It was to obviate the necessity for this application, that the statute was enacted, restricting the amount of the execution to the actual damages sustained.

The statute further provides that the judgment for the penalty shall remain as a further security, to answer to the plaintiff such damages as he may sustain for any further breach of the covenants contained in the bond. This provision in the statute was wisely inserted, as being absolutely necessary to avoid the plea of "former recovery" to any subsequent suit upon the same bond, for further breaches of the conditions thereof. Vide 1 Saund. R., 57, note 1. 2 Saund. R., 187, e.

The force of the objection urged to the plea, seems to lie in the assumption that the "scire facias" is but a continuation of the old suit, whereas we contend, as follows, viz:

I. That this present proceeding is of the nature of an original action. 8 Bac. Ab., 598. 2 Will. Black. R., 1226. Putteny vs. Townsend. 2 Williams R., 251. Grey vs. Jones. 6 John R., 106 Gorrigal vs. Smith, et al.

222 II. The scire facias is an action to which the defendant is entitled to plead. 8 Bac. Ab., 598, note b. 2 Will. R., 251. 2 W. Black. R., 1226.

III. The words of the statute of 8 and 9 Will. 3d, provides that the same proceedings shall be had upon the scire facias as in the original action. 1 Saunders R., 58.

If the foregoing positions are correct, then we are entitled to plead ——and if to plead, then the question arises, is the plea of "non detinet" applicable? In answer to this inquiry, we assume as follows, viz:

1st. That the record of judgment recited in the writ, is only "matter of inducement" and does not constitute the foundation of the action, and consequently that the plea is applicable. 1 Chitty's Pleadings, 485.

As to whether the original judgment is the foundation of the proceeding by scire facias, or only "inducement," this seems to be the true distinction, viz: That if the writ be sued out to revive a judgment, or to obtain execution for the original judgment, then the original judgment constitutes the foundation; but to assess damages under further breaches, then it is only matter of inducement, and does not estop the defendant from making any defence which would have been admissible to the original action. Vide 8 Bac. Ab., 598, showing a distinction in the writs.

The grounds of demurrer to the 4th plea are as follows, viz:

1st. That the judgment against the said defendant, as administrator of W. D. Harrison, deceased, set forth in said scire facias, was recovered subsequently to the date of the said discharge in the said plea pleaded, and said defendant is estopped by said recovery to set up any matter of defence which existed anterior thereto.

2d. That the said discharge pleaded, doth not in law, release the defendant from a recovery against him as such administrator, to be levied of assets in hand.

3d. That the said plea is informal, &c.

IV. To the first ground of demurrer we reply.

1st. That a plea of "discharge," to be good, must set forth that it was obtained prior to the commencement of the action, and as the discharge pleaded did not in point of fact, exist at the time of the commencement of the original action, it could not have been pleaded to that action; and its having been obtained prior to the date of the original judgment, neither invalidates it, nor does it operate to impair 223 its weight as a defense to the present proceedings—it is analagous to the plea of plene administravit.

2d. That this objection is based upon the erroneous assumption that the present proceeding is but a continuation of the original action; whereas we have fully demonstrated that it is a substantive and original action of itself.

V. To the 2d ground of demurrer, we reply,

1st. That the record evidence of the amount of the recovery to be levied of assets in the hands of the administrator is limited to the amount of the damages assessed in the original action on the bond, and that the judgment for the penalty was no bar to the obtaining of his discharge under the provisions of the statute.

2d. The position assumed in this ground of demurrer, leads to this absurdity; that an executor or administrator under a judgment against him for the penalty of a bond, may protect himsel, pro tanto, from any distribution of the estate, even though the penalty, (qua penalty,) cannot be enforced against him.

3. If the position which we have assumed, viz: "that this proceeding is in the nature of an original proceeding," be correct, then this plea is good under the decision of our Supreme Court. 1 Florida Reps., 332, Gadsden vs. Jones.

The grounds of demurrer to the 5th plea, are as follows, viz:

1st. Same as first objection to last plea, and same reply.

2d. For that the said plea is double in setting up the matter of discharge and a limitation of five years.

3d. For that there is no limitation of five years provided by law in which suit shall be brought on judgments against executors rendered against them in their fiduciary character.

VI. To the second ground of demurrer we reply:

That the discharge and "limitation," though distinct facts, make up but one defence. Chitty's Plead., 531-2.

VII. To the third ground of demurrer we reply:

That a recovery in this case goes against the defendant personally, inasmuch as the execution will issue "against the goods and chattels in the hands of the defendant."

VIII. The whole force of the plaintiff's objections to the defendant's plea, is based upon the doctrine of "Estoppel." To this we reply, that matter of "Estoppel," to be binding, must be mutual, and 224 as nothing in the record of the original suit on the bond can be alleged against these "relators" by way of estoppel, neither will any thing therein be binding upon the defendant in this proceeding. Com. Dig., "Estoppel," B. and C. Co. Litt., 325—e. Gilb. Ev., 28. 2 John. R., 382.

DOUGLAS, C. J.

This proceeding was instituted by scire facias in the Circuit Court of Gadsden County by James M. Gilchrist, Judge of Probate, &c., for the use of John W. M. Davidson, administrator, &c. of Edward H. Wilder, deceased, against Banks Meacham, administrator of William D. Harrison, deceased, against which said Banks Meacham as aforesaid, thereto*fore*, to wit: At the Spring term of the Superior Court of said County, in the year 1844, David L. White, Judge, &c., the predecessor in office of the plaintiff in this suit, had recovered a judgment for a debt of eight thousand dollars, upon a certain writing obligatory bearing date the 15th day of April, in the year 1836, whereby the said William D. Harrison, with one William H. Wilder and one Ira Sanborn, became jointly and severally held and jointly bound unto the said David L. White, Esq., Judge of the County Court for the County of Gadsden aforesaid, and his successors in office, in the said sum of $8,000, to be paid, &c. under a certain condition, reciting, that, whereas the said William H. Wilder had that day been duly appointed guardian of the persons and property of Jesse W. Wilder, Betsy L. Wilder, Edward H. Wilder and Godfrey S. Wilder, minors and orphan children of Hezekiah Wilder, late of Gadsden County, deceased, it was declared that if the said William H. Wilder should well and truly perform the duties of guardian to said minors, agreeably to the statutes of the said (then) Territory of Florida in such case made and provided, then the said bond to be null and void, otherwise to remain in full force and virtue—which said sum so recovered was to be levied of the goods and chattels, lands, tenements and estate of the said William D. Harrison, deceased, in the hands of the said Banks Meacham, administrator, &c., as aforesaid, to be administered; and if the goods, chattels, lands, tenements and estate of said deceased whereon to levy could not be found, that then the same be levied of the proper goods and chattels of the said Banks Meacham; and that execution do issue on said judgment, to make the sum of fifteen hundred and two dollars and eight cents, to be levied as aforesaid, and the costs, &c., for the benefit of Lewis Gregory, guardian of Godfrey and Jesse Wilder; and said judgment to stand as security, for the benefit of others, who may be damnified by any past or future breach of the condition thereof; which said writ of scire facias, amongst other things, recited that the said William H. Wilder, (on the 25th of March, 1840,) as guardian, as aforesaid, presented his accounts and vouchers to the said County Court of Gadsden County, whereby it appeared to the said Court that he had received of the assets of the minors, as guardian as aforesaid, the sum of $2,222 97-100, and had accounted for the disbursement of $78 81-100, thereby leaving a balance due from him as such guardian in his hands the sum of $2,144 16-100, which he failed to pay, and was consequently by the order and decree of the Court displaced as guardian as aforesaid; and the said scire facias stating the transfer of the first named judgment into the said Circuit Court, according to law, further recites that "whereas it hath been and is duly suggested by the said James M. Gilchrist, Judge of Probate as aforesaid, and successor of said David L. White, Judge as aforesaid, in our said Circuit Court of the Middle Circuit for the County of Gadsden, as and by way of another and further breach of the said condition of the said writing obligatory, than the breach so assigned as aforesaid, that there was and is due to Edward H. Wilder, one of the wards of said William H. Wilder, out of the funds so found upon his account to be due from him to his wards, a large sum of money, to wit: the sum of $1,000, and that the said Wm. H. Wilder did not pay to said Edward H. Wilder, or his lawfully appointed guardian, in the life time of the said Edward; and the said Edward having departed this life intestate, and all and singular the goods and estate of the said Edward H. Wilder were in due form of law committed to John M. W. Davidson, of the County of Gadsden aforesaid; and the said William H. Wilder hath not, since the death of the said Edward, paid to the said John M. W. Davidson, administrator as aforesaid, the share or portion to which he, the said Edward, was and is entitled as aforesaid, and which said sum is still in arrears and unpaid, contrary to the form and effect of the said writing obligatory—for which said last 226 mentioned breach of the aforesaid condition of the said writing obligatory, the said James M. Gilchrist, Judge of Probate as aforesaid, suing for the use of the said John M. W. Davidson, administrator as aforesaid, hath humbly besought us to provide him a proper remedy. And we being willing that what is just in this behalf should be done, do, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, command you, that by honest and lawful men of your county, you make known to said Banks Meacham, that he be before us at a Circuit Court, to be held in and for the County of Gadsden, on Monday, the 21st day of May inst., (1849,) to show cause why execution should not be had and awarded against him upon the judgment so obtained as aforesaid, for the damages to be assessed by reason of the last mentioned breach of the said condition of the said writing obligatory, &c. To which said writ of scire facias, the defendant pleaded—

First. Nul tiel record.

Second. Non detinet.

Third. That he had fully administered, which he withdrew.

Fourth. That, on the 16th day of February, 1844, in the county aforesaid, he was by competent authority, to wit, by the order of the Judge of the late County Court of Gadsden County, duly and lawfully discharged of and from his administration of the said estate of the said William D. Harrison, deceased, as appears by the record remaining in the office of the Judge of Probate for the said County of Gadsden. And this, &c.

Fifth. The same discharge; and that this suit hath not been commenced within five years from the date of the said discharge, but that more than five years had elapsed between the date of the said discharge and the date of the commencement of the same. And this, &c.

Sixth. That there was assessed in the former suit a large portion of the interest of the said Edward H. Wilder, deceased, &c.

To the first plea, the plaintiff filed a general replication.

And demurred to the second, assigning for cause—1st. That the plea is inapplicable, the recovery set forth in the scire facias being the foundation of the suit. 2d. That the plea is contrary to what is admitted by the judgment.

The third plea was withdrawn.

To the fourth plea, the plaintiff demurred, and assigned the 227
following cause: 1st. "For that the judgment against said defendant, as administrator, &c., of William D. Harrison, set forth in the said scire facias, was recovered subsequently to the date of the said discharge in the said plea pleaded, and the said defendant is estopped by the said recovery, to set up any matter of defence which existed anterior thereto. 2d. For that the said discharge pleaded, doth not by law release the defendant from a recovery against him as such administrator, to be levied of assets in hand. 3d. For that the said plea is in other respects, uncertain, informal, and insufficient. To the fifth plea the plaintiff also demurred. and assigned the following causes: 1st. That the judgment against the said defendant, as administrator, &c., of William D. Harrison, set forth in the scire facias, was recovered subsequently to the date of the said discharge by the said plea pleaded, and said defendant is estopped by the said recovery to set up any matter of defence which existed anterior thereto. 2d. For that the said plea is double, setting up the matter of discharge and limitation of five years. 3d. For that there is no limitation of five years provided by law in which suits shall be brought on judgment against executors rendered against them in their fiduciary character. 4th. For that the said plea is in other respects, uncertain, informal and insufficient. To the sixth plea the plaintiff joined issue. And after argument, the plaintiff's demurrer to the fourth and fifth pleas were overruled. Whereupon judgment was entered that the plaintiff take nothing by his scire facias, &c. And the plaintiff thereupon prayed an appeal to this Court, which was granted accordingly.

The question presented for our consideration in this case is, whether the Court erred in overruling the plaintiff's demurrer to the fourth and fifth pleas of the defendant. And as to this, it is contended on behalf of the defendant, that a plea of discharge to be good must set forth that it was obtained prior to the commencement of the action, and as the discharge pleaded did not in fact exist at the time of the commencement of the original action, it could not have been pleaded to that action, and its having been obtained prior to the date of the original judgment, neither invalidates it, nor does it operate to impair its weight, as a defence to the present proceeding. That the objection to it is based upon the erroneous assumption that the present proceeding is but a continuation of the original action, and it is 228 insisted that the scire facias is not the continuation of the old suit, but is in the nature of an original action—that the scire facias is an action to which the defendant is entitled to plead. And from these propositions the conclusion is deduced, that the plea is a good defence to the action. Without admitting the correctness of this conclusion from the premises laid down, we may be permitted to examine as to the correctness of the proposition that the scire facias is not the continuation of the old suit. Why is it not? It is a proceeding instituted under the provisions of the statute of 8 and 9 William 3d, and it is admitted that the plaintiff, before that statute, not only had judgment for the whole penalty of the bond (in such a case as this) but was entitled to take out execution for the whole, without any regard to the amount of damages which he had actually sustained by the breach of the covenant or condition. To remedy this evil, and prevent the necessity of a resort to a Court of Chancery in such cases, that statute was passed, providing that the plaintiff might take out execution for the amount of damages which he might prove that he had actually sustained, and that the judgment for the penalty shall remain as a further security to answer to the plaintiff such damages as he may sustain for any further breach of the covenants contained in the bond. It is the same plaintiff, therefore, who sues for such further breach: it is the same defendant that is called upon to answer: it is the same judgment that is sought to be enforced: it is for damages sustained by the same party for a further breach of the same bond. And what is the remedy sought? Not another judgment for the whole penalty, but an execution on the same judgment to recover so much of the penalty of the same bond as the plaintiff may be able to show that he has sustained damages by a further breach of the condition thereof. It is true, the statute says the same proceedings shall be had upon the scire facias as in the original action; but surely this does not mean that another judgment shall be entered, for the whole penalty, upon the occurrence of any subsequent breach. Yet the judgment is a part of the original proceeding. The meaning and intent of the statute evidently is, that the defendant shall have a day in Court, as in the original suit: be permitted to make all proper defences, and that the same mode should be adopted to ascertain the damages as in the original suit, and that execution

229 should issue therefor as upon the first assessment of damages. The assumption, therefore, that the present proceeding is but a continuation of the original action not being erroneous, the objection to the further plea should have been sustained, and the Court erred in overruling the demurrer thereto.

And the same remarks are applicable to the fifth plea—for notwithstanding the plea sets forth an addition to the averment of the discharge as pleaded in the fourth plea, the limitation of five years—as the limitation is dependent upon the discharge, and dates from it, if the plea is not good as to that, it is bad "in toto." The radical defect of both these pleas, is, that they were filed too late; for it is a well settled principle, that the defendant cannot regularly to a scire facias to have execution of a judgment (which is precisely the case at bar) plead that which might have been pleaded to the original action; as where A., administrator to J. S., by virtue of administration granted to him by the Archbishop of Canterbury, brought debt against B., and had judgment to recover, and after the year brought a scire facias on the judgment—the defendant pleaded that the intestate had nulla notabilia in divers dioceses, and that after the judgment, the Bishop of London committed administration to the wife. Upon demurrer, it was held, that this was a matter he could have pleaded before, and that it was annulling a record, which is not sufferable. 8 Bac. Abr., Ed. 1848, pages 624, 625, and numerous authorities there cited.

So, where in a scire facias on a judgment, the defendant pleaded the statute of usury: it was held no plea, because he should have pleaded it to the original action. Ibid, and authorities cited. So, if a scire facias be brought on a judgment in assize for the office of Marshal, the defendant cannot plead that the plaintiff was an alien enemy, for that was pleadable to the assize. And as he admitted the plaintiff able to have judgment, he cannot now disable him to have execution. 2 Lord Raymond, 853. In the case of Wilson vs. Hurst's executors, 1 Peter's C. C. R., 441, the Court held, "that a payment which might have been pleaded in bar to an original scire facias to revive a judgment, cannot be pleaded or given in evidence on a second scire facias." It is a maxim in law, that there can be no averment in pleading against the validity of a record, thought it may be against its operation; therefore no matter of defence can be pleaded 230 which existed anterior to the recovery of the judgment. 1 Chitty's Pleading, 522. See also, 5 Serg. and Rawle, 65, and McFarland vs. Irwin, 8 John. Reps., 61, 62, where this distinction is asserted, and the rule is held to be the same, whether the judgment was obtained by confession, or default, or upon plea. And see Henriques vs. The Dutch West India Co., 2 Lord Raymond, 1532. Allen vs. Andrews, Cro. Eliz., 283. 2 Saund. Rep., 72, Note T, and note V, and authorities there cited at page 229. 2 Tidd's Pr., 1131, and authorities there cited.

In the case of Sessions vs. Stephens, 1 Flor. Rep. 241, this Court said, "there can be no judicial inspection behind the judgment save by appellate power," citing Voorhees vs. Bank of the United States, 10 Peter's Reps., 499, and Grigons' Lessees vs. Astor, 2 How., 343. In a note in the case of Trethewy vs. Ackland, 2 Saund. Rep., 51, it is said that "It has been adjudged that the defendant, the executor may confess a judgment to a creditor of equal degree with the plaintiff pending the action, and plead it in bar, and though it be done for the express purpose of depriving the plaintiff of the debt, it is good both in law and equity," citing Waring vs. Danvers, 1st P. Wms., 295, which fully sustains this principle, and see 1 Saunders' Reps., page 333, d, note e and authorities there cited.

In Coleman vs. Hall, administrator, 12 Mass. R., 572, the Court said "It is perfectly well settled in the English Courts, that an executor or administrator cannot plead plene administravit to a scire facias on a judgment obtained against him." The learned counsel who argued the case for the defendant (in the Court below,) the appellee in this Court, held the plea of discharge to be analagous to the plea of plene administravit—if it be so, it would seem that it cannot be pleaded by an administrator or executor to judgment obtained against him since such discharge was granted. When it is said in the books that an executor or administrator may, to debt on judgment, plead plene administravit, it means according to our view of the matter, a judgment obtained against the testator or intestate in his life time, of which such executor or administrator had no notice before he had fully administered.

When an administrator is sued in England, if he does not dispute the justice of the demand, he has only to consider whether he has in his hands goods and estates of the deceased sufficient to pay the debt.

and whether there are any other creditors, whose debts have the 231 priority according to law. The amount of assets in his hands is necessarily within his own knowledge, and as to other creditors, he is not required nor authorized to retain funds for them, unless he have notice of the existence and nature of their debt. Idem. And our law is the same on this subject, except so far as our statutes may require the creditors of an insolvent estate to be paid pro rata.

The view which the learned counsel for the appellee took at the argument of this case, that the plea of discharge, to be good, must set forth that it was obtained prior to the commencement of the suit, is not, we think, in accordance with the principles assumed and maintained by the majority of this Court in the case of Gadsden vs. Jones, administrator, 1 Flor. Reps., 332 to 346, which we have again reviewed, and with the decision in which we perceive no cause to be dissatisfied. One of the positions most strongly relied on in that case, was, "that Jones, the administrator, having had notice of the plaintiff's (Gadsden's) demand, his duty, as administrator, was fixed by law, and from that responsibility it was not the design of the Legislature to release him; that it would have been no valid objection to the release contemplated by the statute for any creditor to object that he had not yet paid a debt of which he had notice:" The ready answer would have been, "I retain for it," (see page 334.) But the court held the plea of discharge good in that case notwithstanding the alleged notice, on the ground (see page 344,) that the discharge was a judgment of a Court of competent jurisdiction which we were not at liberty to disregard, and that such judgment was rendered "in a proceeding where the Court (after due notice) acts upon the application of the party to whom administration was granted, (and who seeks a discharge) and cannot grant such discharge until it shall appear that the said applicant has faithfully and honestly discharged the trust and confidence reposed in him or her." See page 339.

And after stating the evil, which, as the Court believed, led to the passage of the act, under the authority of which the discharge was granted, the Court said "The remedy intended by the Legislature was, we think, a speedy release from the duties of executor or executrix, administrator or administratrix, after a faithful and honest discharge of the trust, (page 341,) so far as regarded suits against executors and administrators as such." The Court in that case could 232 see no good reason why a person who had acted as executor or administrator, but who had obtained a discharge according to the provisions of the statute, after a full and faithful performance of all the duties of the trust which had been confided in him, after due notice, too, to all concerned, and without any concealment of fraud, should be harassed with suits; and it gave a liberal construction to the words of the act, "and the discharge so obtained shall be taken to operate as a release from the duties of executor or executrix, administrator or administratrix." "This language," said the Court, "is in presenti;" and in 8 Bacon's Abridgement, 624, title Scire Facias, it is said "that a release of all actions and executors is a good bar to a scire facias." And "if any matter of defense has arisen, after an issue in fact has been joined, or after a joinder in demurrer, it may be pleaded by the defendant, as that the plaintiff has given him a release." 1 Chitty Pl., 695. And if the defendant became bankrupt, and obtained his certificate after isue joined, he may plead this defence, puis darrein continuance. 1 Chitty's Pl., 696, 697; so award and satisfaction may be pleaded puis darrein continuance.—Watkinson vs. Inglesby & Stokes, 5 John. Reps., 392; and where two actions are brought for the same cause, satisfaction of the judgment in one suit may be pleaded puis darrein continuance to the other writ. Bowne vs. Joy, 9 John. Rep., 222.

In the case of Parkhill's administrator vs. The Union Bank of Florida, the revocation of letters of administration, and the delivery of the assets to the sheriff under an order of the Court, was pleaded puis darrein continuance, and held good—1 Florida Rep., 123 to 129—and the Court in that case said: "That eo instanti letters of administration were taken from her, (the administratrix,) she became as to the suit civiliter mortua." And in Gadsden vs. Jones, administrator, this Court held, "that it was the duty of the Judge of the County Court, before granting any discharge, (set up as a defense in that case,) to see that the defendant had well and truly administered, paid all the debts so far as the assets extended, and made a fair distribution of all the rest and residue of the estate according to law," (ibid, page 340;) "and that the discharge when thus obtained should be an immediate and effectual bar to suits instituted against the parties (charging them) in their fiduciary character." Ibid, 345. And 233 why should not such a discharge if obtained pending a suit, and after issue joined, be pleaded puis darrien continuance. The mere commencement of a suit establishes nothing; it is notice to the defendant of a demand, to be sure, and so far as this case is concerned, it is in that regard upon the same footing as that of Gadsden vs. Jones, administrator. It is to be presumed that due notice was given according to law, and that the plaintiff had a full opportunity to be present and contest the application for a discharge; if he did so, and was dissatisfied with the judgment, he had his right of appeal; if he did not choose to defend or appeal, he has no cause to complain; if the judgment is conclusive, and he did not care to avail himself of it as a defense at the proper stage of the proceeding, it was his own laches, and it cannot avail him now.

In Georgia, under a statute similar to our own, by which the condition of the discharge of an executor or administrator is, that he "has faithfully and honestly discharged the trust and confidence reposed in him, the Supreme Court of that State held the discharge a bar, both at law and in equity unless obtained by fraud—Carter vs. Anderson, 1 Georgia Reps., 517, 518—and that in a case where infant heirs were claiming three distinctive shares of the estate. And in Smith et al. vs. T. W. Oliver, &c., Dudley's Reps., 190, the Court, after stating the requirements of the statute to obtain a discharge, (which are the same as is required by our statute,) said, upon these requirements being fulfilled, the Legislature proceeds to enact "that the executor or administrator shall be forthwith dismissed and released from all his liability as executor or administrator." "There," says the Court, "is the finale, the legislative announcement, that the discharge is a release."

In Rhode Island, their Probate Court has the power to grant to executors and administrators a quietus, which is in effect a discharge; and Mr. Justice Story, commenting upon the exercise of that authority by that Court in the case of Taylor et al. vs. Delilias, et al., 4 Mason C. C. Reps., 133, said: "Much discussion has taken place as to the nature and effect of the quietus granted by the Court of Probate. I am not aware (he said) that it is any where denied that the Court of Probate has complete jurisdiction in the settlement of accounts of administrators, or that its decree, when rightfully made, is not binding authority. Indeed, it would be difficult to support such a denial upon 234 principles of general law, since it is a decree of a Court of competent and peculiar jurisdiction. If it has authority conclusively (and the statutes gives the authority) to settle his accounts, it certainly has authority to decree that the settlement is final, and to acquit him of further proceedings. This is the whole nature and effect of a quietus a process familiar in the Court of Exchequer, (3 Comyn's Dig., title Quietus,) and probably not unknown in the Ecclesiastical Courts."

The discharge being the judgment of "a Court of peculiar and competent jurisdiction," and being an immediate release—a release that might have been pleaded puis darrein continuance, is unless obtained by fraud, an effectual bar to any suit brought or pending against such executor or administrator in his fiduciary character, when properly pleaded, and is, therefore, such a defence as, if it exist before judgment against such executor or administrator, ought to be pleaded, if he intends to avail himself of it; and if he fails to plead it then, and thereby admits the plaintiff's right to have judgment, he cannot, after the judgment, plead it, to prevent him from having execution. The demurrer to the fifth plea should have been sustained.

The judgment of the Court below is, therefore, reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opiinion.

Per curiam.

James M. Gilchrist, Judge, &c., for the use of Joseph W. Burnley and Wife, Appellant, vs. Banks Meacham, Administrator, &c. of William D. Harrison, Deceased, Appellee.

This is a proceeding also instituted by scire facias in the Circuit Court of Gadsden County; was submitted upon argument in the next preceding case; is understood to be like it in all its essential features, and that it was to abide the fate of that case, which has just been decided.

The judgment of the Court below is, therefore, reversed, and the same remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with the opinion of this Court pronounced in that case.

Henry Gassett & Co. Appellants, vs. Wilson & Brown, Ap- 235
pellees.

B., a member of the mercantile firm of B. & B., which had failed, made an arrangement with the creditors of said firm, by which he procured a promise of indulgence, upon an agreement on the part of the firm to pay within a certain specified time fifty cents on the dollar of their debts. He then formed a new connection with one N., upon the capital of N., and such credits as they could jointly obtain. This new concern, after having been in business for a short time, was compelled to sell out at considerable loss. B. then formed a partnership with one W. One of the creditors of the old concern of B. & B., having obtained a judgment against them, proceeded to levy execution upon the interest of B. in the concern of W. & B. While the suit of the creditor was pending, for the purpose of preventing any of the creditors of the concern of B. & B. from obtaining any advantage over the others by a sale of his aforesaid interest, declaring, at the same time, that one of the causes impelling him to the act was the pending of said suit—and for the avowed purpose, also, of paying N. what he owed him, and other creditors of the firm of B. & N., B. withdrew his capital in the concern of W. & B., and applied it to the payment of the debts due to N. and others, contracted since the failure of B. & B. The right to withdraw his capital at any time he might desire to close the concern, was stipulated and agreed upon in the articles between W. & B. Held—that such withdrawal was not fraudulent, having been made for the purpose of paying just and bona fide debts.

Appeal from a decree made by Judge Baltzell, at a Circuit Court for the County of Leon, on the thirtieth of October, 1849. The material parts of the bill, answers, exhibits, report of the master and proofs of the cause, are set out in the opinion pronounced by the Court—from which the following statement of the case is detached and inserted here:

"This is a suit in Chancery brought up by appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of Leon County. The bill charges, that the complainants, on the 20th day of May, 1846, the Spring term of Leon Circuit Court, obtained a judgment against the firm of M. C. & J. W. Brown, of which the defendant, Joseph W. Brown, was a partner, and joint defendant, for the sum of two thousand six hundred and ninety-four dollars and fifty cents. That on the 26th June last, a writ of fieri facias was issued upon said judgment and placed in the hands of the Sheriff of Leon County, to be levied according to law, upon the 236 goods and chattels, &c., of M. C. & J. W. Brown. That defendants, Brown, had and have no property in their own name and possession, known to complainants, but are in failing circumstances, and not doing business in their own names. But it being notorious that defendant, Joseph W. Brown, had entered into partnership with defendant, Wilson, in a large and valuable store in the city of Tallahassee—that said Wilson & Brown had held themselves openly as joint partners, by public advertisement and notice, the Sheriff was induced to levy said writ of execution upon the undivided share and interest of said defendant, J. W. Brown, in the said store, and did on the 31st day of July, 1846, actually levy said writ upon the whole undivided share and interest of said defendant, J. W. Brown, in and to the store and commercial concern standing and being in the name of Wilson & Brown, in the city of Tallahassee, and after due advertisement and notice according to law, did on Monday the 5th day of October, instant, sell and dispose of the same by public auction to the highest bidder, and that they the said complainants, to save themselves from loss, did bid for said undivided claim and interest of debtor, J. W. Brown, and being the highest bidders became and were proclaimed the purchasers of the same for the sum of one hundred dollars. The bill also prays that an account may be taken of the interest so purchased, and that complainants may have a decree therefor, &c.

The answers of the defendants admit the partnership of Wilson & Brown, and the articles of partnership are annexed to the bill, as exhibit A, by which it appears that it was entered into on the 12th day of January, 1844. That Wilson put in as capital stock $1510 12-100 in merchandise, $1500 of which was included in a mortgage given to Messrs. Wilson & Herr, of the city of Baltimore, on the 13th November, 1843, for the purpose therein mentioned; and that Brown put in 1321 87-100 in merchandise, and it was stipulated "that the concern should be dissolved and each of the parties draw his proportion of the capital thereof, whenever either of the parties might wish to close the concern." Exhibit B is a memorandum of an agreement between the parties made on the 11th day of April, 1846, which recites that whereas Joseph W. Brown hath drawn on Wilson & Brown (the parties to this agreement) for sums of money

237 sufficient to cover his interest in said concern, to make payment of debts of said Brown disconnected with the business of Wilson & Brown, and the said Joseph W. Brown is no longer entitled, under the existing articles of copartnership between himself and Wilson, to share the profits of the concern of Wilson & Brown. And whereas the drafts of the said Brown have been accepted by Wilson & Brown, who are still liable for the same when they shall fall due respectively: and whereas the said David C. Wilson hath assented to the acceptance of the drafts aforesaid, and is willing that the said Joseph W. Brown shall continue a member of said firm of Wilson and Brown and receive a share of the profits of the concern, notwithstanding the drafts aforesaid for twelve months from the date hereof, and until the drafts shall be fully paid, and provided the said Joseph W. Brown continues to give his personal attention to the business of said firm. and continues to be jointly liable with said Wilson for any debts, contracts and engagements of the firm of Wilson & Brown, connected with their regular mercantile business. Now, therefore, it is mutually agreed, &c., (here follows an agreement in accordance with the foregoing recital.)

The answers of the defendants admit the recovery of the judgment, the execution, levy, sale of the property, and the purchase of it as stated in the bill, but allege that the sale was illegal, and that the complainants consequently acquire no title. And Wilson, in his answer, says that Brown was a partner of his on the 26th of June last, and up to the time of the sale—that the partnership continued under the articles contained in exhibit A, until the 11th of April last, when the said Joseph W. Brown, having withdrawn his capital under the provisions of the original articles, new articles were entered into extending the copartnership to a period of one year from that date, on the terms and conditions, specified in the articles contained in exhibit B. That on the 26th June last, said defendant, J. W. Brown, was indebted to the firm of Wilson & Brown in the sum of $240 70 according to the statement of his account with said firm, made up to that time, and marked exhibit C. That on the 31st day of July last. the defendant, Brown, was indebted to Wilson & Brown, in the sum of $1081 4-100, as per statement marked D, both of which are averred to be correct—that in addition, he is properly chargeable with his proportion (one-half) of the loss and discount on certain 238 counterfeit and uncurrent funds, on hand at the time of said levy. Also the loss and expenses attending the disposal of the stock on hand at the time of the levy—which stock, on the 18th of April last, amounted, as per inventory, to $6,396 73-100, but which amount was diminished by sales from 13th of April to 31st day of July last, to $5,000, on which Wilson claims a discount, on account of the goods being unsaleable, of not less than twenty per cent.

The defendant, Brown, in his answer, after admitting the facts charged as admitted in Wilson's answer, further says, that the motive and end of this defendant in altering the terms of the partnership, were no other than a disposition to provide for certain demands against that defendant, which he deemed it equitable and proper for him to provide for to the exclusion, if necessary, of the old liabilities of M. C. & J. W. Brown. That to provide for debts contracted since the debts due by M. C. & J. W. Brown, as hereinafter mentioned, he was advised that it was not only legal, but equitable and just under the circumstances. That M. C. & J. W. Brown were in business in 1842 and in 1843 at Cedar Keys and Port Leon, and in the gale of October, 1842, at Cedar Keys, and in the gale of 1843, at Port Leon, lost not only their stocks of merchandise, but also their books of accounts, and evidences of demands, except one day book, so much obliterated as to be of little or no service. That their misfortunes caused the failure of M. C. & J. W. Brown, and left them wholly unable to pay their outstanding obligations, of which the note of complainant on which said judgment is rendered, was one. That in the fall of 1846, the creditors of M. C. & J. W. Brown in view of their misfortunes, which no human power could avert, agreed to relinquish fifty per cent. of their claims. That upon the faith of the assurances of liberality on the part of his creditors, and convinced that they appreciated his misfortunes, he and one B. Nason, Jr., united in business upon the capital of B. Nason, of small amount, and upon such credits as they could obtain under the circumstances.

Brown & Nason purchased a stock of goods and offered them for sale in Newport, Florida, but as their fall purchases did not reach Florida in time for the business of the winter, they were compelled to sell out at a loss in the month of February, 1845. That in the fall of 1846, this defendant bought goods for Wilson & Brown, having previously united in business with said Wilson. That on the 13th day of April, 1846, he was indebted on account of business 239 transactions since the agreement with his creditors as aforesaid, to Taylor & Rich, of New York, to B. Nason, his former partner, and to J. C. Hanson, for whose benefit he drew on the firm of Wilson & Brown, for $750, $800, $1,000, respectively, as stated in the account current filed with the answer of David C. Wilson. This defendant further says, that on account of said agreement with his old creditors, and their said assurances, which have been kept sacredly by all save the complainants, he was enabled to procure credit, and to form and continue his business connections as aforesaid.

The testimony in the case is contained in the report of the master, to which no exceptions were taken, and consist princpally of the statement of these defendants, both of whom were examined by him.

David C. Wilson, one of these defendants, stated that the drafts of J. W. Brown, accepted by Wilson & Brown, as stated in No. 1 of exhibit C, were unpaid at the time of the levy of complainant's execution, on the 31st day of July, 1846, and remain yet unpaid.—That the first stated of these drafts was held last fall by Taylor & Rich of New York, who demanded payment of witness. That these drafts, when accepted by the firm, were delivered to J. W. Brown, and witness cannot, from his knowledge, say how they were afterwards disposed of, or who held them at the time of the levy, or now holds them. That the above acceptances were made, in order to enable J. W. Brown to withdraw his share of the capital and profits of the firm of Wilson & Brown, he declaring it to be his intention thereby to prevent any one of his former creditors from getting an advantage over others, by means of any execution or suit, and sale of his interest as above stated; and the suit of complainants then pending, and about to be carried into a judgment, was one of the claims, as witness understood, moving said Brown to the above course. The existence of this suit was known to witness at the time.

Brown, the other defendant, in his testimony taken before the master, states that the consideration of the acceptance given by Wilson & Brown, in favor of B. Nason, Jr., was his, witness', indebtedness to said Nason, on closing the affairs of Brown & Nason, (which was done at great loss,) for the money and capital brought into said firm by said Nason, beyond or exceeding any capital furnished by witness, 240 and that the amount of such acceptance, viz: eight hundred dollars, was in fact much short of witness' actual debt to said Nason, the full amount of his debt being at that time near fifteen hundred dollars. Witness further testifies that Taylor & Rich of New York, to whom the acceptance of Wilson & Brown for $750 was given, were the New York agents for the house of Brown & Nason, through whom their payments and settlements in New York were almost exclusively made, said agents being often in advance for witness' firm by acceptance or otherwise. That at the time the above draft on Wilson & Brown was made and accepted in favor of Taylor & Rich, they (T. & R.) agreed to take up and pay, and did actually, in consideration thereof, take up a note given by Brown & Nason to Perkins & Hopkins of New York, in the regular course of business, for the purchase of goods—which note, with interest, then amounted, as well as witness could estimate, to the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars. Witness also stated that the third acceptance, set forth in his answer as made by Wilson & Brown, and held by J. C. Hanson, for one thousand dollars, was given in consideration of witness being indebted to said Hanson, on striking a balance of accounts between them for various matters arising in the regular course of trade, commencing chiefly in the month of February, 1845. That said Hanson furnished to witness various amounts in money, drafts on New York, &c., to enable witness to settle up with the creditors of Brown & Nason, and other debts due by witness. There was some other proof, but it does not materially vary the aspect of the case.

The master in his reports says he proceeded to examine the books and accounts of Wilson & Brown, more particularly to ascertain the basis upon which the general statement of profit and loss, and balance sheet of 13th April, 1846, was made out, and to look carefully into the account of defendant, Brown, as these are stated in exhibit C, to defendant, Wilson's answer. These books (he says) appear to be all fairly kept and the entries regularly made, and in the order of the several transactions recorded, besides being sustained by the oaths unimpeached by both the defendants. The master says he could discover no item on which rested any suspicion of fraud or unfairness. He believes, and so reports, that every item charged in the account 241 of J. W. Brown, (see exhibit C,) constitutes a fair and bona fide charge against him, in the regular course of business. The drafts, which constitute the three first charges in said account, (the drafts for $750, $800 and $1,000, above mentioned,) were passed over to three creditors, and intended as part payment of debts fairly and justly due by said Brown, as is fully stated in his answer, and again more fully explained in his testimony taken in the course of this reference; That account shows a balance due by the defendant, J. W. Brown, to the firm of Wilson & Brown, on the 25th July, 1846, of $240 74-100. But inasmuch (says the master in his report) as it is a question reserved, as exclusively belonging to the Court to determine, whether a debtor has a right to apply his property or assets to the payment of some creditors in preference to others, as appears to have been done by defendant, Brown, in the present instance; and because the Court may decide against his right to do so, and decree that his interest in the firm of Wilson & Brown has not been rightfully transferred, charged and balanced by these acceptances, but remained legally and equitably subject to complainant's judgment, &c.—the master restated the accounts, and made J. W. Brown debtor to the firm of Wilson & Brown for over drafts on 30th July, 1846, $1,524 50-100.

No exceptions were taken to the report of the master, and it, therefore, stands confirmed, according to Rule 83, See Rules of Practice for the Courts of Equity, page 61."

Randall, for appellants:

This cause comes up by appeal from a final decree rendered in the Circuit Court for Leon County, on the 30th October, 1849, dismissing bill of appellants, the complainants below, with costs, &c. The case was submitted below, on bill, answers, general replication, and report of the Master in Chancery, which contains all the proofs in the cause.

If the proofs do not present a case favorable to defendants, it is the fault of their cause, since all the testimony and evidence furnished, (with the exception of the not very material testimony of one witness—Rust,) are taken from their own answers to the bill, from their books and accounts filed, and from their examinations taken under oath before the master.

242 To the mere statement of the accounts and the facts reported by the master, we taken no exception, nor to any matter he professed to decide, though we do not acquiesce in all the inferences he drew on grounds and facts not reported by him.

On the 31st July, 1846, complainants having a valid subsisting judgment for the amount of $2694 50, against defendant, Brown, one of the partners of the firm of Wilson & Brown, and an execution then in the hands of the Sheriff, for the satisfaction of which no separate property of Brown could be found—they caused their execution to be levied on the share and interest of said Brown in the partnership concern. That share and interest was sold in due form of law by the Sheriff, and complainants became the highest bidder and purchaser for the sum of $100—defendant, Wilson, (as he admits,) bidding against them to within a trifle of that last bid. To have the benefit of that purchase, this bill for discovery and relief was filed. The course is in entire conformity with law, and has not been excepted to formally in any part of the proceeding.

And now we contend, that the drawing of these three drafts on the firm, and their acceptance by the partner, Wilson, in the name of the firm, was a direct, palpable fraud in law, so far as regards our claim in this suit, the same being done as avowed, "to hinder, delay and defeat," complainants', creditors, recovery under their judgment in a suit then pending. There is no dispute about the facts. Read the statement of Wilson under oath before the master, (page 19) where he directly admits "that the above acceptances were made in order to enable J. W. Brown to withdraw his share of the capital and profits of the firm of Wilson & Brown, he declaring it to be his intention, thereby, to prevent any one of his former creditors from getting an advantage over others, by means of any suit or execution and sale of his interest as above stated. And the suit of complainants then pending and about to be carried into judgment was one of the claims, as witness understood, moving the said Brown to the above course. The existence of this suit was known to witness at the time." See Brown's admission in his answer and examination to the same purport.

Now if the payment of these drafts followed their drawing, and had been consummated before the levy of our execution, this avowed purpose of both parties, by this scheme "to delay and defeat creditors," would in equity render them liable to reclamation. But in 243 the same statement Wilson further admits, that to that very day, the 20th April, 1848, more than two years after drawn, and more than one year after due—they were still unpaid. And up to that date he only knew the fate of one of them, or by whom held, and that a demand of payment of it by Taylor & Rich "had been made the fall before." "That for the others no demand had been made on witness. That they had been delivered when accepted, to Brown, defendant, and he (Wilson) cannot state from his own knowledge, how they were afterwards disposed of, or who held them at the time of the levy, or now holds them."

We hold this admission to be conclusive evidence to fix the charge of fraud in law upon these parties, and upon all whose rights they profess to represent as agents, and to invalidate and defeat this purposed appropriation of Brown's funds, with the express, avowed design and end "to prevent creditors from getting their debts by course of law." We assert without fear of contradiction, that not a case can be found either at law or in equity, when the purpose is avowed to be, to prevent, delay, or defeat creditors, that any assignment, transfer, appropriation or even payment, has been sustained against the claim of such creditors. And it matters not, whether such transfer, appropriation, or payment, has been consummated or not, when such is the avowed or proved motive. Nor is it material in such a case whether a good and sufficient consideration has been paid.

The right of a debtor to give a preference, by a "bona fide" payment or transfer of effects, to any one creditor, when no bankrupt law intervenes to change the relations and rights of parties, is admitted. We admit also, the right of a purchaser acting "bona fide" to wrest from execution property, real or personal, before lien attached, and although vendor's motive or purpose may have been, "to delay, prevent or defeat creditors." But if "mala fides" enter into the purpose of both, the transaction is "fraudulent and void."

The most favorable position for Wilson, is to regard him as a purchaser for a valuable consideration, of Brown's share of the capital and stock in the firm. Yet we shall show that if he had paid the price, "a full consideration," yet purchasing with the avowed motive and object "to delay, prevent or defeat creditors," all the books characterize the transaction "as fraudulent and void."

But in point of fact, he had paid nothing—parted with nothing, but 244 his acceptances, and they proved of so little account, that after more than two years he had not heard of two of them, and knew not who held them.

In the meantime, Brown's share and stock remain in the firm, and Brown in the receipt of all the profits accruing to him before such acceptance. To this day, then, for aught that is known to this Court, the whole of Brown's money, stock and effects, may be still in the firm—while by this petty financial contrivance, our legal right to recover is prevented, delayed, and defeated. For authorities to sustain the above propositions, we refer to Twyne's case, found at large in 1 Smith's L. C., p. 1. The transaction comes clearly within the 2d, 3d, 4th and 5th points of that case, stated as indicating fraud. In Cadogan vs. Kennett, 2 Cowp., 432, Lord Mansfield said: "The only question in that case was as to the purpose and intention"—here they are avowed.

In Wooley vs. De Mattos, 1 Burrows, 474, 475, Lord Mansfield said: "Valid transactions as between the parties, may be fraudulent by reason of covin, collusion, or confederacy, to injure a third person," and he instances—"if a man, knowing that a creditor has obtained a judgment against his debtor, buy the defendant's goods for a full price, to enable him to defeat the creditor's execution it is fraudulent," &c. The very case, as shown in this record, exhibits all these circumstances of "covin, collusion and confederacy, to injure complainants." This pretended purchase—when no price has yet been paid—when the day of payment is referred to the Greek Kalends—was made of defendant, Brown's, goods to enable him to defeat a creditor."

See, also, Crane vs. Drake, 2d Vernon, Doe, demise of Willis, vs. Menton, 4 T. R., 39. This case from 4 T. R. goes to the effect that fraud will vitiate any transaction, "though the principal do not take any part in it, if his agent do—for the principal is civilly responsible for the acts of his agent." Now, under this last doctrine—if these pretended or real payees of these drafts were parties to or interested in this controversy, (which they are not,) their claims would be equally invalidated or postponed by the fraud of their agent, Brown. See Hovenden on Frauds, 2d Vol., p. 222, and cases cited, for the principle.

245 While the contract or arrangement is executory merely—when (as in this case) no payment is made, or absolute assignment—the respective rights of the creditors are equitable merely, and the better equity must prevail. Beals vs. Guernsey, 8 John., 452, decides, "That the purchaser knowing of the judgment, must purchase with the view and purpose to defeat the creditor's execution, and if he does it with that purpose, it is iniquitous and fraudulent, notwithstanding he may give a full price. The question of fraud depends upon the motive. The purchaser must be "bona fide as well as on good consideration," &c. Refers to 7 Bur., 474. Cowp., 434.

Bridge vs. Eggleston, 14 Mass., 245. The law of this case is directly applicable. See opinion of Ch. J. Parker, 247. Damon vs. Bryant, 2 Pickering, 411. Adams vs. Page, 7 Pick., 542. Wadsworth vs. Havens, 3 Wend., 411. Reade vs. Livingstone, 3 John., 481. Hooper vs. Hills, 9 Pick., 435.

To these facts and authorities, what reply has been made? As to the first, it is contended, that under the original articles of agreement, Brown had a right to withdraw his capital when he saw fit, and to dissolve the partnership. We reply, that the course taken did not bring him within the terms of the stipulation of the articles. The act "of withdrawing capital" and "closing the concern," were to be concurrent acts. The concern was not closed on the 13th April, but kept afloat for another year. Neither was the capital in effect withdrawn. But if the acts had been concurrent and consummate, yet being incidents of and connected with a fraudulent purpose—an illegal design—the terms of the articles of copartnership could give no sanction to them. Wilson was under no legal obligation to aid in the scheme—he was a mere volunteer. How idle the pretext of withdrawing capital when nothing was in fact withdrawn! No account taken to ascertain amounts—to fix balances—but a large conjectural amount exceeding Brown's share—arbitrarily assumed! While Brown after this simulated withdrawal of all and more than his capital, is allowed by the new articles, to have the same share of profits as before. The artifice is too shallow to deceive. The articles exhibit B, of the 11th April, 1846, was a part of the fraudulent machinery designed to give color, and is entitled to no consideration.

But it is urged that this was the mere exercise of an acknowledged 246 right of a debtor to give a preference to one creditor over another. And Mr. Archer contends that such conduct was highly meritorious and honorable. That the preferred debts stood in a higher grade of merit than that of complainant's. For this last assertion there is not a title of reliable evidence. "Preferences," such as the gentleman speaks of, are tolerated merely—never approved of. They are admitted as of necessity, in the absence of bankrupt laws. But "priority" of debt—and next "equality," are the circumstances that gain favor at law and in equity. The principles invoked by the gentleman constitute the morals of the counting house and the stock broker's office—not of judicial tribunals.

In the beginning, I admitted this right as incontestible, but showed it was subject to all the conditions of being "on good consideration," "bona fide," &c. All the cases cited by me which prohibit conduct such as that of appellees, recognize the right of giving preference—yet the argument of Mr. Archer would make it uncontrollable and free from all limitation or restriction. The only authorities cited by Mr. Archer to sustain his case were, first Holbird vs. Anderson, 5 T. R., 235. That case goes merely to establish the right of a debtor to give a preference, when the transfer or assignment (by judgment confessed) is consummate. It may go to show that the debtor's motive may be "to prevent or delay," but that unless both parties concur in that illegal and fraudulent motive and purpose, the design is not defeated. In that case, the preferred creditor did no more than agree to recover a just debt. He was no volunteer purchaser to injure a third party—to prevent or delay other creditors. But the case of Hodgson vs. Newman, cited therein with approval, goes to show a material distinction noted by Buller, Justice, which renders the principal case no authority against us.

The other case cited, was Brooks vs. Marbury, 7 Wh., 566, which does not the least resemble the present case. The principles involved were altogether different. There was no pretext that the deed in that case was purposed or designed "to hinder, delay, or defeat creditors." In truth, it was an assignment for creditors generally, with some preferences, but it was impeached on grounds of public policy. That the motive held out to grantor for making it was a promise of indemnity from criminal prosecution—that it was made to defeat the criminal justice of the country—to compromise a felony.

Henry Gassett & Co. vs. Wilson & Brown.—Argument of Counsel.

The rules of law applicable to it came under a different category 247 from that in which the present case is found. It has no point in common with this. There, the transfer and assignment were perfected and consummate. Here, no title or possession in the stock or capital of the firm was changed, no goods or effects transferred—nothing in fact given or made over, but a mere alteration, and that colorable merely, of a balance on the books of the firm of Wilson & Brown.

The fund sought to be withdrawn by these drafts, did not at the time, nor for two years after, go to pay any creditor. But it is strongly urged in this case, that we cannot charge these defendants or either of them, without doing injustice to Hanson, Nason and other supposed creditors of Brown, for whom these drafts were made. This arises from a misapprehension as to the nature of our claim.

To establish that, it is not necessary for us to prove that these creditors have no right to recover on these acceptances. In candor and truth, we must say that we do not believe they ever expect or have any right to recover, except in the event that Wilson can safely pay them out of Brown's funds.

That seems to be the opinion of the master, after closely examining into the case, and all the attendant and following circumstances corroborate that conclusion. Be this as it may, if Wilson accepted or ever paid, in fraud of our rights as creditors, he accepted and paid in his own wrong, and cannot set up the act to our prejudice.

When our levy was made, nothing had been paid—nothing in fact assigned—nothing but a future liability assumed—voluntarily assumed. We knew not until answers made and proofs taken, who were these foreign creditors, or that such existed. Knew not of such claims. How then could we make them parties? Why make them parties? We seek not to defeat their claims, whatever they may be, against Brown & Wilson. We ask not the delivery of these drafts to us—we leave them to their remedies at law—looking to ours in equity.

The firm of Wilson & Brown, or "quocunque alio nomine gaudet" is not insolvent—we are not disputing about equitable assets, but if we were, the citation above from Hovenden, would prove that we have the better equity, for their claim only takes its rise from a fraud perpetrated to our prejudice by their agent, Brown. Then as regards Wilson, if he had paid full price, consideration—according to 248
Lord Mansfield's doctrine in Cadogen & Kennett, & Wooley vs. De Mattos, he would, notwithstanding, have acted "male fide," and have lost his money.

But Mr. Archer, in his written brief submitted, draws most liberally from what he terms my admissions as to the correctness of the master's report in general; and he thence deduces that I concur in all that the master infers or conjectures as to the statements of Brown.

Now I do not adopt all the master's views touching this transaction. But even the master, favorably as he seems disposed towards these parties, falls far short of the conclusions of Mr. Archer. He gives the testimony with some favorable glosses, but concludes nothing beyond verifying accounts, and reserves the effect of it for the Court. Yet the learned and ingenious gentleman infers that I admit that Taylor & Rich, Nason, Hanson, &c., were "bona fide" creditors when these drafts were drawn, &c., and that the drafts were in truth drawn in their favor, and went incontinently into their possession. Now I admit to no such thing—but believe and contend the opposite from the very circumstances of the case.

It was not needful for me to contend that these drafts were held in secret trust for Brown, or that the transaction was colorable merely. The facts do warrant and give rise to strong suspicion that, as regards part of them at least, such was the fact.

Now, every business man must know that such utter neglect—such oblivion manifested by holders of moneyed acceptances—such utter indifference and ignorance on the part of acceptors as to their fate, is most unprecedented in real business transactions. No man ever heard of such a case before amongst merchants.

Years after due—two of them never heard of—not traced to any holder by acceptor, the head of the house, the only responsible partner—never presented for payment; and this, too, after passing into the hands of defendant Brown, the drawer, for whose accommodation they were accepted! "Credat Judeus appella, non ego."—And yet the trivial circumstance is noted, that Wilson says he cannot state these things "from his own knowledge." And what then? If these drafts had ever passed out of Brown's hands into the possession of any "bona fide" holder and owner, must not, from the nature of things, some application have been made for payment—some 249 inquiry at least made touching them, and to the acceptor, the head of the house, who, by the articles of co-partnership, managed the home business. The opposite supposition is inconceivable; and would not Wilson thus have acquired some knowledge of his own?

It is not necessary for me to impute actual fraud—corrupt and impure motive and conduct, and I do not impute them; but I do say that Brown's answer and testimony are not consistent, and do not establish that, at the time these acceptances were made, all these persons named were the actual creditors of Brown.

In the case of Taylor & Rich, there appears, then, to have been no actual indebtedness, but only an engagement or promise to create it, by future advances. The proofs then, too, are that these drafts were drawn for conjectural amounts, without settlements or balances struck.

But the explanation made by the learned counsel, for this neglect ignorance and oblivion touching these securities, is, that, while this suit of complainants was pending, Wilson was justified in withholding payment; but this falls far short of explaining away the neglect and ignorance relating to the drafts—their ownership and possession—which Wilson acknowledges, though it may account for their not being paid. Wilson could not refuse to pay before payment was asked—nor after refusal to pay, could he have no knowledge of who held them. But the statement and explanation of the learned counsel goes to fortify and confirm the notion of the master, and the opinion I advance, that these drafts were never designed to subject Wilson to any absolute liability—that they imposed upon him no unconditional obligation to pay their amounts. If this be so, then there is an end to all pretext for regarding this as an absolute purchase or withdrawal of Brown's share of the capital, or payment, or equivalent debt created on Wilson's part. Nothing was paid, and nothing is likely to be paid by him, in consequence of our recovery, beyond the amount we may recover. If he can be permitted thus far to stave off all claim on these drafts, he can continue to do so.

In conclusion, I would respectfully suggest to the Court, the vital importance of preserving in their full force the salutary principles of our statute of fraud, borrowed from those of Elizabeth. While the Court may keep open and unfettered the ready transmission of property and effects, when directly, absolutely and openly assigned—250 while they, in the absence of a bankrupt law, may allow these struggles amongst creditors for preferences on "bona fide" debts, they should watch with jealousy these secret attempts to withdraw property from its legitimate liabilities—more especially should a Court of Equity guard its process from contempt.

In vain do Courts of Justice hold out to suitors redress in their Courts, if, after protracted and expensive litigation, when they are in position to reap the fruits of their actions, parties may, with purpose avowed to delay or defeat their remedies, combine, under color of giving preference to A, to divest B. of his legal rights. This notion of giving preference is already too prevalent, and its practice regulated by caprice and partiality, and fraught with much injustice. It requires restraint rather than encouragement—for while it is obnoxious to abuse even amongst the honorable class of merchants, it prevails to a most vicious extent amongst stock-jobbers and speculators, and every class of gamblers, under the specious pretext of preferring "debts of honor."

J. T. Archer, for appellees:

The original articles of partnership between Wilson & Brown which are exhibited, bear date 12th January, 1844. They contain a provision that "the concern shall be dissolved, and each of the partners draw his proportion of the capital thereof, whenever either of said parties shall wish to close the concern."

By reference to the cause of action on which Gassett's judgment is founded, it will be found that M. C. & J. W. Brown were in arrears at the date of the partnership between Wilson & J. W. Brown. This circumstance verifies the allegation of Brown, that he was involved when he commenced with Wilson. There could be no other object on the part of Brown than to add to his resources, to enable him to retrieve his losses; and the circumstance of his connection with Wilson, though embarrassed himself, being avowed to the world, is proof against any fraud contemplated by such a co-partnership.

There was also propriety in this case in retaining to himself the right to withdraw his capital at any moment. He was in business under the indulgence of his creditors, and if any sought to press, as did the Gassett's, while the others remained indulgent, it would be inequitable to permit the pressing creditor to gain an advantage, by 251 obtaining legal priorities. To prevent the unjust appropriation of all his means to one exacting creditor, to the total exclusion of all other claims of a confidential nature and otherwise, was not only not inequitable, but his duty. Consequently, he reserved the right to control his capital—to withdraw it from the concern of Wilson & Brown, and to apply it to the payment of his creditors, according to his own sense of duty and justice. The privilege he exercised,—was compelled by duty to exercise, when he found the Gassetts, in the face of indulgence on the part of all others, seeking by suit to subject all his means exclusively to themselves. The claim of Taylor & Rich was for moneys advanced, and, according to the understanding of merchants, entitled to the position of a confidential claim, and as such entitled, by all just rules prevailing among merchants, to a priority over the claim of complainants. So, likewise, were the other claims preferred by defendant, Brown. He, therefore, preferred these to the claims of Gassett, and other claims against the old firm of M. C. & J. W. Brown. He drew upon the firm for his interest, procured their acceptances negotiable, and transferred the accepted drafts, to his preferred creditors. Was this fraud in fact or law? See 2 Kent's Com., 532, and note.

Suppose on the 13th April, 1846, Brown had assigned his interest in the firm of Wilson & Brown by a voluntary deed of assignment, preferring certain creditors, to the exclusion of Gassett & Co., would this have been a fraud? Is there one assignment in a hundred made by insolvent debtors, even pending suits, that does not give preferences? Is there anything unusual, unlawful, or fraudulent, in giving preferences in assignments? Do not all merchants recognize as essential to the business of merchants, that there may be confidential debts, and that the debtor has a right to discriminate? on this point, if it be necessary to cite authorities, see Harrison vs. Trustees Phillips Academy, 12 Mass., 456. Hatch vs. Smith, 5 Man., 42. Widgery vs. Haskell, 5 Man., 144. Marbury vs. Brooks, 7 Wheat., 566; also, 2 Kent, 532, before cited. Wilkes vs. Ferris, 5 Johns, 335. Phoenix vs. Ingraham, 5 Johns., 412.

What are all the drafts delivered to Taylor & Rich, to Nason and to Hanson, but assignments pro tanto of his (Brown's) interest—a withdrawal and appropriation of his means, for the purpose of providing for the claims of Taylor & Rich and others, in preference to 252 Gassett?

Such an assignment is not fraudulent, when the creditor actually pays or secures a bona fide debt due by him. A sale by an insolvent debtor of his property, to convert it into money, to prevent his creditors from reaching it, and to enjoy it himself, is a fraud; and if the purchaser knows his motives, he is involved in the fraud. But a sale or assignment to pay a just debt, in preference to the claim of a suing creditor, is not unlawful. In such case, the debtor appropriates his means to his creditor, and this is no fraud, though the suing creditor be disappointed. Had Brown withdrawn his capital, not to pay debts, but to conceal his means in his pockets, and beyond the reach of his creditors, it would have been a fraud—his motives being iniquitous would have established the fraud. But to withdraw his capital, for the purpose of paying bona fide creditors, is not a fraudulent purpose. The authorities cited by complainant's counsel do not, therefore, apply—as it does not appear that Brown withdrew his interest to conceal it from his own creditors, with a view to his own benefit; but, on the contrary, that he appropriated it for the purpose of securing the payment of just and bona fide debts, before the judgment of complainants was obtained against him. See Holbird vs. Anderson, 5 T. R., 235. Estwick vs. Caillaud, ib., 424.

How can Henry Gassett & Co. ask the appropriation of all Brown's means to their claim, to the exclusion of all others, and then say that a like appropriation by Brown to any other equally just claim is a fraud? How can they or their counsel denounce Brown for doing for certain creditors what they are seeking to do for themselves?

As before alleged, the claims preferred by Brown were of a confidential nature. Independent of this, there are circumstances which place the conduct of Brown in the most unexceptional point of view. From the testimony, it is clearly deducible that the firm of M. C. & J. W. Brown had failed—that, notwithstanding this failure, and the consequent embarrassment of defendant, Brown, he commenced business without concealment of his interest in the firm of Brown & Nason, and afterwards of Wilson & Brown. It also appears that Brown & Nason were liable under outstanding, unsettled demands against the firm. The credit obtained by J. W. Brown du-253 ring his insolvency must, necessarily, have been from a confidence, not in his solvency, but in his sense of justice. Unquestionably, the debts to which he occupied such a position were eminently entitled to be classed as confidential. It was particularly his duty to see his more recent debts paid, rather than suffer the means he had acquired from such creditors to be appropriated to the liabilities of M. C. & J. W. Brown. In other words, the creditors of M. C. & J. W. Brown could not equitably claim of J. W. Brown any assets arising from the business of Brown & Nason, until the creditors of Brown & Nason were satisfied and a settlement was had between the partners themselves.

But under any circumstances, Wilson could not have refused his assent to the withdrawal of Brown's capital—for he was bound by his article of co-partnership to consent to a dissolution of the concern, whenever it was demanded by Brown; and a refusal to accept drafts for that purpose, would have rendered him liable in damages to Brown in an action at law. It was no fraud in him, but his legal duty to fulfil his contract with Brown. The relation between them was analogous to that of debtor and creditor; and no debtor has a right to refuse payment to a creditor, on the ground that the latter is suspected of an intention to make an inequitable disposition of his means, even if there were just grounds for such apprehensions. How can Wilson be chargeable with "mala fides" in complying with his agreement, when a refusal to do so would have been a breach of faith, and a violation of his contract?

The non-presentment of the drafts, which is relied on by complainant's counsel as ground to suspect fraud, is a matter which does not affect the merits of the defence, and which the defendants cannot be called upon to explain. The pendency of this very suit affords a reasonable conjecture as to the reason of the non-presentment of these drafts, and the complainants have not taken the proper steps for ascertaining the reason with any greater certainty than is afforded by conjecture. The cause of the delay could have been known, had the preferred creditors been made parties to the bill of complaint; and the complainants having omitted to make them parties, it certainly should not avail them to attempt to throw suspicion upon the transaction, on the ground that some of the circumstances connected therewith are not explained. It would be making the 254 defendants suffer the penalty of the complainant's omission—permitting the complainants to take advantage of their own neglect. The holders of the drafts should have been made parties on other grounds. The Court cannot render a decree against Wilson for the amount of Brown's former interest, while these acceptances are outstanding against him. Should a decree be rendered against Wilson, the same decree should order these drafts to be delivered up for cancellation; otherwise, Wilson would be subject to pay the same demand twice, which would be inequitable and unjust, but could not be avoided, should a decree be rendered against him, while the holders of the drafts are not before the Court.

I will only add to the foregoing, that complainant's counsel opens his argument by an avowal, "in limine," that he takes no exceptions to the master's reports on the facts he professed to decide. These facts proved are simply that Taylor & Rich, Nason and Hanson, were bona fide creditors of Brown, and Brown & Nason; that his (Brown's) interest in the firm of Wilson & Brown was drawn for, in favor of the parties, prior to Gassett's judgments.

If these are the conceded facts, the only question arising is one of law:—Whether the drafts accepted take the fund, or the execution? and this involves the settlement of the rights of parties not before the Courts.

Unable, however, to sustain his case by authority, after this concession "in limine," the counsel for complainants is compelled, in order to bring his case within the authorities cited by him, to gainsay his avowal at the outset, by contending that the drafts were not drawn to give preference to bona fide creditors, but are virtually held in secret trust for himself. The delivery to bona fide creditors is proved. There is no proof of a secret trust. That is not to be presumed; it must be proved by complainant.

The evidence relied on to establish a secret trust is the non-payment of the drafts. Wilson says he does not know of his own knowledge who held two of the drafts—Brown is not interrogated as to the reasons why the drafts have not been presented, or paid—the holders are not parties to answer for themselves. The bill is one of discovery, and the defendants are witnesses of complainants. Brown could only answer as interrogated by complainants, or cross-examined on same subjects—he was not asked why the drafts were not presented, or paid.

DOUGLAS, Ch. J. 255

This cause came on for final hearing in the court below, and was argued by counsel: whereupon it was ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the bill be dismissed, and that the complainants pay the costs, &c. The case has been ably argued in this court and the question presented for our consideration, is, whether the Court erred in making that decree. On behalf of the complainants it has been contended in an argument that evinces great labor and research, that the transaction between Joseph W. Brown and Wilson & Brown, was a sale made by said Brown, of his interest in the partnership, to Wilson, for the purpose and intent to delay, hinder and defraud his creditors, and especially the complainants, and is therefore entirely null and void according to the provisions of the statute of 13 Eliz., chap. 5, and our statute in relation to fraudulent conveyances, Thompson's Digest, page 215, which is almost identical in its provisions with that of 13 Eliz. on that subject. On the other hand, it has been argued with equal zeal and ability, that the transaction was entered into solely for the purpose of giving a preference to certain creditors over others, which Brown had the right (and under the circumstances) it was his duty to do, that Brown had suffered great losses before, and was consequently involved when he commenced business with Wilson—and that there should be no other object on the part of Brown than to add to his resources, to enable him to retrieve his losses—and the circumstances of his connection with Wilson (though embarrassed himself,) being avowed to the world, is proof against any fraud contemplated by such a partnership. That there was also a propriety in this case, in retaining to himself the right to withdraw his capital at any moment. He was in business under the indulgence of his creditors, and if any sought to press, as did complainants, while the others remained indulgent, it would be inequitable to permit the pressing creditor to gain an advantage by obtaining legal priorities. Let us see if this will bear the test of scrutiny.

The defendant, J. W. Brown, had been engaged in mercantile business, as a member of the firm of M. C. & J. W. Brown, previous to the fall of 1843, at Cedar Keys and Port Leon. In 1842, a gale of wind at Cedar Keys destroyed a portion of their effects, and in the month of September, 1843, another storm not only swept away the residue of their property, but all their books and evidences of debts due them, except one day book so much obliterated as to be of 256 little or no value, and left them almost entirely destitute: and it is a part of the history of the country, that it swept Port Leon itself and left it a desolation. During the period of their prosperity they had become indebted to twelve northern houses, as appears by the record, of whom the complainants were one, all of whom, prompted by that feeling of benevolence and humanity which is always characteristic of a highminded and honorable merchant, or for some other cause, agreed to renew all the notes of the firm of M. C. and J. W. Brown at the rate of fifty cents on the dollar, to be paid in three equal installments, six, nine and twelve months from date, with interest after six months—this agreement bearing date the 2d of September, 1844. What the amount of the whole indebtedness was does not appear—if, however, the other debts respectively, bore any proportion to the one here claimed, it must have been near $30,000, and if it were one third of that sum, no reasonable man could have expected it to be paid by M. C. & J. W. Brown, out of any business in which they might engage, situated as they were, within the time stipulated; and it seems not to have been expected by the other creditors, or considered within the spirit and meaning of the compromise, by the defendant, Brown, for he says in his answer (speaking of the old creditors) that these assurances (of indulgence) have been sacredly kept by all, save the complainants.

The judgment of complainants was obtained on the 20th May, 1846. The suit must have been commenced immediately after the last payment under said agreement fell due. There is no evidence that the embarrassments of J. W. Brown were concealed; it is alleged and not denied, that they were well known—it is not to be supposed that Wilson intended to involve himself in them, or that Brown could have obtained credit that would have enabled him to have carried on his business, except upon the assurance to (or at least the expectation on the part of) the new creditors, that they should be paid out of the avails of the goods they sold him. Was there any moral wrong under these circumstances, in his taking means to prevent the appropriation of all his means to these exacting creditors, to the total exclusion of all others, old and new? We think not, and are happy to find, upon reference to the brief of the learned counsel who argued this cause for complainants, that he does not impute to these defendants actual fraud, or corrupt motives or conduct. He insists most strongly, however, that the transaction is a fraud in law. But in what does the fraud consist? Surely not in the payment of bona fide and honest debts. It is said, moreover, that the acceptances of Wilson & Brown, were made to enable J. W. Brown to withdraw his share of the capital and profits of that firm, he declaring it to be his intention thereby to prevent any of his former creditors from getting an advantage over others by means of any suit, or execution and sale of his interest as above stated; and that the suit of the complainants, then pending and about to be carried into judgment, was one of the claims moving said Brown to the above course. And from this it is argued that fraud must be inferred, and that if payment of these drafts had followed their drawing, and had been consummated before the levy of complainant's execution, this avowed purpose by both parties "to delay and defeat" creditors, would in equity render them liable to reclamation. Without pausing to inquire how far this proposition may have been true, had these drafts been handed over to a person or persons standing in a new relationship to the said J. W. Brown, or indeed to any one else without any valuable consideration, it is sufficient to say that it appears by proofs (and so the master has reported) that they were passed over to three creditors of said Brown, and intended as part payment of debts, fairly and justly due by him, and that these creditors were among those from whom he had made, or who aided him in making, his late purchases, or in paying therefor.

Again it has been urged that the holders of these drafts have not called for payment, and that a secret trust for the benefit of Brown must therefore be presumed; but this does not follow. They may abstain from feelings of kindness towards Brown, or from motives of policy, he being a customer, and we do not see that the complainants have any cause to complain because other creditors are not as exacting as themselves. It would work no injury to them, were payment never to be demanded. This transaction has been treated by the learned counsel for the complainants as a sale by Brown of his interest in the partnership to Wilson, but it was not so; it was a withdrawal of it under the original articles of partnership. After this withdrawal, he had no interest in the firm, until the new articles were made; and it was withdrawn for the purpose of giving preference to the creditors to whom the drafts were passed over, which the defendant, Brown, might lawfully do

In the case of Holsey, et al. vs. Whitney, et al., 4 Mason's C. C. R., 206, (which was a contest between an attaching creditor and a trustee under a general assignment for the benefit of all creditors,) Judge Story held that a general assignment is good, notwithstanding it does not purpose to convey all the debtor's property, and yet require a general release; or does not fully enumerate all the debts due, or describe the property generally, or give a preferenc to certain classes of creditors. A general assignment, said Lord Ellenborough, in Peckstock vs. Lyster, 3 Maule & Sel., 371, is to be referred to, as an act of duty and not of fraud, when no purpose of fraud is proved, and justice Le Blank added in the same case, "to hold such a deed fraudulent, would be contrary to Holbird vs. Anderson, 5 T. R., 325, and to all the cases which have decided that a party independent of the bankrupt laws, may convey away his property for the benefit of all his creditors." Justice Bailey gave full assent to the doctrine, emphatically observing "that this conveyance, so far from being fraudulent, was the most honest act the party could do." This doctrine was asserted in a case where the very object of the conveyance was to prevent a judgment creditor from obtaining satisfaction out of the property on execution." But the Court decided that it was not sufficient that the creditor was delayed and defeated by such a conveyance of his remedy under the execution; but the act must be fraudulent. Nor (said Judge Story, in Holsey, et al., vs. Whitney, et al., above cited) was there anything new in this doctrine. "It may be clearly gathered from prior cases, and especially from Estwick vs. Caillaud, 5 T. R., 420, Holbird vs. Anderson, 5 T. R. 235, Minx vs. Howell, 4 East. R., 528, and has since been confirmed even as against the crown in the King vs. Watson, 3 Price, Ex. Rep., 6. 1 Cond. Eng. Ex. R., 265 to 271.

"It would indeed," says Judge Story, "be somewhat strange if a debtor might bona fide prefer one creditor to another in the distribution of his property, and was not at liberty to prefer all his creditors to one,"—Ibid, 211. "The law allows the debtor to give a preference to one creditor (and I think to all creditors also) by a bona fide conveyance." Ibid, 213. In Estwick vs. Caillaud, 5 T. R., 278. it was held that "if a person having several creditors, convey by deed the legal interest in part of his real and personal property to a trustee in trust (after deducting expenses respecting the trust) out of the rents and profits, to pay half the surplus to the grantor for his own use, and the residue among certain creditors named in the schedule, such deed was valid." Lord Kenyon said there was nothing fraudulent either in the construction of the deed or the manner of carrying it into execution. It was neither illegal nor immoral to prefer one set of creditors to another. Ashurst said there is nothing illegal on the face of the deed, for there is no objection to a debtor's preferring one set of creditors to another. Ibid, 221. Indeed the right of a debtor to give a preference by a bona fide payment or transfer of effects to any one creditor, when no bankrupt law intervenes to change the relations and rights of the parties, was admitted by the learned counsel for the complainants in the argument, and he attempted to show that the transaction in this case was mala fides, relying in proof of that position, upon the statements of the defendants, that it was intended to prevent the complainants from obtaining a priority by their execution. But the case of Peckstock vs. Leyster, 3 M. & S., above cited by Judge Story in Holsey, et al., vs. Whitney, et al., 4 Mason 211, is an authority against that position, and so is Holberd vs. Anderson, 5 T. R., 235. In the last case, the facts are as follows: In Easter Term, 1791, Shepherd obtained a judgment against Charter, who brought a writ of error and delayed execution until Easter Term, 1792, when judgment was affirmed in Exchequer Chamber. On the 7th of May, the costs in that suit were taxed, and on the 8th of May, Charter, knowing Shepherd's intention to take out execution which he was entitled to sue out on that day, went to the plaintiff, Holbird, who was a creditor of his, informed him of the situation, and executed a warrant of attorney to confess a judgment, on which, judgment was immediately entered up and execution sued out, and delivered to the sheriff two hours before Shepherd's execution reached sheriff's office. The sheriff levied under Shepherd's writ and returned nulla bona to the plaintiff's. On this evidence it was contended on the part of the defendants, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, inasmuch as this was an undue preference given by Charter to the plaintiff for the purpose of defeating Shepherd's execution, and that the warrant of attorney given to plaintiff was fraudulent and void by the statute 13 E., C. 5. But Lord Kenyon being of opinion that there was no undue preference, the plaintiff had a verdict, to set which aside, Gibbs obtained a rule to show cause, which was fully argued; when Lord Kenyon, Ch. J., said "there was no fraud in this case—the plaintiff was preferred by his debtor, Charter, not with a view of any benefit to the latter, but merely to secure the payment of a just debt to the former, in which I see no illegality or injustice. The words of the statute, 13 Eliz., do not apply to this case, for the warrant of attorney was given on good consideration, and the other words in the act "bona fide," only apply to those cases where possession is not delivered or is only colorable; of the former kind, was Twyne's case, where the vendor continued in possession, and of the latter, Hodgson vs. Newman, where (as far as I recollect) the goods were removed from the vendor's houses and his wife continued in possession of them." Ashurst, J., and Buller, J., concurred, and the rule was discharged. We have cited this case very much at length, because it is a leading one, and identical in principle with the case at bar. And the doctrine contained in it is fully sustained by the opinion of the Supreme Court pronounced by Ch. Justice Marshal in the case of Marbury vs. Brooks, 7 Wheat. Rep., 556, 5 Peters Cond. Rep., 356, in which that Court says "that a debtor has a right to prefer one creditor to another cannot be denied, and that his private motives for giving this preference, provided the creditor has done nothing improper, cannot annul this right, is equally certain. On the other hand it will also be admitted, that any unlawful consideration moving from the preferred creditor, to induce this preference, may avoid the deed which gives it." There is no evidence in the case before us, of any such unlawful consideration moving from the creditors, to whom the drafts above mentioned were transferred, to induce the preference given.

The case of Brooks vs. Marbury came again before the Supreme Court in 11 Wheat., 78. 6 Peters' Condensed Reports, 223 to 236. Chief Justice Marshal again pronounced the opinion, and at page 227 said: "The preference of creditors of a particular description over others, being one which a debtor has a right to make, the sale of his property, and the payment of the proceeds to such favored creditors, being an act which the debtor may perform for himself, or his agent, we cannot conceive that the motives which may have induced the preference, although communicated to the agent, can in reason affect 261 the transaction, provided nothing has occurred on the part of the creditors, which is any degree exceptionable, either in law or justice." Nothing exceptionable appears on the part of the creditors here—nothing complained of, only that they have not pressed their claims on Wilson & Brown for the payment of the drafts, which works no injury to the complainants, and may have resulted from the cause suggested by the master, who says "the delay of payment appears to have been in consequence of the failure on the part of defendant, Wilson, to realize and collect a large sum of the accounts then (on the 31st July, 1846,) due, and supposed to be good, but which have since proved to be on parties in failing circumstances, or wholly insolvent."

Now, while it is not denied that valid transactions between the parties may be fraudulent, by reason of the covin, collusion, or confederacy, to injure a third person, as held in Wolley vs. De Mattos, 1 Burrows, 474, where "if a man, knowing that a creditor has obtained a judgment against his debtor, buy the defendant's goods for a full price, to enable him to defeat the creditor's execution, it is fraudulent," is instanced as cited by the solicitor for the complainants; and that fraud will vitiate any transaction, "though the principal do not take any part in it, if his agent do, because the principal is civilly responsible for the acts of his agent," as was held in Doe ex. dem., Willis vs. Martin, 4 Term. Rep., 39, also cited, we do not perceive that the principles there asserted touch this case. In the first, the purchaser was an indifferent person, not a creditor purchasing with a view to secure the payment of a fair and bona fide debt; and the latter does not seem to be applicable, unless we are to consider Wilson the agent of the holder of these bills, and engaged in a fraudulent transaction. But we do not look upon him as their agent—he was the partner of Brown, associated with him under articles, by one of which, Brown had a right, at any time, to withdraw his portion of the capital invested. The complainants are pressing Brown; he prefers others, whose claims are equally meritorious, and who, indeed, have stronger claims to these funds, from the fact that they had aided him to raise them; he draws for the amount of his portion of his capital stock to pay them. What right had Wilson to say aught against it? The law does not forbid it—the soundest principles of morality justify it. Wilson, if he could be consid-262 ered in the light of an agent in this matter, was only aiding his principal to secure the payment of just and honest claims. Upon a full review of the whole case, therefore, we perceive no error in the decree of the Court below, and it is, therefore, confirmed.

Per totam curiam.

THE SOUTHERN LIFE INSURANCE AND TRUST COMPANY, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, VS. JOHN D. GRAY, DEFENDANT IN ERROR.

A note made payable to the agent of a corporation, may be sued in the name and on behalf of the company, if it is proved to be the property of the corporation.

Error to the Circuit Court of the County of Franklin.

For a statement of the case—the principle involved, and the errors assigned, see the opinion delivered by the Court.

Thompson, for plaintiff in error.

This was an action in the Court below, brought by the plaintiff in error against the defendant, as maker of a promissory note, dated St. Joseph, November 7, 1839, payable thirty days after date, promising to pay James Ruan, agent of the Southern Life Insurance and Trust Company, or order, one hundred and fifty-eight 98-100 dollars.

The note was endorsed as follows: Pay to the order of George Field, President. James Ruan, Agent.

The plaintiffs proved that Ruan was its agent, and that George Field was its President. During the progress of the trial, the plaintiff struck out the special direction of the endorsement, as stated in the bill of exceptions.

The Court ruled out the evidence of the fact that George Field was the President of the plaintiff, which was introduced for the purpose of showing that the indorsement to Field in his official capacity, coupled with the possession by the plaintiff of the note, was intended to vest the property in the note in the plaintiff.

The Court then decided that the plaintiff was not in law entitled 263 to recover.

The errors assigned in this Court are:—

1. The Court ruled out improperly the evidence of the fact that George Field was president of the plaintiff.

2. The Court erred in deciding that the plaintiff is not in law entitled to recover.

1. It was competent to show by evidence that the word President, attached to Field's name, was a transfer to him in his official capacity of an officer and servant of the plaintiff. Church vs. Barlow, 9 Pick. R., 547. State vs. Boies, 2 Fair. R., 474. Barker vs. Prentiss, 6 Mass. R., 430. See, also, Mott vs. Hicks, 1 Cowen R., 513. Folger vs. Chace, 18 Pick. R., 63. Spear vs. Ladd, 11 Mass. R., 94.

The right to strike out special endorsements, where no right of property is intended to be conveyed thereby, such as to agents of the true owner for collection, or any other purpose is a familiar principle, and has been often recognized. See Morris vs. Freeman, 1 Dall., 193. Thompson vs. Robertson, 4 Johns. R., 27.

2. Upon the facts proved, we hold, the plaintiff was in law entitled to recover. The note was payable to Ruan, as agent of the plaintiff, and he endorses it over to another officer also the agent of the plaintiff, and the instrument is in the possession and control of the plaintiff. No evidence is offered by the defendant of any interest in Ruan or Field, adverse to the plaintiff, in regard to this note, or the debt secured thereby.

Archer, for defendant in error.

DOUGLAS, Ch. J.

This is an action of assumpsit instituted by the plaintiff in error in the Circuit Court of Franklin County against the defendant in error. The declaration contains two counts. The first upon a promissory note, and the second on a bill of exchange.

The defendant put in a plea of non assumpsit, which was filed before the adoption of the new rules. The following bill of exceptions is set forth in the record, viz:

"Be it remembered, that on this day came the parties by their attorney, and by consent of the said parties, the questions of law and 264 fact in issue were submitted to the Court, without the intervention of a jury, and thereupon the plaintiff introduced in evidence the promissory note sued upon.

"St. Joseph, November 7, 1839.

$158 99-100. Thirty days after date I promise to pay to James Ruan, agent of the Southern Life and Trust Company or order one hundred and fifty-eight 98-100 dollars for value received.

"JOHN D. GRAY.

"Endorsed—Pay to the order of George Field, Esq., Pres't.

"JAMES RUAN, Agent."

The plaintiff's counsel having, at the trial, stricken out the special direction—pay to the order of George Field, Esq., Pres't—the said plaintiff also proved that James Ruan was at the date of said promissory note, the agent of the plaintiff, and that George Field was at the same time the President of the Southern Life Insurance and Trust Company, the plaintiff herein, to the admission of which evidence, as to George Field being President, the counsel for the defendant objected, and the plaintiff offered no other testimony. The Court considered the introduction of the evidence, as to the fact of George Field, Esq., being President of the plaintiff, as improper, the same is ruled out, and the Court proceeding to give judgment on the facts of the case, adjudges that the plaintiff is not in law entitled to recover. Therefore it is considered by the Court that the plaintiff take nothing by its writ, and that the defendant go thereof without day, and recover his costs by him, in and about his defence in this behalf expended, &c. To which opinion, ruling, and judgment of the Court, the plaintiff by its counsel excepts, and prays that his bill of exceptions may be signed, sealed and made a part of the record in this cause, which is done. Signed, &c.

The errors assigned are

First—The Court erred in ruling out the proof that George Field was President of the plaintiff.

Second—The Court below erred in adjudging that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

No question was raised upon the second count in the declaration, no evidence seems to have been offered upon it. In the case of Ward & May vs. Bull & Shine, 1 Florida Reports, 280, where a jury had been waived, as in this case, this Court said: "We must look at the finding of the Court, as though it had been the finding of a jury," and as upon a demurrer to evidence, such conclusions as a jury might justifiably draw, the Court ought to draw. Pawling, et al., vs. The United States, 2 Cond. Reps., 92.

So, in this case, the Court should have drawn the same conclusions from the evidence as the jury might justifiably have drawn. The main question in the case is, had the plaintiff a right to maintain its action upon the note sued upon, and what is the fair legal inference from the proof, as to the ownership of the note in question? It was payable to James Ruan, agent of the Southern Life and Trust Company. No notice seems to have been taken at the trial that the word Insurance was left out of the description of the company—no objection was there made, nor is any made here, on that account: we may therefore, we think, properly take the description as that of "The Southern Life Insurance and Trust Company." Are these words merely a descriptio personarum? If so, then the note was by its terms the property of the said James Ruan, and he would have been entitled to sue upon it, but if they are to be taken as words of substance, indicating that the note was taken by him as the agent of the Company, (whose agent the proof shows he then was) then the fair and legitimate inference is, that the note was the property of the Company, and it did not require any endorsement to enable it to sue upon it: for "if the instrument is not under seal, it seems to be the general principle that the party for whose sole benefit it was evidently made, may sue thereon in his own name, although the engagement be not directly to him." 1 Chitty's Pl., 4-5, and authorities there cited. In the case of the Trustees of Ministerial and School fund in Levant vs. Parks, et al., a note of hand payable to George Waugh, Treasurer of the Ministerial and School fund in Levant, or his successor in office, was held to be rightly sued in the name of the corporation of which George Waugh was treasurer. 1 Fairfield's Reps., 441 to 446. The State vs. Bans et al., 2 Fairfield's Reps., 474-475, was upon a promissory note in the words following, to wit: "For value received we jointly and severally promise James Irish, Land agent of Maine, to pay him or his order, one hundred and twenty-five dollars in three years, and interest annually. (Signed) James Bans, Ichabod Russell." Martin, Ch. Justice, said: We perceive no difference between this case and that of Irish vs. Webster, et al.,
5 Greenleaf, 171. In that case, the note was not negotiable; in the present, it is so. The principle ground is, that the land agent is the servant of the State, making contracts in behalf of the State. A note payable to such an agent, is in legal contemplation payable to the State. In Dugan, et al., Ex'rs., vs. the United States, 3 Wheat. Reps., 172, 4 Peter's Cond. Reps., 224 to 226, it was held, that where a bill of exchange was endorsed, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Treasurer of the United States, who received it in that capacity, and for account of the United States, and the bill had been purchased by the Secretary of the Treasury with money of the United States, and was afterwards endorsed by T. T. Tucker, as Treasurer of the United States, to Messrs. Wilhem and Jan Willink and N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst, and by them presented to the drawees for acceptance, and protested for non acceptance and non payment, and sent back by W. & S., to the Secretary of the Treasury, held that the endorsement to T. T. Tucker, Treasurer, &c., passed such an interest to the United States as enabled them to maintain an action on the bill against the first endorser. In Alston vs. Hartman, Treasurer, &c., 2d Alabama Reps., 699-701, it was held, a promissory note payable to the Treasurer of the Manual Labor Institute of Alabama, is a contract with the corporation, and no action can be maintained thereon in the name of the Treasurer, and Collier, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the Court, said: "Where a contract appears to have been made with a corporation, though agents are employed to effect it, and there be a written promise to pay the agents eo nomine, it has been held that the corporation must sue for the breach of such a contract, citing Gilmore vs. Pope, 5 Mass. Reps., 491. African Society vs. Varick, 13 Johns. Reps., 381. Penn. Reps., 115, and Bowin vs. Morris, 2 Taunt. Rep., 387.

And to the same effect is Arnold et al vs. Lyman, 17 Mass. R., 400 to 404. Porter vs. Yale College, 3 Conn. Reps., 59 to 63. In Ewing vs. Medlock, 5 Porter Reps., 82, a promise in writing was made to the treasurer of an unincorporated association of individuals, and it was held "the contract was not with the individual who might be treasurer, but with the association." James Ruan was proved to have been the agent of the plaintiff, when the note on which the first count in the declaration in this case was founded was made, and all the reasoning employed in these several cases goes to show that this suit is properly brought, unless there is something in the endorsement which prevents their application. If the note in question was at its inception the property of the plaintiff, (and we deem that the fair inference from the testimony,) it is difficult to perceive now the title to it was changed by its being endorsed to its President.

It is alleged as error that the Court ruled out improperly the evidence of the fact that George Field was President of the plaintiff, at the time when the endorsement of the note to him as such was made. If the view we have taken of this case be correct, it is not, perhaps, very material; but it seems to have been pertinent to the issue, and upon the whole, we think, should have been admitted. It would have helped to explain the transaction, and, taken in connection with other evidence, it might have had some weight; and it is a general rule, that the parties to a written agreement are not precluded from proving facts consistent with such-agreement, though not expressed in it." 3 Starkie Ev., 1047.

The situation and circumstances of the parties may be shown by parol evidence, for the purposes of aiding in the construction of the writing. 1 Phil. Ev., 417. That was the very purpose, it would seem, for which this testimony was offered, and, therefore, it could not properly be excluded. The position assumed by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, that the holder has a right to strike out the special endorsement on a note or bill of exchange, where no right of property was intended to be conveyed by it, such as to an agent of the true owner for collection, or for any other purpose, appears to be consonant to reason and justice, and well sustained by adjudged cases. In Morris vs. Freeman, 1 Dallas Reps., 192, the Court held that "the plaintiff in an action upon a bill of exchange, might strike out a special, as well as a general endorsement on the bill." And the same principle is asserted in Thompson vs. Robertson, 4 John. Reps., 26 to 31. The special endorsement having been stricken out, the note was left as it stood when it was first made, in effect the property of the plaintiff, or the property in it passed by the blank endorsement to the plaintiff, and in either case it might sue upon it.—A note endorsed in blank is like one payable to bearer, and passes by delivery, and the holder may constitute himself or any other person assignee of the bill. In the case of blank endorsements, possession is evidence of title. Thornton vs. Moody, 2 Fairfield's Reps., 256. 3 Kent's Com., 59, 60. 1st Kinnie's Comp., 80, 84, and authorities there cited.

This case comes within the rule laid down in the case of Ward & May vs. Bull & Shine—1 Florida Reps., 276—"that where mixed questions of law and fact are presented to the Court for its decision, no writ of error lies, unless the Court is called upon to decide questions of law, or such question of law necessarily arises out of the facts, and is distinctly presented to the Court upon them, so that the decision of the point of law will decide the merits of the case," and the decision of the Court is wrong.

Here, besides the rejection of the testimony, which, we think, should have been admitted, a question of law arises out of the facts of the case, as presented by this record, decisive of its merits; and upon that question, the decision of the Court below, according to our view of the matter, was wrong.

The judgment is, therefore, reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, in accordance with this opinion.

Per curiam.

NOTE—The Chief Justice said it might be proper for him to observe, that he had heretofore declined to try or decide contested cases, in which this company was a party, because some of his relatives held stock in it, although it is very doubtful how far this creates an interest in them—that stock being deemed valueless; but in this case, it is understood that the learned judge who decided it below doubts whether his ruling in it was right, and the counsel for the defendant in error declined arguing it, because he deemed that ruling wrong. Under these circumstances—there being no contest in it—there seemed to be no good reason to delay the case, by his adhering to that rule of conduct; and without him, there was not competent Court here to decide it.

269 JAMES M. HUNTER, ADMINISTRATOR OF A. R. S. HUNTER, vs RICHARD BRADFORD, ADMINISTRATOR OF LEIGH READ, DECEASED, ET AL.

HIRAM HUNTER AND RICHARD B. CARPENTER AND WIFE, vs. JULIA McBRIDE, EXECUTRIX, ROBERT B. HAUGHTON, RICHARD H. BRADFORD, ADMINISTRATOR, &C., AND JAMES M. HUNTER, IN HIS OWN RIGHT, AND AS ADMINISTRATOR OF A. R. S. HUNTER.

An answer asserting the ignorance of the defendant as to the truth of the allegations and charges of a bill, but averring that he does not believe them to be true, is not sufficient to warrant the dissolution of an injunction which has been granted as a proper auxiliary to the relief sought. Where the insolvency of an estate is charged in a bill, the answer of the administrator that he is ignorant of such insolvency is not a sufficient denial of the charge.

Courts draw a distinction as to claims for equitable interposition, between contracts executory and contracts executed. It is well settled, that where the purchaser takes a deed with warranty, and enters and remains in undisturbed possession of the land conveyed, (the purchase money having been paid,) if there is no fraud in the transaction, he cannot, before eviction, ask and obtain the aid of the Court of Equity, in order to have the contract rescinded, or the purchase money restored to him, on the ground of defect in the title. In such case, his remedy is at law upon the covenants in his deed of warranty.

But if the purchaser is in possession, under a mere agreement to convey and make title, as where a title bond has been given, and the vendor is not able to make a clear and perfect title, he has the right to resort to a Court of Equity to rescind the contract—to restrain the collection at law of the purchase money, and to obtain restitution of whatever sums have been paid by him on the faith of getting a title from the vendor.

In the case of an executed contract, where the conveyance has been made and accepted, Courts will interpose to rescind the contract, where it is rendered proper and necessary, by reason of the fraud or insolvency of the vendor.

On the 22d December, 1839, Leigh Read and Archibald R. S. Hunter entered into an agreement for the sale and purchase of land, negroes and other property, amounting to $27,500. On the 2d of January, 1840, Read executed a title bond for the land, conditioned to make title on the 1st of January, 1843. The land and negroes 270 sold to Hunter by Read were mortgaged to the Union Bank of Florida, by deed of mortgage bearing date September 3, 1839.

On the day of the sale, Hunter executed three promissory notes to Read for the sum of six thousand one hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six and two-third cents each, payable one, two, and three years after date.

At the time of the purchase, Hunter held an obligation of Joseph McBride, given by him on the 30th of January, 1838, on the occasion of his, McBride's, purchase from A. R. S. Hunter and James M. Hunter, and A. R. S. Hunter, guardian of William H., Hiram S. and Grace F. Hunter, minor heirs of Adam Hunter, late of the county of Gadsden, deceased, of "all the land, negroes, stock and every other thing or things upon or belonging to the plantation," owned by their father, the said Adam Hunter. In May, 1840, this obligation was transferred to Read by A. R. S. Hunter, one of the joint obligees, acting for himself and the other heirs of Adam Hunter, in part payment of the property purchased from Read, or as collateral security for the payment of the notes executed by him. A. R. S. Hunter and Leigh Read both died in the spring of 1841—but before their death, Hunter had paid large sums of money on the aforesaid purchase from Read.

In May, 1844, James M. Hunter filed his bill of complaint in the then Superior Court of Leon County, as administrator of A. R. S. Hunter, against Richard Bradford, administrator of Leigh Read, deceased, Julia McBride, executrix of Joseph McBride, deceased, and Robert B. Haughton, agent of Mrs. McBride—setting forth the aforesaid purchase, payments and transfer—the execution of notes for the purchase money by Hunter—the insolvency of the estate of Read, and its consequent inability to make a good title to the property sold by him in his life time to complainants' intestate—by removing the incumbrances thereon, consisting of the aforesaid mortgage to the Union Bank, to secure one hundred and twenty-seven shares of stock in that institution, and $8,466 of borrowed money, and praying that Bradford, the administrator of Read, be perpetually enjoined from collecting any further sums on the notes given by complainants' intestate, and that the said Julia McBride, and R. B. Haughton, her agent, be perpetually enjoined from paying any part of the obligation of Joseph McBride to the said Bradford.

In December, 1845, the complainant filed a supplemental bill, 271 stating that, since the filing of the first bill in 1844, Bradford, as administrator of Read, had recovered judgment against him, as administrator of A. R. S. Hunter, for the sum of $9,432 34-100, the balance due on the notes given by his intestate, and praying that the said Bradford be perpetually enjoined, for the reasons stated in the original bill, from collecting any part of said judgment. The injunction prayed for was granted on the 10th December, 1845—after which, Bradford filed his answer.

On the ninth day of June, 1847, Hiram Hunter and Richard B. Carpenter and wife, (Carpenter having intermarried with Grace F. G. Hunter, one of the heirs of Adam Hunter) filed their bill of complaint in Leon County Circuit Court against Julia McBride, executrix and sole heir of Joseph McBride, deceased, Robert B. Haughton, Richard R. Bradford, administrator of Leigh Read, James M. Hunter, in his own right, and also as administrator of his brother, Archibald R. S. Hunter—setting forth, that Grace and Hiram are two of the children of Adam Hunter, and as such, entitled to a distributive share of his estate—that in order to ascertain the share to which they were entitled, proceedings were instituted in the County Court of Gadsden County, which resulted in allotting to them certain specified portions of said estate on the 27th January, 1838—that at that time, they were minors, and that A. R. S. Hunter was their guardian, and continued to be such until his death, in the spring of 1841.

The bill then states the purchase by Joseph McBride, on the 30th of January, 1838, from A. R. S. Hunter, of the whole estate of Adam Hunter, including the shares allotted to complainants, and assigned to them as their separate and specific property, their guardian agreeing as specified in the McBride obligation, to pay them the prices at which said allotted shares were valued. The indebtedness of A. R. S. Hunter to Leigh Read is then set forth, and the delivery of the McBride obligation to the latter as collateral security for said indebtedness. The bill charges, that before the delivery of said obligation, a part of it had been paid to A. R. S. Hunter, and that still further payments have been made since that time, but that some six thousand dollars are still due and unpaid. That the obligation was due in equal portions to the heirs of Adam Hunter—that the amounts paid exceed the shares of Archibald, James M. and William, and that the balance will not be sufficient to pay the shares of complain- 272 ants who allege that they have never received any part of the same. The estate of Read is alleged to be insolvent, and if so, that the estate of Archibald R. S. Hunter will be insolvent also. Complainants therefore, allege, that the balance due on the McBride obligation ought to be paid to them, and that Bradford and James M. Hunter ought to be enjoined from collecting or receiving any part of it. The prayer of the bill is in accordance with and framed upon this statement of facts.

The answers filed by all the defendants in these cases, (which were consolidated and tried together,) and the exhibits and proofs in the two cases, do not present a different state of facts, or vary materially the facts presented and the case stated in the bills of complainants. The questions raised and presented for adjudication are stated in the opinion of the Court.

On the 29th July, 1847, complainants moved the Court for an interlocutory decree against Julia F. McBride and Robert B. Haughton, who admit in their answers that they are indebted upon the obligation mentioned in the pleadings in the sum of $3957 and 25-100 with interest thereon since the first day of May, 1838. But inasmuch as Richard H. Bradford claims the fund as belonging to the estate of Read: It was therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed, that Julia F. McBride, executrix and sole heir of Joseph McBride, and Robert B. Haughton, pay to the clerk of the Court, as receiver, the said debt and interest, on or before the first day of April, 1848. This decree was made without prejudice to the rights or claims of the parties claiming the fund, and the money so paid to the clerk, as receiver, was to remain in his hands subject to the further order of the Court.

On the 20th of January, 1849, it was ordered, adjudged and decreed, in the Court below, that the bill of complaint of Carpenter and wife, and Hiram S. Hunter, be dismissed, and the judgment obtained against Hunter's administrator by Read's administrator, was referred to the master to calculate and ascertain the amount actually due upon said judgment in accordance with directions given by the Court as to the manner in which such calculation was to be made, and the balance due to be ascertained. And on the 22d January, 1849, the report of the master having been made and confirmed, it was ordered, adjudged and decreed, (the parties consenting that a final decree may 273 be rendered at this time) that the injunction heretofore granted in this cause, restraining Richard H. Bradford from proceeding at law upon the judgment quando acciderent, rendered against James M. Hunter, administrator of A. R. S. Hunter, in favor of said Bradford as administrator of Leigh Read, deceased, in Leon Superior Court on the 27th day of February, 1845, for $9432 34-100, and restraining said Bradford from proceeding to receive or collect any sum of money from the estate of Joseph McBride, still due from said estate upon the obligation mentioned in the pleadings as having been transferred to Leigh Read by A. R. S. Hunter, be dissolved, and the bill dismissed—and that each of the parties pay their own costs.

Hunter, Administrator, vs. Bradford, Administrator.—Argument of Counsel.

From the decree rendered in these cases, the complainants appealed.

Walker argued the cause for appellants.

Stephens & Baker, for appellees, argued and maintained at great length the following propositions:

This is the ordinary case of a purchaser seeking relief upon the ground of an outstanding incumbrance. The incumbrance consists of a mortgage in favor of the Union Bank of Florida, evidenced by deed duly recorded, of which the complainants' intestate not only had constructive but actual notice.

1. It is well settled that, when the purchaser with full knowledge that the title is defective, enters upon the purchase, takes possession of the property, binds himself to pay the purchase money by a given day, and takes the usual covenants for title, a Court of equity will afford no relief. 2 Kent. Com., 471. 2 John. Ch., 519. 1 John. Ch., 213. 1 A. K. Marsh, 288. 7 Smedes and Marsh, 256.

2. There is neither fraud, concealment, or eviction alleged in the bill. In 2 John. Ch., 523, Ch. Kent says: "I kr w of no case in which this Court has relieved a purchaser where there was no fraud and no eviction." In Bumpus vs. Platner, 1 John. Ch., 213, the same Chancellor says: "It may be safely said that there is no case of relief on this ground (failure of consideration) after the agreement is executed, when the possession has passed and continued without any eviction at law under a paramount title. A purchaser buying with full knowledge of the defect in the title, will not, for that defect, be relieved in equity." 3 A. K. Marsh, 288. See also, Royster vs. Shackleford, 5 Litt.. 299. 2 Edwards, 37.

274 "The principle is fully established, that in cases free from fraud, a purchaser of land who is in possession cannot have relief in Chancery against his contract to pay on the mere ground of a defect of title without previous eviction." Vick vs. Perry, et al., 7 Smedes & Marsh., 268. Anderson vs. Lincoln, 5 How., 284.

3. When the purchase money became due, the vendee should have tendered the same to the vendor and demanded the title deeds. If the vendor refused to make titles, the vendee might have filed his bill in equity asking a specific performance, and the Court would have compelled the vendor to make titles or release the purchaser from the contract.

4. If it should be contended that the vendor in this case was bound by his contract to make title on the 1st January, 1843, that the day had passed when the bill of complaint was filed, and no title made, we say that although the vendor has not a good title, when the land according to the terms of the contract ought to be conveyed, yet if he can at any time before final decree, make a good title, the Court will compel a specific performance. If the purchaser had asked a specific performance and tendered the purchase money, or paid it into Court, a title could have been procured before final decree. Wynne vs. Morgan, 7 Ves., 403. Mortlock vs. Bullock, 10 Ves., 315. Langford vs. Pitt, 2 P. Wms., 629, 630. Coffin vs. Cooper, 14 Ves., 205. Hepburn vs. Auld, 5 Cranch, 262. Same vs. Dunlap, et al., 1 Wheat, 179. Cooper vs. Dennis, 1 Ves., 565, note 6.

Time, in this case, was not of the essence of the contract. The vendee has waived his right to insist upon relief upon this ground by not making the objection promptly on the day. Waters vs. Travis, 9 John., 46. Seaton vs. Slade, 7 Ves., 265, note 7. Wynne vs. Morgan, 7 Ves., 203. Fordyce vs. Ford, 4 Br. Ch., 371. Sugden on Vend., 281 to 288. 2 Story E., 776. Marquis of Hertford vs. Bowe, 5 Ves., 718, note a. Rogers vs. Saunders, 16 Maine R., 99. Brasier vs. Gratz, 6 Wheat., 207. Garnet vs. Macon, 6 Call, 308. Runnels vs. Jackson, 1 How. Miss., R., 358.

5. The defendant, in his answer, offers to make title whenever the complainant will comply with the covenants of his intestate. These covenants (as the proof shows) were all violated; he has therefore no right to complain. 2 Story Eq., 771. 4 Rand., 481. 7 Conn., 53. 6 Conn., 13.

6. There was no eviction at the time the bill was filed. The 275 complainant then, according to the principles asserted in the cases cited, has no claim to the aid of a Court of equity, but must be left to the remedy which he elected for himself—the covenants of the deed.

7. If it be contended that, although neither fraud, concealment, or eviction be alleged in the bill, yet that an eviction by the Union Bank is proved by an exhibit in the cause—then we insist that an eviction in 1848 cannot be used for the purpose of helping out the case made by the bill in 1844. At the date of the bill, the complainant was in the undisturbed possession of the property.

8. The proof shows that only a part of the property purchased by Hunter of Read was sold by the bank in 1848, viz: the land and a part of the negroes. The complainant retains possession of the balance.

9. It is by no means clear that Archibald Hunter owned any of the property (except the land) when it was sold by the bank. It appears from the deposition of J. M. Hunter, that he had purchased the whole of the Read property of his brother by verbal contract—land, negroes, &c. Pages 32 and 33 of printed record The contract, not being reduced to writing, of course passed no title to the land; but the contract being upon sufficient consideration, and possession being delivered, the title to the personal property passed to the purchaser. The consideration is stated to be the payment of certain debts assumed by James for Archibald—page 33—and the payment to the heirs of what was due them—page 32. He bought subject to the bank incumbrance—pages 34, 35. The contract was made in March, 1841, and he was in possession in 1847. If James Hunter failed to pay the heirs what was due to them or the other debts which he had assumed, this is an affair to be settled between himself and the estate of Archibald Hunter. It is sufficient for us to show that he made the purchase. It devolves upon him to prove that he was released from his contract by Archibald Hunter in his life time. If James M. Hunter purchased the negroes and personal chattels of Archibald Hunter for a consideration, which the latter deemed adequate, then Archibald Hunter could not resist the payment to Read's estate, upon the ground of "failure of consideration."

10. Is Archibald Hunter's administrator entitled to recover the balance due on the McBride obligation? We insist that he is not, unless he has made such a case by his bill as would entitle a pur- 276 chaser to recover back the purchase money. The obligation was transferred to Read by Archibald Hunter, in part payment of the property purchased. He cannot retain the property, and recover back the purchase money. The proof shows that he was in possession when his bill was filed—he neither asks for a title, offers to pay for one, nor does he offer to surrender the property.

11. Are the complainants, Hiram Hunter and Carpenter and wife, entitled to recover the balance due on the McBride obligation? It appears from the record, that it was transferred by Archibald Hunter to Leigh Read, in part payment of property purchased by said Hunter, for the joint benefit of himself and the minor heirs of Adam Hunter, Hiram and Mrs. Carpenter being two of them. 7 John. Ch., 155, and cases cited.

12. The transfer was made in good faith by the guardian, and for the benefit of the wards. There is no fraud alleged or pretended. The wards, after they became of age in 1842, ratified the act of their guardian in making sale of their property in Gadsden, by giving bills of sale to the purchaser—and they ratified the act of their guardian in making the transfer of this obligation by more than five years of acquiescence after full age, with a perfect knowledge that the transfer had been made, and of the purpose for which it was made.

"Minors, when they attain full age, must express their dissent to the act of their guardian within reasonable time." 2 Kent's Com., 195, 6. 6 Con., 506. 2 Kent's Com., 237. 11 John., 539. 14 John., 124. 8 Taunton, 35, 39. "Assent of the minors may be inferred from circumstances, without an express act of ratification." See authorities above cited.

M. A. Long, for appellants:

The argument on the other side is totally irrelevant to the case stated in the bill. The object of the bill is not to rescind the contract, nor to have a specific performance thereof. The contract cannot be rescinded, and both parties put in statu quo, because Read is dead and wholly insolvent, and, therefore, cannot return to Hunter the thirteen thousand dollars paid towards the purchase money. A specific performance cannot be had, because Read is dead and 277 wholly insolvent, and therefore cannot remove the bank incumbrance, so as to be able to make a good title. The facts stated in the bill and admitted in the answer show this fully.

On the contrary, the bill prays that the payment of the balance of the purchase money be perpetually enjoined, because Read's estate can neither make title to the property sold, nor answer in damages for failure therein. The existing incumbrance on the property, at the filing of the bill, and the death and total insolvency of Read, make this naturally, and, therefore, legally certain. Therefore, Hunter's recourse at law, upon the covenants of warranty as to the slaves, and for title to the land, was and is wholly worthless. This is the ground upon which relief in equity is claimed. The proof shows that what the bill alleged would actually happen, without the possibility of doubt, has, since the filing of the bill, actually occurred—the land and negroes having been sold under the bank incumbrance. The human mind can scarcely conceive of a case of more flagrant injustice than to allow Read's estate to receive the balance of the purchase money from Hunter's estate, when it is admitted that Hunter's estate has lost the property, and can never collect any damages at law therefor, because of the hopeless insolvency of Read's estate. This proposition is too self-evident to be capable of being made more obvious by argument. The accidental and unforeseen death and insolvency of Read, the vendor, will, unless relieved against, work an injury to Hunter's estate. This is one of the most familiar heads of equity jurisprudence. Story's Eq., 93.

"It may, therefore, be truly said, that the concurrent jurisdiction of equity extends to all cases of legal rights, where, under the circumstances, there is not a plain, adequate and complete remedy at law:" says Mr. Justice Story, 1 Con. 94.

Hunter's remedy at law, upon his covenants, upon which it is said he must wholly rely, is not "complete," because it is admitted that any judgment for damages which he may recover, can never be paid, and, therefore, is wholly "inadequate" to compensate him for the loss of the property which he purchased.

On the same page, (994,) Mr. Story says: "By the term accident is here intended, not merely inevitable casualty, or the act of Providence, or what is technically called vis major, or irresistible force; but such unforeseen events, misfortunes, losses, acts or omissions, 278 as are not the result of any negligence or misconduct in the party." And on page 115, (sec. 100,) the same author, speaking of cases of accident, says, "they all proceed upon the same common foundation, that there is no adequate or complete remedy at law under all the circumstances—that the party has rights which ought to be protected and enforced; or will sustain injury, loss, or detriment, which it would be inevitable to throw upon him." The application of this principle to the case at bar, is so plain that comment would seem useless. Hunter buys land and negroes on credit for $27,500. Of this sum, he is to pay nine thousand in cash notes, to be executed by Joseph McBride's executors and others—and for $18,500, he executes three promissory notes, payable one, two and three years from date. For the negroes, he takes a bill of sale, with warranty of title; and for the land, a bond for title, to be made prior to the falling due of the last of the said purchase money notes. The covenants are thus made independent, by fixing different times for the performance by each party of his part of the contract. Hunter pays upwards of thirteen thousand dollars in cash upon the notes, before that sum is due upon them, and delivers to Read an obligation on the estate of McBride for a part of the cash notes. At this point of time, both Read and Hunter suddenly die. Read's administrator brings suit upon the notes, and puts Hunter's administrator to prove all payments made thereon. This he does, to the extent of $13,040, or more, and a judgment, quando acciderint, is rendered against him for the balance, near ten thousand dollars. It then becomes manifest that Read's estate is insolvent, and of course can never become otherwise. Hunter's administrator finds that the property in possession of his intestate is mortgaged to the bank, and subject to be sold upon a stock note judgment of Read. What was his duty in the premises? Ought he to have paid the judgment for the balance of the purchase money and the cash notes? We say, certainly not, because his remedy over upon the accounts was wholly inadequate—the estate of Read being insolvent, and obliged ever to remain so. If the administrator of this insolvent estate was permitted to collect from Hunter's estate the amount of the judgment against it, and from the McBride estate the amount of the cash notes, it was obvious that Hunter's estate would suffer irreparable injury thereby. To prevent this mischief, he has applied to a Court of Equity. If the mischief had only been probable, and not certain, as in this case, he 279 would have had this right.

Speaking of bills quia timet, Mr. Story says: "They are ordinarily applied to prevent wrongs or anticipated mischief, and not merely to redress them when done. The party seeks the aid of a Court of equity because he fears (quia timet) some future probable injury to his rights or interests; and not because an injury has already accrued, which requires any compensation or other relief. The manner in which this aid is given by Courts of equity, is, of course, dependent upon circumstances. They interfere, sometimes, by the appointment of a receiver to receive rents or other income; sometimes by an order to pay a pecuniary fund into Court, and sometimes by the mere issuing of an injunction; thus adapting the relief to the precise nature of the particular case, and the remedial justice required by it." 2 Story's Eq., 130, and authorities there cited.

It will be seen from the record, (page 12,) that on the 10th of December, 1845, an injunction was granted as to the judgment, and a receiver appointed to collect and pay into Court the money due from the McBride estate, in literal conformity to the above authority.

It will also be further apparent from the evidence in the record, that every fact stated in the bill, as the ground for granting this relief, has been fully proven, without the least conflict of evidence as to any one fact; and the Court below would, doubtless, have rendered a final decree for complainant, but for what it considered evidence of other facts, offered by way of confession and avoidance.

Upon this point, I think a few words will make the error of the Court below quite glaring.

Bradford offered the evidence of Bembry to prove that Read was not bound to remove the Bank incumbrance, incurred by the stock mortgages, bond and note executed by Read; but that Hunter was, by the contract, bound to remove this incumbrance. Now, we say, that this proof was wholly inadmissible, could it have been made, because it was in direct contradiction of the written contract itself. That written contract is in the record, and will be found just as I have hereinbefore stated the same, and I trust that there can be no reason at this day to hunt up authorities to prove that written contracts, under seal, may not be contradicted, enlarged, or in any manner altered by parol evidence. My colleague has sufficiently dwelt upon this point.

But when the evidence of Bembry is examined, it will be found 280 that he does not pretend that any body told him, even, that by the original contract, Hunter was to assume and pay the Bank insumbrance. He states the contrary positively, and that on the Tuesday before Read's death, near a year and a half after the date of the contract, Hunter told him that he had then agreed upon a settlement with Read, which made them about even, whereby Hunter was to assume the payment of the Bank debt, and Read was to assign his stock to Hunter. Now, both parties died without executing this verbal agreement, if any such was made, and Read's administrator, instead of treating the matter as concluded, refused at all times to convey the stock, and sued upon the purchase money notes. The Court below was not justified therefore, in saying that Hunter was bound to remove the Bank incumbrance, and in decreeing accordingly. There was no pretence for this. It was nothing less than enforcing an unexecuted parol agreement, made without any consideration, in favor of a party who had himself totally failed to comply with the same, and in his answer swears that, although requested, had continued to refuse to do so, up to the moment of trial. The decree, as will be seen on pages 50 and 51 of the record, undertakes to adjust the judgment at law, by a new and independent calculation, to be made by the clerk and master. This was neither prayed for in the bill or answer. The calculation is accurately made by the clerk, according to the data prescribed by the decree, and instead of diminishing the judgment, would have increased it near one thousand dollars. This was a result unexpected to the Court, it is obvious from the latter part of the first paragraph of the decree, in which it is stated that "the balance so found due by the aforesaid calculations, shall be deducted from the aforesaid judgment, and the balance, after such deduction, will be the true amount due by Hunter's estate to Read's estate, and all the rest of said judgment, except said balance, shall be perpetually enjoined."

Now, I respectfully submit that the Court had no authority to attempt to re-adjust this judgment. It was for the true amount, according to the showing of both parties, and the only question was, whether it was against equity and good conscience, under the circumstances, to collect the same. But because the Court committed the error of hearing parol proof to contradict a written contract under 281 seal, and no such evidence appearing, it seized upon parol proof of a subsequent unexecuted agreement, a nudum pactum, and fell into the further error of setting up the same, in lieu of the original valid contract, under which the defendant had himself acted, by suing upon the purchase money notes.

Hunter, Administrator, vs. Bradford, Administrator.—Argument of Counsel.

It is plain that this was the point upon which the decision of the Court below turned. For it is manifest that if the judgment at law should have been enjoined, for the causes stated in the bill, namely, the death and insolvency of Read, that the McBride obligation should have also been delivered up. But if Hunter was bound to remove the Bank incumbrance—for that is the whole question—then he had no right to complain that Read had failed to do so, and being dead and insolvent, that damages could not be recovered therefor. That such was not the contract, is plain from all the proof, and is pre-supposed by resorting to parol evidence of the subsequent unexecuted agreement, spoken of by Bembry, the witness.

I have not taken the trouble to examine all the books referred to in the brief on the other side, on the various questions therein mooted. But in no solitary case cited, which I have been able to examine, is there one word militating in any degree against the positions which I have here assumed and quoted from Story. The counsel seem to have fallen into the error of overlooking the facts of the case, and thus raising questions which are not here involved.

I have never seen a case in which it was denied that where a party was remitted to his remedy on his covenants of warranty, by the general rules, that the insolvency of the vendor did not constitute a good reason for enjoining the collection of the purchase money. The thing is too obvious for argument. Cases may sometimes be found where the question of fact—of whether the vendor is so insolvent as to render the remedy on the covenants worthless—has been raised. Such is the case in Mississippi, reported in 5 Smedes & Marshall's Rep. There the injunction was refused because the allegation of insolvency was disproved by the evidence. But this principle was only necessary in this case so far as the covenant of warranty as to the slaves was concerned. For it is said by the Supreme Court of Tennessee, in the case of Buchanan vs. Slade, 8 Hump., 518, 19, "Where the purchaser has taken a deed with covenant of general warranty, under which he has entered and remains in the undistur-282 bed possession of the land conveyed to him, if there be no fraud in the transaction, he cannot before eviction, on the mere ground of defect in title, claim relief in equity, either against the payment of the purchase money, or to have the contract rescinded, or restitution of the purchase money. In such cases, he must seek his remedy at law, upon the covenant of warranty in his deed," citing 3 Hump., 16. 2 John. Ch. Rep., 519. 13 Ves., 114.

And because we knew this to be the law as to the slaves, to which we had a bill of sale with warranty, and the quiet possession, we have not come into equity on the mere ground of defect of title, but have shown, beyond dispute, that if we do not seek our remedy at law upon the covenant of warranty on the deed, that our search will be fruitless—our remedy will be incomplete and inadequate, because we cannot collect the judgment which may be awarded for breach of the warranty.

The same Court, in the same cause, lay down the doctrine as well established, that where title has not been made to land, the payment of the purchase money may be resisted in equity, upon the ground of mere defect of title. Immediately after the passage above quoted, the Court proceed to say: "But it is otherwise where the purchase money has not been paid and the title made. If the purchaser is in possession under a mere equitable title, as a title bond or covenant to convey, he has a clear and well established right in equity to resist the payment of the purchase money, or to have the contract rescinded and the purchase money advanced refunded to him, on the ground of defect of title in the vendor. He will not be required to complete the purchase, or to accept a conveyanec, unless a title can be made according to his contract." &c., citing 11 John. Rep., 525. 4 Mad. Ch. Rep., 122. 2 Sim., 29.

This doctrine is also fully laid down in Sugden's Law of Vendors, 345, in these words:—"Where an incumbrance is discovered previously to the execution of the conveyance, and payment of the purchase money, the vendor must discharge it, whether he has or has not agreed to covenant against incumbrances, before he can compel payment of the purchase money"—citing anon. 2 Free., 106.—Vane vs. Lord Barnard, Gilb. Eq., 6. Sergeant Maynard's case, 2 Freeman, 1. 1 Vesey, 88. 2 Vesey, 394. 2 Vesey, Junior, 441, and 4 Bro. C. C. Reports, 394.

If it should be said that Hunter had the use of the cultivated part 283 of the land, which the proof shows to have been less than half, there having been nine hundred and forty acres in all, and the use of the negroes, about one-half being capable of labor, and there being twenty in all, from the date of the contract, (2d January, 1840,) until they were sold for Read's debts by the sheriff, 1st December, 1847, a period of near seven years, for which compensation ought to be given, we have an answer which is deemed very satisfactory. That answer is, that Read had upwards of thirteen thousand dollars in cash from Hunter for nearly that whole period, as well as the three years which have elapsed since—say nine years. The simple interest on this sum would amount to about ten thousand dollars—making in all about $23,000 received by Read—a sum equal to about $3,300 per annum.

That we should be in earnest in resisting the payment of the balance claimed of nearly twenty thousand dollars, under these circumstances, as grievous and unjust in the highest possible degree, cannot, we submit, be a matter of wonder.

If the foregoing view of this subject be correct, we need add nothing in relation to the claim of Hiram Hunter and his sister, Mrs. Carpenter, to the money due from the McBride estate, except that it should be decreed to them, instead of James M. Hunter, the administrator of their guardian, Archibald R. S. Hunter. But we will simply on this point call the attention of the Court to two important facts in the record, which must be decisive of the question in their favor, whatever may be the result as between the two estates, namely, those of Read, and Hunter.

No money was demandable from the McBride estate, on account of the shares of Hiram and Grace of the property sold by the heirs of Hunter, until after the death of both Read and Hunter, or until they came of age and made bills of sale, namely, on the first of January, 1842. The agreement (page 20) says, "and the said McBride binds himself in the sum of twenty thousand dollars to give, or cause to be given, the above described notes, whenever the parties aforesaid shall make, or cause to be made to him, good and sufficient titles and bills of sale for the before described property."

From this it is plain that Read acquired no right to the price of the shares of Hiram and Grace by any transfer of the obligation to him, if any such was made; and if he otherwise would, (which we deny,) 284 for the reasons stated in the argument of my colleague, there was no obligation as to these shares, until that was created by the act of the parties—consequently, there was none to transfer.

Another fact is, that both Hiram and Grace were infants when Read got possession of this obligation, and were, therefore, incapable of agreeing to its transfer by their brother for his debts, if they had attempted to do so. They were infants at the death of their guardian. The only evidence on the point is that of James M. Hunter, who states that he did not know when the McBride obligation was passed to Read, and that neither Hiram nor Grace knew the fact until long afterwards. See his deposition, pages 35, 36, 37.

I contend, in conclusion, that the decree in this case should be reversed, and this Court, proceeding to render such decree as the Court below should have done, do now, by decree, perpetually enjoin the enforcement of the judgment quando against the administrator of Hunters estate, and order the judgment, confessed by Mrs. McBride and Robert B. Haughton, to be paid in equal portions to Hiram S. Hunter and to Richard B. Carpenter and wife, and that defendant, Bradford, pay all the costs of this cause.

HAWKINS, J.

We will take up the cases in the order in which they stand.

First. The question raised by the pleadings is this—Is James M. Hunter, the administrator of his brother, Archibald R. S. Hunter, entitled to equitable relief from a Court of Chancery under the circumstances of this case? It must be borne in mind, that this is not a bill for specific performance or the rescission of the contract. In the first instance, the party asking such specific performance "must show that he has been in no default in not having performed the agreements, and that he has taken all proper steps towards the performance of his part." 2 Story's Equity, 81. Nor does he ask a recission of the contract, but only asks an injunction against the collection of any further sum due upon the judgment obtained at law against James M. Hunter, administrator, on the promissory notes given by Archibald Hunter in his life time, to Leigh Read. It will be seen by reference to the statement of the case, that these notes were given to secure the payment for the land and negroes purchasd by A. R. S. Hunter from Read.

285 The bill in this case charges, that there are heavy incumbrances upon the land, that is to say, a mortgage executed by Leigh Read, on the 3d September, 1839, to the Union Bank of Florida, to secure one hundred and twenty-seven shares of stock, amounting to $12,700 and $8,468 borrowed money, for which he gave what is usually known as a stock note.

The bill further charges, that the estate of Read is hopelessly insolvent, and alleges that unless relief is had in a Court of equity, he will be remediless, as the resort to the covenants in his bond by action at law, would be futile and nugatory. The supplemental bill further states, that on the 27th of February, 1845, a judgment was obtained against James M. Hunter, administrator, upon these promissory notes for $9,432 34; and it is to restrain the collection of this money that the bills are filed.

The answer denies that there is any other incumbrance upon the land sold by Read to Hunter than the mortgage given to secure the one hundred and twenty-seven shares of stock, and as to the insolvency of Read's estate, declares that it "cannot admit or deny it," and cannot say whether the estate is solvent or insolvent, owing to circumstances which are set forth. The answer further asserts that at the time of the sale of Read to Hunter, he, Hunter, had full knowledge of the incumbrances, was bound to this knowledge, and that he must seek his redress at law upon the covenants in his bond for title.

As to the answer of Bradford, in relation to the insolvency, we do not deem it a denial of the charge of insolvency contained in the bill. In Apthorpe vs. Comstock, Hopkins' Chancery Reports, 148, the Court say: "Where a defendant thus states his ignorance of the principal allegations of the bill, and merely asserts that while he is ignorant he does not believe them to be true, such an answer can hardly be deemed a sufficient denial of the facts alleged in the bill to dissolve an injunction issued as proper auxiliary to the relief sought." The case is like that of Roberts vs. Anderson, 2 John. Ch. H., 204, in which the Court continued an injunction after a similar answer. So, too, Chancellor Kent uses this language: "With respect to the sufficiency of the answer, the general rule is, that to so much of the bill as is material and necessary for the defendant to answer, he must speak directly, without evasion, and not by way of negative pregnant.
286 He must not answer the charges merely literally, but he must confess or traverse the substance of each charge positively and with certainty, and particular precise charges must be answered particularly and precisely, and not in a general manner, even though a general answer may amount to a full denial of the charges." "Indeed," as Lord Eldron observes, "the policy of the pleadings in this Court is, that a general denial is not enough, but that there must be an answer to the sifting inquiries upon the matter charged. If a fact be charged which is in the defendant's own knowledge, he must answer positively and not to his remembrance or belief, and as to facts not within his knowledge, he must answer as to his information or belief and not to his information or hear say merely, without stating his belief one way or the other." 1 Harr. Ch. R., 302. Mitford, 246, 247. Cooper's Eq. Pl., 313, 314. 1 John. Ch. Rep., 107, Woods vs. Merrell. In Ward vs. Vanbokkelin, 1 Paige R., 100, it is laid down, that an injunction on coming in of the answer, will not be dissolved, unless the defendants deny all the equity of the bill.

Governed by thees principles, we must think that the answer of Bradford is not a denial of the allegation in the bill as to the insolvency of Read. Being the administrator of his estate, he could certainly have formed some estimate, some idea as to the solvency or insolvency of the estate. And the facts as to this question being presumed to be peculiarly within his knowledge, his answer should have been explicit, and not being so, must be regarded as an admission of the charge of insolvency. This question, as will be seen, is of importance in the consideration of the case at bar. It is contended that the complainant in this case, is not entitled to relief, because his intestate bought with knowledge of the incumbrance upon the property, took possession of it, and that there has been no eviction and that his remedy must be upon his covenants for title. There can be no doubt as to the correctness of this as a general principle, in cases where a deed has been given, and the contract executed. In Abbott vs. Allen, 2 John. Ch. R., 519, it was decided that a purchaser of land who has paid part of the purchase money and gives a bond and mortgage for the residue, and is in the undisturbed possession, will not be relieved against the payment of the bond or proceeding on the mortgage on the mere ground of defect of title, there being no allegation of fraud in the sale, nor any eviction, but must seek his remedy at law upon the covenants in the deed. This decision is in 287 accordance with the case of N. J. & S. Bumpus vs. Platner, et al., 1 John. Ch. R., 213, and many other cases. Courts draw a distinction as to claims for equitable interposition between contracts executed and executory contracts, a distinction, we think, founded upon good sense and justice. We will cite some of them, giving the language of the Judges pronouncing the decisions. In the case of Buchanan vs. Slade, 8 Humphreys, 518, the Court say: "Where the purchaser has taken a deed with covenant or general warranty, under which he has entered, and remains in undisturbed possession of the land conveyed to him, if there be no fraud in the transaction, he cannot, before eviction, on the mere ground of defect of title, obtain relief in equity, or have the contract rescinded, or restitution of the purchase money. In such case, he must seek a remedy upon the covenant of warranty in his deed. But it is otherwise when the purchase money has not been paid and title made." If the purchaser is in possession under a mere equitable title, as a title bond, or covenant to convey, he has a clear and well established right in equity to resist the payment of the purchase money, or to have the contract rescinded, and to have the purchase money advanced, refunded to him on the ground of defect of title in the vendor. He will not be required to complete the purchase or accept a conveyance, unless a title can be made according to the contract." So, in a case reported in Monroe, 202, it is said "A vendee will not be compelled to accept a conveyance under an executory contract, until the vendor exhibits a regularly deduced title, free from incumbrances, and apparently sufficient to assure the estate according to the contract. But a vendee who has accepted a deed and the possession with a covenant of warranty is presumed to have inspected the evidences of title and to have been satisfied with assurances, and to have received the title papers."

The case at bar is one entirely executory in its character. It is an agreement to convey, and not a conveyance as to the real estate. In 5 Wendell, 29, Jackson vs. Moncrief, it is laid down that, although the instrument contains words of present purchase and sale, yet those words must be construed in reference to the whole instrument; and if further conveyances were to be made, it would be an agreement to convey, and not a conveyance—and until these conveyances were made, the agreement was inchoate. The contract in 288
this case being executory, we see no good cause why a Court of Equity should not interfere to restrain the further collection of the purchase money, for which judgment is had at law, when it is very clear that the covenants entered into by the vendor cannot be complied with, although the incumbrance was known by the vendee to exist. Yet if the contract was to the effect that the vendor should make good and lawful rights, the Courts will not compel him to accept a defective title in the teeth of his covenants. If the rule were otherwise, no course would be open to a vendee, who desires to secure himself against known defects. Jackson vs. Ligon, 3 Leigh, 161. 3d Munford, 68. And further, that, although the day of payment may have arrived, a vendee is not bound to part with the purchase money, unless a title is made or tendered, according to the terms of the contract. 4 Mun., 12.

The first of these propositions is certainly not in accordance with the more rigid rules of the English Courts, in which it is held that possession by the vendee is equivalent to a waiver of any objection to any incumbrance which may exist; but without positively adopting the rules of the Virginia cases, we must say they are based on justice and propriety. A person entering into an agreement for a purchase of land, knowing of an incumbrance, feels assured, that when he takes a bond from the vendor to make him a perfect title, on the payment of the purchase money, that he will be protected, in the language of Judge Tucker, "against known, as well as unknown incumbrances." Jackson vs. Ligon, case before cited.

But resting the case upon the principle that the party in the present instance must seek his redress at law, upon the covenants in his bond—in that redress adequate, or complete? The record, on the contrary, shows that, owing to the insolvency of the estate of Read, no redress whatever could be effected by a suit upon the title bond; besides, supposing that the administrator of Hunter was now to pay the balance of the purchase money to the estate of Read, why compel him to seek his redress at law, and put him to this circuity of action, where a Court of competent powers can give him direct redress, should he present a proper case.

In relation to the question, whether the insolvency of the vendor is a good ground for an appeal to the equity side of the Court, we quote the following language used by the Court in the case of Vance vs. House's heirs, 7 Munroe, 541; and while we give the quotation our decided approbation, it will be observed that it was in case of an executed, and not executory contract. "But passing from this preliminary suggestion, we would proceed to remark upon the merits of the controversy, that this is the case of an executed contract, where the conveyance has been made and accepted, with warranty of title, and possession delivered and uninterruptedly enjoyed, without eviction or molestation. In such a case, a bill for the dissolution of the contract cannot be sustained, and the payment of the consideration enjoined, except in case of fraud, insolvency, or non-residency of the vendor, and a palpable and threatening danger of immediate or ultimate loss, without legal remedy, by reason of the defects of the title conveyed, and the inability of the vendee to protect himself against eviction under it. And to sustain such a bill, after the vendee has accepted the conveyance, the onus lies upon him to establish, to the satisfaction of the Chancellor, that the defect of title and imminent danger of eviction and loss exists."

There had been an injunction granted in this case, but the bill was dismissed, because it contained no allegation of fraud, insolvency, or non-residency. In Morrison's administrator, vs. Backwith, 4 Munroe, an injunction was granted, upon showing the insolvency of the vendor. Hieronymous vs. Hicks, 3 J. J. Marshall, 701. 6 Munroe, 232. 1 Dana, 305.

In the case of Vick vs. Percy, et al., 7 Smedes & Marshall, the Court hold the principle as laid down by Chancellor Kent, in the case of Abbott vs. Allen, 2 John. Ch. R., 519, but it remarks, "that the only two grounds alleged for the interposition of equity are fraud and insolvency of the defendant. These are denied by the answer, and there is no proof to establish either. The complainant being in possession, under a deed with warranty, with no fraud made manifest, and with nothing to show that the covenanter is not able to pay any damages that may be recovered against him, has no right to call his vendor into a Court of Equity to litigate an adverse title—he must rely on his covenants, if he should be evicted." This Court here virtually admits that insolvency would be a cause for equitable interference. In Hunter vs. O'Neil, 12 Ala. Rep., 37, the Court lays down the following propositions: "An obligation to make a deed to 290 certain lands, when the price contracted for is paid, is in law a covenant to make a good title, when the condition is performed by the purchaser. When the vendor entering into such a contract, becomes insolvent before the price is paid, and the purchaser shows an outstanding incumbrance created by the vendor, he will be entitled to relief in a Court of Equity but unless the money is actually tendered, upon condition that a title is made, the only relief is to enjoin the vendor from proceeding for the price, until he gives indemnity against the outstanding incumbrance."

After these adjudications, we are clearly of opinion that the insolvency of the vendor is good ground for equitable interposition, upon the principle that Chancery will lend its aid, whenever there is not a full, complete, or adequate remedy at law. As to the personal property sold by Read to Hunter, it requires no argument or authority to show that an implied warranty as to title followed the sale, though the record shows there was an absolute warranty.

It is urged that Hunter was bound to tender the money due upon the purchase, and if he had, the incumbrance would have been removed—but is this a sequitur? The amount due upon the contract would not have been sufficient to have removed the incumbrance, and what guarantee would the vendee have had that it would have been so applied? Again: Why tender the balance of the purchase money, if it was clearly ascertained and settled that the vendor could not give a title in accordance with his bond? In the language of the Court, in Fisher vs. Bridges, 4 Blackford, 518, "the utter inability of the defendant to convey, dispensed with the necessity of the demand, as the law does not require a vain or nugatory thing to be done."

It is contended by counsel for defendant, that Hunter agreed to pay the stock note of Read, and Read was to transfer the Union Bank stock to Hunter. By reference to the record, we cannot perceive that any such arrangement was positively entered into. There was a negotiation pending, no doubt, as to this subject, but it seems never to have been carried into operation, owing to the several deaths of Read and Hunter, and was altogether of an inchoate nature.

Bembry says: "They had agreed to come to a settlement, which was prevented by the sudden death of Read." In his second examination, he says: "Archibald has told me that he and Read were to have a settlement, and that there would be a small difference be- 291 tween them, but in whose favor he did not know." A Court could not consistently enforce an imperfect and incomplete verbal agreement between parties, at variance with the solemn obligations in writing, and when there is no evidence to show that it was executed in part or in whole by either of the parties.

Before closing this branch of the subject, it will be seen, by reference to the evidence, that the land sold by Read to Hunter, and the negroes, except one or two, were sold under an execution against the estate of Read, in favor of the Union Bank, to satisfy Read's stock note. This having occurred since filing the bill by complaint, no mention is made of it; but by looking at page 50 of record, we see an agreement in these words: "It is agreed by the parties by their solicitors, that the property sold by the execution of the Union Bank vs. Read's administrator, brought $5,079, $4,754 of which was recovered by the Bank, in full satisfaction of their execution against Read's estate, and of their lien upon the property sold by Read to Hunter."

Although as a general rule, evidence is inadmissible, unless relating to the issues made up in the pleadings—still, the evidence as to the fact of sale being before the Court by consent of counsel, we feel authorized to advert to it. The sale in this case brings the suit substantially within the rule laid down in Abbott vs. Allen.

Here was a judgment at law—execution and property sold—a sheriff's deed, no doubt, given, under which possession could have been enforced at law, unless the party in possession submitted, and covenanted to give up possession. It would have been idle and futile for complainant to have litigated further as to the land, and we see, in 3d J. J. Marshall's Reports, 378, it is not the duty of a party so situated to do so. The Court say: "If the party submits to the judgment, it is equal to an actual eviction by the habere facias. No other evidence of a legal eviction is required than the judgment of the Court."

Upon a review of the facts of the case, it would be, we deem, extremely hard and inequitable that there should be a further collection of the purchase money against the estate of Hunter. It has expended upwards of thirteen thousand dollars, and does not seek by the present proceeding a recovery of any part of this sum against the estate of Read—the property for which this amount was paid—and other liabilities incurred, has been sold under execution against the 292 estate of Read, and goes to pay its debts. There may have been laches on the part of the estate of Hunter, no doubt, in not offering to complete the sale, though as we have seen, it would have been a mere form, owing to the insolvency of Read's estate.

The estate of Read, on the other hand, was bound to remove the incumbrance on the property sold, by the first day of January, 1843, which it did not do, and was equally, if not more at fault, than the estate of Hunter. The loss sustained by the latter estate is far greater than that sustained by Read's, and we are disposed to let the parties remain where they now are.

It is therefore, ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the decree rendered in the Court below, be reversed, and that the injunction heretofore granted in this case be made perpetual.

RICHARD B. CARPENTER AND WIFE, AND HIRAM HUNTER, VS. JULIA MCBRIDE, EXECUTRIX, ROBERT B. HAUGHTON, RICHARD H. BRADFORD, ADMINISTRATOR OF READ, AND JAMES M. HUNTER, DECEASED

Where a guardian or any other person acting in a fiduciary capacity, transfers an obligation securing the payment of money to a third person, and it is manifest on the face of the paper that minor heirs or cestui que trusts are interested in the fund secured to be paid, a Court of equity will follow the fund into the hands of the assignee, or interpose to prevent its payment to him. And this is done on the familiar and well established principle, that trusts are not only enforced against those persons who are rightfully possessed of the trust property as trustees, but against all persons who come into possession of the property bound by the trust with notice.

HAWKINS, J.

The complainants in this case come into Court and claim the proceeds of what is termed the McBride obligation, transferred by A. R. S. Hunter to Leigh Read, in part payment for lands and negroes sold by Read to Hunter. This instrument is in the following words:

EXHIBIT F.

Condition of a bargain and sale made and entered into between Archibald R. S. and James M. Hunter, and A. R. S. Hunter, guardian of William H., Hiram S., and Grace Fenton Hunter, minor heirs of Adam Hunter, late of the County of Gadsden, deceased, of the one part, and Joseph McBride, of the County aforesaid, (all of the Territory of Florida) of the other part, witnesseth: That the said parties of the first part have sold to said McBride all the land, negroes, stock, and every other thing or things upon or belonging to said plantation and premises belonging to said estate, and hereby bind themselves in the sum of 20 thousand dollars to make or cause to be made to him good and sufficient titles to the property aforesaid, as soon as it can legally be done; and said McBride shall give them (or deposit in the clerk's office) his notes (with security) for fourteen thousand dollars (deducting or settling what they may owe him) payable at the following times, viz: six thousand dollars on the 1st of May, 1839, two thousand on the 1st of May, 1840, two thousand the 1st of May, 1841, two thousand on the 1st of May, 1842, and two thousand on the 1st of May, 1843, all with interest from the 1st of May, next; and said McBride binds himself in the sum of twenty thousand dollars to give or cause to be given the before described notes whenever the parties aforesaid shall make or cause to be made to him good and sufficient titles and bills of sale for the above described property. Witness our hands and seals this 30th day of January, A. D. 1838. Test, J. D. Edwards.

Signed, A. R. S. HUNTER, [SEAL.]
JAMES M. HUNTER, [SEAL.]
ARCH. R. S. HUNTER, [SEAL.]
Gnardian for the Minors,
JOSEPH McBRIDE, [Seal.]

I hereby certify that A. R. S. Hunter has made me a deed to the land, which if I cannot get a legal title to the whole of the property, I am to deed back to him again. Witness my hand, this 3d April, 1838. (Signed) JOSEPH McBRIDE.

Test—H. Doggett,
D. S. McBride.

They set forth in their bill that Grace F. and Hiram Hunter, are two of the children of Adam Hunter, deceased, and as such entitled 294 to a distributive share of the estate of their father—that on the 27th January, 1837, they wer minors, and A. R. S. Hunter was at that time the guardian, and so continued until his death, in 1841. That a partition of the estate of their father was had, as will be seen by reference to the report of the commissioners upon the record, and that by this partition a separate and perfect title was made to said property. That on the 30th day of January, 1838, Joseph McBride purchased all the estate of their father, and gave the obligation as before set forth, never having executed the notes, but duplicate originals of it were retained by said McBride and by A. R. S. Hunter, their guardian. That said Hunter, on becoming indebted to Leigh Read, the intestate of R. H. Bradford, delivered, as they are informed that said Bradford contends, the said obligations to said Read as collateral security for certain notes, which said Read held against him. That they believe a part of said obligation had been paid to A. R. S. Hunter before it was delivered to Read, and further payments afterwards. That there is about six thousand dollars due still on said obligation. The whole obligation was then due in equal portions to the complainants, and their three brothers, A. R. S., James M., and William A. Hunter—the latter has since died without wife or child. That the whole of the money collected amounted to more than the shares of the three brothers and has been used by James M. and A. R. S. Hunter, and the complainants have never received any portion of the money due on said obligation. They now claim the balance due on said obligation, which they state is claimed by Bradford, administrator of Read, and charge that this balance belongs to them, being part of the consideration for which the property was sold. That on their coming of age they have made bills of sale of their portion of the said property to the executor of McBride.

The answers of Mrs. McBride and Haughton and the answer of James M. Hunter, admit the allegations of complainants' bill to be true, whilst that of Bradford, not denying the matters and things set forth in said bill, nevertheless insists that the McBride obligation belongs to the estate of Read, he having received it in his life time by regular transfer from A. R. S. Hunter, in part payment for the land and negroes purchased from him by Hunter for himself and the other heirs of Adam Hunter, and that therefore the bill is without equity.

The first question here is, had A. R. S. Hunter a legal right to 295 transfer the obligation to Read so as to convey the interests of the complainants', at that time minors, and he their guardian? It is unnecessary to enter into an elaborate statement as to the duties which a guardian should perform to his wards. That subject was fully discussed by the bench and the bar in the case of Williams vs. Mosely, 2 Florida Reports, 304. He can do nothing to prejudice his ward. Considered as a trustee, he cannot alien the trust fund in payment of his own debt, 5 Rand., nor alter the destination of the fund for which it was originally intended. 4 Dess., 154. Hill vs. Simpson, 7 Vesey, 152. When a Court can pronounce a contract to be to the prejudice of the infant, it is void. Maule and Selwyn, 282. 2 Mason, 82. Chancellor Kent, speaking of the rights of guardians, uses this language: "Though it be not in the ordinary course of the guardian's administration to sell the personal property of his ward, yet he has the legal right to do it, for it is entirely under his control and management, and is not obliged to apply to this Court for direction in every particular case." "The case of third persons dealing with executors and administrators in their representative character, is analagous and throws strong light on the subject." Lord Kenyon, the Master of the Rolls, admitted that in general, the purchaser from the executor, of the testator's assets, was not bound to see to the application of the money, but if upon the face of the assignment of the property it appeared to have been in satisfaction of a private debt of the executor, the sale was fraudulent against the persons interested under the will, and equity could relieve. The same doctrine is held in Scott vs. Tyler, Dickens, 712. And Lord Thurlow held that if one concerted with the executor to obtain the effects of an estate in extinguishing the private debt of the executor, or in any other manner, contrary to the duty of the office of executor, the purchaser would be liable. In Hill vs. Stephens, 7 Vesey, 152, Sir William Grant made a decree setting aside the transfer of assets by an executor to secure a debt of the executor under circumstances of gross negligence, though not of direct fraud in the creditor, to whom they were transferred. The decisions in the above cases, are sustained by Chancellor Kent, who uses this language: "I have looked pretty fully into the decisions in the analagous case of a purchaser from an executor of a testator's assets, and they all agree in this, that the purchaser is safe, if he is no party to any fraud in the executor, and has 296 no knowledge or proof that the executor intended to misapply the proceeds, or was in fact by the very transaction, applying them to the extinguishment of his own private debt." 7 John. Ch. Rep., 151, Field vs. Scheiffelin, et al.

It is superfluous to remark, that, under the circumstances of this case, Read was fully aware that the transfer of the McBride obligation to him was to pay a debt of Hunter, the guardian—that, on its very face, it contained notice of the fiduciary character of Hunter; and the transfer to him being out of the ordinary duties of the guardian, he took the obligation at his peril, and was guilty of negligence in not ascertaining whether Hunter had the right to assign the obligation to him. Of course, we refer only to the interest of complainants secured by the obligation. It was a trust fund in the hands of Hunter, the guardian, and it is a familiar rule of Courts of Equity, that all persons acquiring property bound by a trust shall be considered as trustees. "If a trustee purchase property with the trust funds, there is a resulting trust for the cestui que trust; so that he may either claim a beneficial right to the property, or at his election, claim a lien upon the property, for the security of the money invested in it; and if the trustee sell, the purchaser from him, with notice of the trust, stands in the shoes of the trustee." Turner vs. Street, 2 Rand., 408. "Trusts are not only enforced against those persons who are rightfully possessed of the trust property as trustees, but against all persons who come into possession of the property bound by the trust, with notice of such trust." Adair vs. Shaw, 9 Sch. & Lefr., 262.

Even if this fund secured by the obligation has gone into the hands of Read, equity would follow it, and hold it subject to the claim of complainants; and, a fortiori, will it restrain its taking the direction asked for by Read's administrator, unless there are equitable circumstances rendering it proper that it should do so?

James M. Hunter says that there was no understanding that the Read property was purchased for the benefit of all the heirs and does not know whether Hiram and Grace knew of the transfer of the McBride obligation, but is inclined to think that they did not know it at the time. But whether they knew of it or not is immaterial, as they were infants, and on their coming of age, they might affirm or disaf-297 firm the transfer. James M. Hunter further says, that the complainants have never received from him, or his intestate, in property or money, any portion of the McBride obligation, and that it never was agreed between him and A. R. S. Hunter that he should pay complainants their share. The complainants cannot now look to the property purchased by A. R. S. Hunter, for their portion of the debt secured by the McBride obligation; and though they might have recourse upon the bond of their guardian, still that is matter at their option, and they have a right to pursue the trust fund, that being the legitimate source from which they can derive payment. It is true the complainants, on obtaining their majority, affirmed the sale to McBride, but this cannot, by any means, be regarded as a confirmation of the transfer of the obligation, so far as their portion was concerned, to Read; and, indeed, after a careful inspection of the record, we can see no act on their part that actually or impliedly ratifies this assignment by Hunter to Read, or that goes to show any intention on their part of relinquishing the claim upon the trust fund. Deeming their equities therefore in this behalf perfect and far superior to that of the estate of Read, we think that they should be the recipients of the balance of the proceeds arising from the McBride obligation, it appearing that this amount does not exceed the sum to which they are entitled as their share of that obligation.

The Court, therefore, directs the following judgment to be entered, to wit:

Be it remembered that this cause being heard upon a transcript of the record of Leon Circuit Court, by appeal from the decree rendered therein, and the same being fully considered by this Court, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the decree of the Circuit Court of Leon County be, and the same is hereby reversed. And this Court, proceeding to render such decree as should have been rendered in the Court below, doth further order, adjudge and decree, that complainants are entitled to the benefit of the decree heretofore rendered in this cause against Julia F. McBride, executrix of Joseph McBride, deceased, and Robert B. Haughton, on the 29th day of July, 1847, and that the proceeds thereof be paid to them, respectively, in equal portions; and that complainants recover from Richard H. Bradford all their costs expended in this cause, and that said Bradford pay all the costs of this cause, incurred by reason of the appeal to this Court.

298 JOHN A. SUMMERALL, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, vs. DANIEL THOMS AND WIFE, DEFENDANTS IN ERROR.

The circumstance that a person has wishes or a strong bias in reference to the subject matter of a suit, is not sufficient to disqualify him as a witness. He must have a direct interest in the event of the suit, and not merely a collateral interest, which last only goes to his credibility, and ought therefore to be carefully weighed by the jury.

In an action of detinue brought to recover a slave where the defence set up by the plea of the defendant, is, that the slave sued for never was the property of the plaintiff, evidence introduced by the plaintiff to establish his title which shows a verbal contract or arrangement that could not possibly have been performed within the year, upon which contract or arrangement the title of the plaintiff depends, the Court ought to instruct the jury to disregard such evidence, as only tending to prove a contract upon which, by the statute of frauds, no action could be sustained.

Where the persons of the same family dwell together, the possession of slaves living with them, will be presumed to be in him or her who has the right of property. And where one has had the possession of a slave for five years or more, under claim or assertion of right, and this claim of right is known to the other members of the family, such length of possession under such circumstances, constitute a good prescriptive right to the slave, and the claim of the others by suit, after such lapse of time, is barred by the statute of limitations.

This was an action of detinue for the recovery of a slave, brought in the Circuit Court of Duval County. The jury, under the instructions of the Court, returned a verdict for the plaintiffs, and the defendant brought the case to this Court by writ of error.

The nature of the case—the points ruled by the Court below—the instructions given——and the testimony of the witnesses, are set out with precision and exactness, in the opinion delivered by a majority of the Court.

Thompson, for plaintiff in error.

I. As to the first error assigned—the Court below should have sustained the objection to the competency of Joseph Summerall as a witness.

It clearly appeared from the testimony that he held property which he claimed by the same title. A recovery by the defendants in error would have estopped them from the assertion of claim by them against 299 him. The general rule is laid down in 1 Greenleaf on E., § 386, et seq.

II. The Court erred in the refusal to instruct the jury as prayed for by complainant in error—

1. As to the statute of limitations. The limitation of our statute of 1828, is five years in actions of detinue. Thomp. Dig. 441, 442. Under similar statutes in Virginia and Kentucky, five years peaceable possession of a slave acquired without force or fraud, will entitle a plaintiff who has lost such possession to recover. Newby vs. Blakey, 3 Hen. and Munf., 57. Shelby vs. Guy, 6 Peters Cond. Reps., 345. Smart vs. Vaugh, 3 J. J. Mar., 363. Clark vs. Butler, 7 J. J. Mar., 194.

In the case at bar, the possession of plaintiff in error was certainly with claim of title, as tenants in common with the defendants in error, if not adverse. It was peaceable, and not acquired by force or fraud.

2. As to the question of the statute of frauds. The agreement to divide the issue of Phœbe as they were successively born, was one which, from its very nature, could not have been performed within the year after the making thereof, and should have been reduced to writing. Thomp. Dig., 218. Peter vs. Compton, 1 Smith Lead. Cas., 143, and notes thereto.

The parties to the suit and Joseph Summerall, who are alleged to have entered into this agreement to divide, were all infants. Joseph says he was too young to understand it.

III. As to the instructions given to the jury.

1. Statute of limitations. This is clearly erroneous, there being no proof in the record of any bailments or delivery by Mrs. Thoms to the plaintiff in error, or indeed proof of any possession in her distinct from plaintiff in error, and adverse to him. However correct it may be in point of law, it is erroneous as applied to the facts of the case presented in the record.

2. In reference to the statute of frauds. Upon this question the Court charged the jury, that the action is not based upon the agreement entered into between Petty and wife and the Summeralls—if it was not so based, then the statute of frauds would apply, provided the contract was executory, &c.

This was clearly a misdirection of the Court. The question was 300 one of title, and was based upon the agreement. The property in Phœbe, the mother of the slave in dispute, was proved to be in the plaintiff in error, and in Mrs. Thoms and Joseph Summerall. The slave in dispute, therefore, belonged to the owners of Phœbe, and the right was in all as tenants in common, unless they or some of them had subsequently parted with the title. Mrs. Thoms, as one of the tenants in common with John, could not sue him at law in this action to recover the possession from him. If she has any right of possession or property independent of, or adverse to John, it can only be based upon an agreement to make partition as set up. It is true, the defendants in error did not declare upon the agreement, i. e., count upon it, yet they give evidence of it as a link in their chain of title, and as proof of the severance of the tenancy in common.

The Court, however, finally informed the jury that this question could not be considered on the ground that the statute of frauds should be specially pleaded. It seems to me that the rule of Court on this point was misapprehended by the Court, and it does not apply to a case like this. If the action had been for damages for the non performance of the agreement, then the defence should have been specially pleaded, but in this action, which is detinue, the issue was upon the title, and the verbal agreement set up was offered as proof of the title necessary to maintain the action. When offered as evidence, it was competent for the other party to oppose the statute of frauds to the effect of the evidence.

As to the question, whether the agreement was executed or executory. An executed contract is one performed on both sides; this was not such case—there is no proof of performance on either part. There is no proof of any distinct and independent possession of Mrs. Thoms. Neither was there any part performance by Mrs. Thoms within the year, or afterwards.

3. As to possession. The charge or instruction is, that where several slaves belong to several persons of the same family, the possession is in all.

The proof is possession by plaintiff in error, distinct and separate from the other members of the family since 1841. Plaintiff in error, Mrs. Thoms, and Joseph have not formed one family since 1835—they have lived separately since that time.

Summerall vs. Thoms and wife.—Opinion of Court.

301 Long & Walker, for defendant in error:

1. The general rule is, that "a witness is disinterested, who can gain nothing by the event of the suit." 8 Comyn's Dig., 1055. Joseph A. Summerall could have gained nothing by the event of this suit, and, therefore, first error is not well assigned.

2. The next objection is, that the husband should not have been joined as co-plaintiff in this action; but "in a suit for a cause of action accrued to the wife, done in her own right whilst single, she must be joined." 2 Comyn's Dig., 230, note e. Gould's Pleading, 198.

3. As to the statute of limitations. "Adverse possession required to bar the assertion of a legal title by the owner, must be an actual, continued, visible and hostile possession." 4 Kent, 446. 2 Kent, 504. "Where there is a doubt whether the possession is adverse, or merely permitted by the owner, it is a question of fact for the jury." 2 Starkie Ev., 887.

4. The statute of frauds has no application to a contract which has been fully performed. 1 Kelly, 355—citing Barton vs. Collier, 4 Bing., 309. Shaw vs. Woodcock, 7 B. & C., 73.

LANCASTER, J.

This was an action of detinue, brought by Thoms and wife, to recover possession of a female slave named Sue. There are two counts in detinue. The first charges a delivery of the slave to the defendant, to be re-delivered to the plaintiff, Eliza Thoms, when required. The second charges that, before the intermarriage of the said Eliza and the other plaintiff, Daniel Thoms, that she casually lost the slave out of her possession, and that the said slave came to the possession of the defendant by finding; and the usual breaches are assigned to both counts. There is a third count in debt, for the use and hire of said slave.

The defendant pleaded first to the 1st and 2d counts, non detinet.

2dly. That the girl Sue, mentioned in the 1st and 2d counts of the declaration, is not the property of plaintiffs, or either of them.

3rdly. That the said Eliza Thoms was not lawfully possessed of said slave, as is in the 1st and 2d counts of the declaration alleged.

4thly. As to the third count in the declaration, the defendant pleads, never was indebted in manner, &c.

302 5thly. A plea to all the counts of the declaration, that the said several causes of action did not accrue within five years next before the commencement of this suit.

On all which pleas, issue was joined.

The testimony given on the trial of the case is set out in a bill of exceptions, and made a part of the record, as well also as the instructions given by the Court.

George Petty, a witness, testified that he sold a negro woman, Phœbe, and her child, Peter, to the children—John A. Summerall, Joseph E. Summerall and Eliza Summerall, (now Eliza Thoms.) There was a bill of sale made to the children of the woman and her child, Peter; the purchase money was three hundred dollars, and the grandfather of the children acted as their guardian, to divide the children of Phœbe between them, after the following manner: John A., the defendant, being the oldest, was to take Peter, and Joseph was to have the next, and Eliza the next, in succession as they were born. Phœbe had other children afterwards—the next after Peter was Peggy, (Joseph's,) the next Patience, (Eliza's). Peter took sick, and died shortly after or just before the birth of Patience. The next child of Phœbe was a girl, Flora, (owned by John Summerall, or called his). A little while afterwards, there was a boy, Simon, (under the agreement, Joseph's). Flora died. The next child of Phœbe was Sue, (Eliza's); the next Cornelia. All agreed that the children should be divided in this way, in order as they came. He did not know whether the contract was changed—if it was, he did not know it. He supposed that John Summerall claimed and owned Cornelia. He knew nothing to the contrary, but that the children agreed to the division at the time of the purchase. It was over twenty years before witness testified that Phœbe was sold to the children, John, Joseph and Eliza; and the agreement above set forth, made to divide in succession, was by parol. At the time of the agreement to divide, all the children were under age. Peter, Flora and Cornelia are dead.

Witness thinks Eliza had possession of Sue—Eliza kept house for John for some time. Sue was with her sometimes—called Sue her's; Sue went to John's house frequently, where Eliza was. It is more than ten years since Eliza lived with John.

Other witnesses were sworn, whose testimony does not materially vary the testimony above stated, and among others, Joseph E. Summerall, one of the distributees under the above stated agreement, who testified that John had Simon, (one of Phœbe's children). Witness once disputed claim to Simon, and always regarded him as his own. The three that fell to John died. Was present at the arrangement to divide, but too young to understand. Peter was two or three years old when he died—John claimed him. Flora was three or four years old when she died; Cornelia also was a boy. None of the heirs claimed Peter, Flora and Cornelia. Old Simon, the husband of Phœbe, bought her for $750—which was divided among them. 303

There is testimony of several witnesses, varying in character, concerning the length of time during which John the defendant, has had Sue in possession.

Joseph E. Summerall testifies that all the negroes have been in possession of John. Himself and Eliza lived with John, and the children were in possession of all, and at the disposal of each of the owners. After witness and his sister Eliza quit John, he, witness, took one of the children of Phœbe, and Eliza took one. John married in the year 1838, and Eliza has not lived with him since. Sue was an infant at the time, and stayed some time longer. Sue lived with Phœbe until the early part of the year 1844—then went to John's and stayed. Witness thinks he quit staying with John in 1843 or 1844.

Joshua Fennamore testifies that when John, Joseph and Eliza lived together, he used to be at the house of John, and heard him say Sue, or Susan, belonged to Eliza. John was of age, and Eliza kept house for him at the time, and Sue was small. It was eight, ten, or twelve years ago—before John was married.

Hagans, a witness for plaintiff, testified: Don't know as to the title to Sue. Knew Peter—John claimed him. Peter died—John spoke of having lost one of his negro boys. John has had Sue about five or six years. Peter died a good many years ago—John was not of age at the time.

S. Vandergriff testified: Sue has been in defendant's possession since 1841—was at defendant's house, and saw her there then—does not know when she, Sue, left Phœbe. Was all round defendant's kitchen—Sue slept in negro house. Phœbe lived near John Summerall's. She (Sue) was not called Mrs. Thoms property, but undivided property—heard so from Joseph E. Summerall and John's 304 wife. Thoms and wife married on the 7th of October, 1845.

George Petty, the first witness, says: Phœbe lived within gun shot or hailing distance of John, the defendant's house, but not on his place. At the birth of twins by Phœbe, (which was after she had been sold), Sue was permitted by Eliza to go and nurse the twins, and afterwards Sue went to John Summerall's. Sue staid with her mother before the birth of the twins—Sue is worth $400. Understood always that Joseph exercised ownership over young Simon.

The first question raised on the record on these proofs is, that there is a misjoinder of plaintiffs in the action—it being shown by testimony, that they intermarried after the passage of the act of 6th of March, 1845, entitled "An act to secure certain rights to women." Counsel for appellant did not insist on this point, and waived it. We do not, therefore, decide it.

The first error assigned is—the Court erred in admitting Joseph E. Summerall to testify, as a witness on behalf of the plaintiff below; and the ground of objection is his interest. The witness testifies that John, the defendant below, has possession of Simon, one of Phœbe's children. Witness once disputed his claim to Simon, and always regarded him as his own.

George Petty says, "he understood always that Joseph exercised acts of ownership over young Simon, and from this, it may be presumed he feels an interest in the establishment of the parol agreement for the partition of Phœbe's children, in the manner testified to by George Petty—as it appears that all those who, under that agreement, could be claimed by John, had died quite young, and two, at least, before the Summeralls were of lawful age. And that thereby, while John, by such a division, would get nothing, Joseph and Eliza would each get two; but this is not a direct interest in the event of the suit, and only a collateral interest in the establishment of the agreement by parol, under which the plaintiffs seek to predicate their right of property in the slave Sue in controversy. No question was asked the witness as to whether he was interested in the event of the suit; and it is not enough that he has wishes, or a strong bias on the subject-matter of the suit, or that he expects some benefit from the result of the trial. 1 Phill. Ev., 47. Stewart vs.

Kipp, 5 Johns. R., 256. Such circumstances may influence his mind, and affect his credibility—they are, therefore, open to observation, and ought to be carefully weighed by the jury, who are to determine what dependence they can place upon his testimony, but they will not render him incompetent—1 Serg. & Rawle, 32. Griswold vs. Sedgwick, 1st Wendell R., 126—and we do not see any error under the circumstances in allowing him to testify. This objection is, therefore, overruled.

The other errors assigned are—

2d. The Court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, as prayed by the defendant below.

3d. The Court erred in their instructions given to the jury.

And this again refers us to the bill of exceptions and the instructions given, and the instructions refused. The defendant objected to the evidence of the agreement to distribute the negroes (the children of Phœbe) as they might be born, among the children, John A., Joseph E., and Eliza Summerall; and that said agreement was void under the statute of frauds as an agreement not to be performed within a year from the making thereof, and not in writing. The Court decided this defence could not be set up under the pleadings in this cause, but that the defendant, to have availed himself of that defence, should have pleaded specially; and the Court charged the jury:—"the action is not based upon the agreement entered into between Petty and wife and the Summeralls; if it was so based, then the statute of frauds would apply, provided the contract was executory; if the contract was executed, then the statute of frauds cannot apply; and as to the fact whether the contract was executed or not, that would be a question for the jury. The rules of Court, however, settle summarity the question. The rule in relation to detinue is explicit." To all of which defendant excepted. The rule referred to in this instruction and decision is in these words: "The plea of non detinet shall operate as a denial of the detention of the goods by the defendant, but not the plaintiff's property therein, and no other defence than such denial shall be admissible under that plea." But non detinet was not the only plea filed to the counts in detinue of the plaintiffs, by defendant. There is a second plea, which says, the girl Sue (sued for) was not at the time of the commencement of this suit, and is not now, the property of the plaintiff or either of them.

And there is yet a third plea which says, that the plaintiff, Eliza C. Thoms, was not lawfully possessed of the said negro Sue, as in the first and second counts of her declaration is alleged. There is still a remaining plea to the whole declaration, which says, the several causes of action in the plaintiff's declaration, or any or either of them, did not accrue within five years next before the commencement of this suit. To these pleas, general replications were filed, so that if any one of them is true, it forms a bar to the plaintiff's action. The statute of frauds does provide that no action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any agreement that is not to be performed within one year from the making thereof, unless the agreement or promise upon which such action shall be brought, or some note or memorandum thereof, shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by some other person by him thereto lawfully authorized. Tho. Dig., 218. This was an agreement made by the friends of these minor children, at a time when, according to the testimony of the second, he was not old enough to understand, and when a breeding woman, Phœbe, the property of the minors, had but one child, to divide her children among the minors, as they should be born, giving the one already born to the oldest, her second to the second, and third to the third, and her fourth then back again to the first minor, and so through again, and this repeated as often as her fruitfulness would permit.

Now it seems difficult and even impossible to suppose, admitting the minor children at the time to be bound by this agreement of their friends, that it was in the contemplation of any one that this agreement could be performed within one year from the making thereof, but on the contrary, it was intended to extend to the time of Phœbe's death, or that point in her life when she should cease breeding, or until the minor children, her owners, should arrive at lawful age. Now suppose Peter, the first child of Phœbe, had lived, and in a few days after this agreement was made, she had died, would, or could it be contended, that John, the defendant, was to have the whole avails of her purchase and his brother and sister be penniless? Suppose she had a second child, and died or stopped breeding, then John and Joseph would get a little negro each, and Eliza would go with nothing, even though Phœbe lived; for we have seen that at the sale of Phœbe, she was regarded as joint property, and the proceeds divided among them.

This contract is just such an one as the statute of frauds does provide no action shall be brought upon, whereby to charge any person—it is therefore not evidence to support an action, and ought not to have been admitted. The Court below decided this defence could not be set up under the pleadings in this cause, but the defendant, to have availed himself of that defence, should have pleaded it specially. The plaintiffs count on a right of property, and of having been lawfully possessed, &c. The defendant takes issue by his pleas before noticed, on both these allegations; but there is nothing said in the declaration of this right of property, derived through a verbal agreement made by the friends of the parties, when some, if not all, were too young to understand, and to be executed upon a contingency in a series of years. If a count setting up such right of property had been filed in the cause, it would have been demurrable, but not being there, there was no ground of demurrer, nor can we see what manner of plea could have availed the defendant to defeat the effect of this verbal agreement, as testimony against him. By his pleas, he has met the substantative issuable allegations contained in the declaration, and we think he is not bound to go farther and plead to any supposed allegations that may be framed by proof. If improper proofs are sought to be admitted, they should be objected to; and if proof of any agreement, void by the statute of frauds, is introduced, the jury ought to be instructed to disregard it. But a contract void by the statute of frauds, by reason of its not having been reduced to writing, while it remains executory, may nevertheless be made valid, having been executed by the parties bound by it.

And this leads us to consider, that at the time the agreement in proof in this case was made, the parties in interest were all minors, and at least some of them too young to understand. The doctrine is, that the contracts and acts of an infant are in general voidable, and capable of confirmation when he comes of full age; those alone being treated as absolutely void, which are certainly, and in their nature prejudicial to his interest—2 Greenleaf Ev., 292, Sec. 367; or incapable of being ratified. There is a distinction, however, between those acts and words necessary to ratify an executory contract and those which are sufficient to ratify an executed contract. In the latter case, any act amounting to an explicit acknowledgment will operate as a ratification, as in the case of a purchase of lands, or goods—if after coming of age he continues to hold the property, and treat it as his own, he will be liable for the purchase money. But in order to ratify an executory agreement made during infancy, there must not only be an acknowledgment of liability, but an express confirmation or new promise (or agreement) voluntarily and deliberately made, by the infant on coming of age, and with the knowledge that he is not legally liable, or bound by the original executory agreement. See 2 Greenleaf Ev., 293, and authorities there cited. The jury ought therefore to have been instructed that unless they believed from the testimony, that after these minors all arrived at full age they all expressly agreed to ratify and abide by the verbal agreement in proof with the knowledge they were not legally bound by it, that they must find for the defendant. In other words, unless the jury believed from the testimony that after the arrival at full age of these parties, they ratified the verbal agreement made in their behalf by Mr. Petty and his wife and their grandfather, [and the making a distribution among themselves of Phœbe's children belonging to them, or an express confirmation or new promise to abide by the agreement, would be evidence of such ratification,] that a plaintiff, Mrs. Thoms, has no separate right of property in the slaves sued for, and cannot recover in this action. There was also some proof going to show that none of the heirs claimed Peter, Flora, and Cornelia, the three who died, and who by the parol arrangement of the friends of the children would have been assigned to John, and also going to show that John had then in possession of all the negroes, while his brother and sister remained with him, and they have never been delivered to them. If the testimony sufficiently established these facts, of which the jury should be left to decide, then there was no sufficient evidence of an executed contract, and the jury ought to have found for defendants, and ought to have been so instructed. The decision and instruction of the Court below, so far as it is in conflict with the opinion and principles hereinbefore advanced, seems to a majority of this Court to be erroneous.

Defendants urged before the Court that five years' possession of the negro Sue, as in proof, was sufficient evidence for defendants to support the plea of the statute of limitations in issue in this case. The Court decided it was not, and defendant excepted. The Court charged the jury "that the statute of limitations applies where the posses-309 sion is adverse. Mere possession is not enough. If the jury are of opinion that the defendants had possession adverse to the claim of property of Mrs. Thoms for five years anterior to the bringing of the suit, then the plaintiff cannot recover. But if the possession in defendant has been adverse, he setting up no claim but possession merely by permission of Mrs. Thoms, then the statute of limitations does not apply. And further, that where several slaves belong to several persons of the same family, the possession is in all." To all which the defendant excepted. The defendant urged that five years possession of Sue by the defendant, as in proof, was sufficient evidence of title, &c., to support the plea of the statute of limitations. The Court decided it was not. We think the position of the defendant in this particular, if allowed by the Court, would take from the jury their province of determining, from the testimony, whether in fact the defendant had had five years' possession of the slave Sue, before suit brought for her. And the Court rightly said the statute of limitations applies where the possession is adverse. To determine whether the possession was adverse, however, depends on circumstances not contained in the instructions. Where persons of the same family dwell together, the possession of slaves living in the same family will be presumed to be in him or her who has the right of property. And if their right of property be joint, the possession of one will be the possession of all. But if they live asunder and in different families, the possession of one is not necessarily the possession of another. It may or it may not be so; that depends upon the circumstances of the possession, in relation to property claimed in severalty, but it is adverse if such possession has been commenced and continued under an assertion of right on the part of the possessor.

We think, therefore, the charge to the jury should have been—If, from the testimony, they believed the plaintiff, Eliza D. Thoms, and the defendant, John A. Summerall, had not resided together in the same family for five years or more, next before the commencement of the suit; and if the jury further believed from the testimony, that the defendant had, during that period, held possession of Sue, the slave in controversy, under an assertion of right—that then the plaintiff cannot recover in this action, being barred by the statute of limitations. But if they believed from the proofs, that the plaintiff, Eliza C. Thoms, was at any time, within five years next before the 310 commencement of this suit, in the actual possession of said slave as her own separate property, then they ought to find for the plaintiff.

In the last of the charge, the Court says: "Where several slaves belong to several persons of the same family, the possession is in all." This charge is of a nature to defeat the plea of the statute of limitations, where one member of a family sues another, though the latter had held slaves under a claim of separate property with the full knowledge of the former, for any number of years. And if the jury understood by it that the possession of the defendant was also, necessarily, the possession of Mrs. Thoms—they being persons of the same family—they were or might have been thereby misled on the subject of possession; and it is not perceived why such an instruction, ex proprio vigore, would not defeat the plea. But a majority of this Court are not able to see the legal propriety of this instruction. Where the possession of property is in several persons, it is a joint possession, or tenancy in common, and destroys the idea of separate property in any one. In this case, if the possession still remains in all the claimants, then there has been no executed contract of partition, and consequently Mrs. Thoms, who sues in severalty, has no right to recover in her separate action against her co-tenant. This instruction is, therefore, erroneous.

The opinion and instruction given by the Court below, being in some parts different from those herein contained, it is ordered and adjduged, that the judgment rendered by the Circuit Court in the premises be reversed and set aside; and it is further ordered, that a venire de novo be awarded, and further proceedings be thereon had in conformity with this opinion.

BALTZELL, J., dissented.

I do not concur in the decision pronounced in this case, nor in the reasons given by the majority of the Court for its reversal.

The bill of exceptions presents the questions for consideration, and the proper inquiry is, did the Circuit Court err in the instructions given to the jury, or in refusing those asked by the defendant below?

"The defendant urged that five years' possession of the negro, as in proof, under the statute of limitations, was sufficient evidence of title in him—the Court decided that it was not." The opinion admits this to be right—as it says, "if allowed, it would take from the jury 311 their province of determining from the testimony whether defendant had five years' possession of Sue before suit." We do not differ in holding that there was no error in this ruling.

"The defendant also objected to the evidence and proceedings, on the ground that it appeared by the evidence of the agreement to distribute the negroes, the children of Phœbe, as they might be born, amongst the children—that said agreement was not valid under the statute of frauds, as an agreement not to be performed within a year from the making thereof, and not in writing." A conclusive answer to this objection is, that it makes no motion, and presents no definite proposition.

Objection is made to the evidence and proceedings. On this ground alone, the application was properly refused. Its object would seem to be—and this is what with propriety may have been done—to induce the Court to instruct the jury to overrule or disregard the agreement, as being irrelevant or incompetent—these being the only grounds for such a motion. 2 McLean, 596. It cannot be pretended that the evidence was obnoxious to either of these exceptions. The Court decided that this defence could not be set up under the pleadings in this case, but should have been pleaded specially. In this, I do not concur. If the agreement was void under the statute of frauds, and there was no evidence of its execution, the plaintiff must have failed for want of evidence to sustain his case. It is sufficient, however, that the objection was not tenable—it was properly refused, for other causes to be hereafter stated.

The Court charged the jury that "the statute of limitations applies, where the possession is adverse. If the jury are of opinion that defendant had possession, adverse to the claim of Mrs. Thoms, for five years anterior to the bringing of the suit, then plaintiff cannot recover; but if the possession in defendant has not been adverse, he is setting up no claim but possession merely by permission of Mrs. Thoms, then the statute of limitations does not apply." This, also was excepted to. If there be error in this, it is in being too favorable to the defendant. The true doctrine on the subject of possession conferring right under a statute of limitations, is contained in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Zellers lessee vs. Eckert, &c., sustained as it is by numerous authorities. It is there said—"as the possession was originally taken and held in sub- 312 serviency to the title of the real owner, a clear, positive and continued disclaimer and disavowal of the title, and assertion of an adverse right, and to be brought home to the party, are indispensable before any foundation can be laid for the operation of the statute. Otherwise, the grossest injustice might be practiced—for without such notice, he might well rely upon the fiduciary relation upon which the possession was originally taken and held, and upon the subordinate character of the possession, as the legal result of those relations." 4 Howard's S. C. R., 296. The instruction, then, should have been, not only that adverse possession, but a clear, positive and continued disclaimer and disavowal of the title on the part of plaintiff, and assertion of adverse right to be brought home to the plaintiff, were requisite to sustain the plea of the statute; nor was such an error a ground for reversal at the instance of the plaintiff in error—it was an injury to his adversary, the plaintiff below, of which he alone can complain.

The Court charged the jury—"the action is not based upon the agreement entered into between Petty and wife and the Summeralls. If it was so based, then the statute of frauds would apply, provided the contract was executory. If the contract was executed, then the statute of frauds cannot apply; and as to the fact whether the contract was executed or not, that would be a question for the jury."

I am of opinion that the statute of frauds has no application to the case. The statute very clearly contemplates contracts between independent parties, and not the case of severance or partition between joint owners, which is rather the dissolution of an existing agreement, than the making of a new one, and so do the books treat it. "The joint tenants' estate in realty may be destroyed, without any alienation, by merely disconnecting their possession; and, therefore, if two joint tenants agree to part their lands, and hold them in severalty, they are no longer joint tenants, for they have no joint interest in the whole, but only a several interest, respectively, in the several parts." 2 Black. Comm., 185.

Boyd vs. Graves, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, was the case of a division and ascertainment of the dividing line between the proprietors of adjoining lands, by consent of both parties, and the lands held for many years. An effort was made to 313 assert a claim adversely by one of the parties, on the ground of the statute applying, the Court say—"it is not a contract for the sale or conveyance of lands—it has no ingredient of such contract. There is no quid pro quo, and the Court do not consider it as a conveyance of title from one person to another.' 4 Wheaton, 513. 4 Cond. Rep., 525.

Again: "A parol partition will be enforced." 25 Wendell, 434 5 Brevard, 97.

In the case under consideration, the increase of the negroes was, no doubt, looked to, like the crop of the planter—the parties concluding to divide as they did, in preference to waiting until all the children should be born—just as three joint owners of a plantation should agree that the proceeds of the crop for the first year should be appropriated to A., the next to B., and the third to C. Such a case is to be found in 16 Vermont, 169, between owners of a mill, to occupy severally, in proportion to their interests.

The first position is, that the action is not based on the agreement—as it obviously was not—there being other evidence in the case equally important and essential to plaintiff's recovery. It is not material to inquire, whether the statute would apply to an executory agreement—the more correct position is, that, independent of the statute, a joint owner cannot maintain an action upon a mere agreement to divide.

The last position is, that 'the statute of frauds cannot apply if the contract is executed." This proposition is plain to be questioned An agreement executed is the case of a "sale and delivery of an article for a price paid," to use the language of Chancellor Kent in his Commentaries, 4 Kent., 450. The point is also expressly decided in Craig vs. Vanpelt, 3 J. J. Marshall, 489.

The third proposition asserted is, that "whether the contract was executed or not was a question for the jury." Whether the agreement was in fact carried into execution, depended upon the testimony of witnesses, some of whom differing in their statements, it became the duty of the Court to refer the question to the jury. In this I perceive no error.

The remaining instruction is, that "where slaves belong to several persons of the same family, the possession is in all." This also, I think, is erroneous. The general rule is, that the property of per-314 sonal chattels draws to it the possession, and this whether the owner reside separately or in the same family. The instruction, however, was favorable to defendant below, and to the prejudice of his adversary, and for the reason already stated is not the ground of reversal.

It is insisted by counsel for plaintiff in error, that "there is no proof of performance on either part—none of any distinct and independent possession of Mrs. Thoms." There is no instruction asked which can raise this question in this Court—it was not presented in the Court below by a motion for a non-suit, or for instructions to the jury to find for the defendant, or that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. We have seen that the instructions given were not erroneous. Where, then, is the authority for raising a question of fact not presented by the bill of exceptions? There is none. In Zeller's Lessee vs. Eckert, the Supreme Court say, so far as error is founded upon the bill of exceptions incorporated in the record, it lies only to exceptions taken at the trial to the ruling of the law by the judge, and to the admission or rejection of the evidence. 1 Bac. Ab., 279. Bull, N. P., 316. Beyond this, we have no power to look into the bill on a writ of error, as it is the creature of the statute and restricted to the points stated. We have no concern in a writ of error, with questions of fact, or whether the finding of the jury accords with the weight of the evidence. The law has provided another remedy for errors of this description, namely, a motion in the Court below for a new trial on a case made. 4 Howard S. C. R., 297. The point was directly presented to the same Court in the case of Garrard vs. Lessee of Reynolds. "This Court is not called upon to express an opinion whether as matter of law, there was any evidence to be submitted to the jury going to establish the intermarriage at or before the time mentioned, because, although this ground was taken by the counsel in the course of the trial below, on motion for a non-suit, and was overruled, no exception was taken to that decision. The point is therefore not before us." 4 Howard S. C. R., 126.

In Binney vs. The Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, the Court say: "the counsel for defendant have insisted, that if the cause cannot be decided upon its supposed real merits, it ought to be remanded to the Circuit Court for the purpose of receiving such modifications as will bring before the Court those questions of law on which the rights of the parties depend. Where error exists in the proceedings of the Circuit Court which will justify the reversal of its 315 judgment, this Court may send back the cause with such instructions as the justice of the case may require. But if, in point of law, the judgment ought to be affirmed, it is the duty of this Court to affirm it. We cannot reverse a decision which conforms to law, and remand a cause for further proceedings. By C. J. Marshal, 8 Peters, 219.

The same enlightened Court, in the case of Hepburn vs. Dubois, on this subject, use the following emphatic language: "In urging upon this Court a review of the parol evidence in the record, we think the counsel of the plaintiff in error have asked us to transcend the limits prescribed to our action on questions of fact, by an uniform course of decision from the first organization of this Court, which has been repeatedly defined during the present term, unanimous in our opinion on the law, though sometimes differing in its application to particular cases. This Court is committed in language which it neither can nor desires to recall, because that power which we are bound to obey has spoken to us and all the Courts in the United States in terms most imperative. The trial by jury is justly dear to the American people. It has always been an object of deep interest and solicitude, and every encroachment upon it has been watched with great jealousy. One of the strongest objections originally taken against the Constitution of the United States, was the want of an express provision securing the right of trial by jury in civil cases. As soon as the Constitution was adopted, this right was secured by the seventh amendment proposed by Congress, and which received an assent of the people so general as to establish its importance as a fundamental guaranty of the rights and liberties of the people." 12 Peters, 376.

It must be admitted that the power of reversal has been carried to a greater extent in this Court, especially in the cases of Ponder vs. Parkhill's administrators and Camp vs. the same, decided in 1848. The defence mainly relied upon in these cases was matter of estoppel, sustained and controverted by a number of witnesses on both sides. It was submitted to the jury by the Court below with instructions predicated upon this variance in the testimony, who found in favor of plaintiff and against the defense set up. The Supreme Court find no error in the instructions, as they do not notice them, but "looking at the facts" and coming to a conclusion in conflict with that which the jury, in their exclusive province, had deliberately at- 316 tained, they set the verdict aside, and reversed the judgment. They even go farther—if that indeed be possible—as if the entire case had been submitted to them by consent of parties, to be tried without a jury—they adjudicate without any pleading, instruction, or exception justifying it, that "the right of property in the slaves in contest passed by the sale to the defendant," p. 275. Other cases, scarcely less exceptionable, but asserting the same power in a form not so obvious, have also received the sanction of this Court. I cannot but think that the course of the decision in this case is subject to the same exceptions.

Instructions are directed to be given by this Court on a new trial to be had in the Court below, which I propose to consider. The first is, that if, from the testimony, the jury believe that the plaintiff Mrs. Thoms, and defendant, John A. Summerall, had not resided together in the same family for five years or more next before the commencement of this suit, and if they further believe that the defendant had during that period, held possession of Sue, the slave in controversy, under an assertion of right, that then the plaintiff cannot recover in this action, being barred by the statute of limitations. But if they believe, from the proofs, that the plaintiff, Mrs. Thoms, was at any time within five years next before the commencement of this suit, in the actual possession of said slave as her own separate property with the knowledge and consent of defendant, then they ought to find for the plaintiffs. Now why the difference in the application of the rule of law between these parties? Why this most evident advantage under like circumstances, in favor of defendant over his sister? On his part, possession for five years under an assertion of right, is made to defeat her suit and secure the property to him. To entitle her to it actual possession as of her own separate property, with the knowledge and consent of the defendant, is required. If assertion of right, with possession, give right of property to one joint owner, why not to the other? If actual possession as of separate property with the knowledge and consent of his co-tenant, is made indispensable as to one joint tenant, does not the same rule prevail as to the other? But an obvious objection to the first instruction is, that there is nothing on the record to justify it. Not a single witness testified as to any assertion of right on the part of John Summerall.

317 The witness depose to a distinct admission and assertion by him, that the property was in his sister—his own witness, Vandergriff, deposes at most, that she was called undivided property, that is, not the property of John, but of all the brothers and sisters. These instructions are clearly opposed to the case of Zeller's Lessee vs. Eckert, as to the possession under the statute of limitations, the only pretence of title set up for John A. Summerall. But where is the authority for granting any instructions after the Court has, in this particular point of adverse possession, sustained the instruction given by the Court below? It is not the practice nor within the power of an appellate Court to frame variant and contradictory instructions according to their own suggestions, except in case of a reversal of the instructions given. If the instruction had been declared erroneous, then the authority exists; otherwise I regard it as an act of original jurisdiction not justified by law, but obnoxious to all the objections raised against a Court deciding on the controverted facts of a case.

The same objection applies with increased force to the other instructions directed to be given, that "unless the jury believed from the testimony, that after these minors all arrived at full age, they all expressly agreed to ratify and abide by the verbal agreement in proof, with the knowledge they were not legally bound by it—in other words, unless they believed that, after the arrival at full age of these parties, they contracted and agreed to be bound by the verbal agreement made in their behalf, and in pursuance of such agreement, actually made a distribution amongst themselves of Phoebe's children belonging to them—that the plaintiff, Mrs. Thoms, had no separate, but a joint right of property sued for, and cannot recover in this action." Now, the defence of infancy had not been raised in the pleadings by the instructions below, nor by the bill of exceptions, nor has it a connection with the instruction which gives rise to it, which was in reference to the statute of frauds. A party may waive a defence, and it is not, I respectfully submit, the province of this Court to set up and impose upon him such as he has waived.—The instruction is still more objectionable, in assuming a position at variance with the fact—the testimony in record—in deciding that the agreement and evidence showed a contract executory, and not executed. Now, this subject was expressly submitted to the jury, and they found it executed. How, then, can the Court assert a different 318 conclusion? Is it lawful thus to pass upon the facts—to substitute the judgment and opinion of the Court in a matter of contradictory testimony, in place of the verdict of a jury? The evidence to show that the agreement was executed has been already reviewed—what is there to show that it was executory?

After stating that a different kind of ramification is required in one case from the other, we are informed that the case under consideration is executory. I propose to test the accuracy of this conclusion. The distinction between executory and executed contracts is thus stated by Chancellor Kent: "if, for instance, one person sells and delivers goods to another for a price paid, the agreement is executed, and becomes complete and absolute; but, if the vendor agrees to sell and delivers at a future time, and for a stipulated price, and the other party agrees to accept and pay, the contract is executory, and rests in action merely." 4 Kent, 450. Striking out them, and disregarding all the testimony, but that of the agreement itself, and we have an executory contract, resting in action—a right to be enforced by suit merely. Connect with the agreement actual possession and ownership—the assertion of right—a failure to assert claim in opposition, and we have an executed contract—the very case presented by the record. But there is no authority for this disregard of the testimony in the case, any more than there is in predicating an instruction upon an imperfect view of the evidence, or giving a new instruction, when the old one is sustained. The quotation from 2 Greenleaf on Evidence, is unfortunate in not applying to the case. The subject treated of by the learned author was the defence of infancy to an action of assumpsit, which he states "may be avoided by showing that the consideration of the promise was necessaries furnished to him; or, 2d, a ratification of the contract by a new promise, after he came of age." § 364. Under this last head, he makes the remarks quoted by the Court, which, if extended a sentence farther, would have shown, beyond doubt, their true object and purport." "An explicit acknowledgment of indebtment, whether in terms or by a partial payment, is not alone sufficient—for he may refuse to pay a debt which he admits to be due;" thus showing that the clause was applicable to debts or engagements of the infant, upon which he might be sued, after he came of age. Much more pertinent and to the point are the remarks of Lord Mansfield, in the case of Zouch vs. Parsons—"Miserable must the condition of 319 minors be, if they could do no binding acts. The law, therefore, at the same time that it protects their imbecility and indiscretion from injury, through their own imprudence, enables them to do binding acts for their own benefit and without prejudice to themselves, for the benefit of others."

Summerall vs. Thoms and wife.—Opinion of Justice BALTZELL.

"If an infant does a right act which he ought to do, which he was compellable to do, it shall bind him, as if he makes equal partition, if he pays rent, &c., the authorities are express and the reason decisive, that generally, whatsoever an infant is bound to do by law, the same shall bind him, albeit he doth it without suit of law. A right and lawful act is not within the reason of the privilege which is given to protect infants from wrong. His being compellable by any means and in any way to do it, proves the act to be substantially what he ought to do. A third rule deducible from the nature of the privilege, which is given as a shield and not as a sword, is, that it shall never be turned into an offensive weapon of fraud or injustice." 3 Burrows, 1801-2.

It will not be difficult to maintain that this partition so far as John Summerall was concerned, was an equal one. His sister and brothers had reason, not he, to complain of its inequality. When made, there was but one child of the negress alive, which is assigned to him by the agreement, the others were to have but the prospect of those to be born. Seven children were born to Phœbe, to three of which he was entitled as having first choice, whilst they were entitled only to two. He was the oldest brother, and best able and most competent of all to judge of the arrangement, and profiting so largely by it, it is therefore presumable that he was its author or greatly in favor of it. If, after obtaining his allotment and receiving his share according to the agreement, the negroes received by him die, is it to be tolerated that the deficiency shall be compensated by his brothers and sisters? Shall he, on that account, be permitted to disaffirm his agreement and bring an action extending over the range of near twenty years, and that too against a sister having claims upon his generosity, his care and his protection? This would indeed be allowing him to use his privilege as a sword and to turn it into a most offensive weapon of injustice. The above view of the English Courts is confirmed by the American authorities. "A parol partition of lands between tenants in common, when fair and equal, and followed 320 by a due execution of it, is binding on all, whether wives or minors." 9 Watts & Sergt., 127. "Where an executrix was also devisee of slaves in common with other executors, and held them for many years, this is evidence there was a division." 3 Monroe, 276.

Supposing, however, this agreement was voidable at the option of John A. Summerall, when is it to be exercised, and how long does the privilege exist? It will be discovered that the law is by no means silent on this subject. The omission to disaffirm a contract within a reasonable time, has been held sufficient evidence of a ratification. Chief Justice Dallas says, "the infant is bound to give notice of the disaffirmance of a voidable contract in a reasonable time, (four months he thought reasonable in that case.) This principle is recommended by its justice and general convenience. It is unjust that the infant, after his arrival at maturity, and the lapse of a reasonable time, should hold the scales in his hands, and decide as future circumstances should incline." Chancellor Kent says "where the contract is voidable, slight acts and circumstances will be a ground from which to infer assent." 2 Kent., 237. "His confirmation of the act or deed of his infancy may be justly inferred against him after he has been of reasonable age, either from his positive acts in favor of the contract, or from his tacit assent under circumstances not to excuse his silence." 2 Kent., 195. "Acquiescence merely for an unreasonable time is an act that denotes an intent not to rescind the contract." 6 Connect., 506. 9 Vernon, 368.

If the judgment and decision be in favor of defendant, as would seem to be the inevitable result from the opinion of the Court and the instructions directed to be given, the three brothers and sisters will then occupy their first position of joint tenants. Will John A. Summerall, on an account to be taken by a Court of Chancery for a division of the property, be charged with the three negroes he has received, and bring them into account, or are they to be rejected, and his brother and sister to account to him for those received by them and pay him? I cannot think that any Court of Equity would hesitate for a moment to affirm the agreement, and to hold the parties all bound by it. To turn these parties round to a suit in Chancery for a new adjustment of matters long since settled between them by positive agreement well understood and acted upon for years, never complained of until recently, and merely because one of them originally having an advantage over his younger brother and sister loses it through accident or otherwise, is a proceeding to which I can never give my assent. 321

It is not in evidence as to the precise time when John Summerall came of age. One of the witnesses, Fennimore, says: "He heard John say, that Sue belonged to Eliza. John was of age—he was not married at the time—it was eight, or ten, or twelve years since." John married in 1835—Thoms married in 1845. Now Petty, who made the sale of the negro, and seems acquainted with the circumstances, says: "He don't know of the agreement being disputed, until after the marriage of Thoms." His own brother, who had lived with defendant until the year 1843 or 1844, never heard him claim Susan; and his possession of the girl would seem to have been owing to his better fortune of having a home and family, while his sister, as stated by one of the witnesses, "had no home for Sue." If this was not an affirmance of the agreement and ratification, not only implied but express, then I confess I am at loss to understand the authorities.

I have not alluded to another feature in the case of no little consequence in its consideration. This arrangement was made by the guardian of the children with their consent—he bought the negress and sold her (in legal presumption) afterwards before the children came of age—he had a right to sell her children after they were born, so soon as they could, with propriety, be separated from the mother. The general rule is, that it is the "duty of a guardian to sell the personal property." 1 Vern., 335, 403. Reeves' Dom. Rel., 326.

In case of sale of these children, his account before the Judge of Probate with each of them, would be separate for his portion—this, itself, is partition in a different manner. What, then, is to prevent a division of the specific property without sale amongst his wards, if he judges it proper and to their interest. Having done so, his arrangement could only be set aside on the score of fraud. Field vs. Schieffelin, 7 John. Chy., 155.

In every point of view in which I have been able to regard the case, I see no reason to disturb the verdict and judgment of the Court below.

322 Barnard Adams, & Co., vs. Wm. D. Moseley, Receiver, et al.

An arrangement made by a surety, under and by virtue of which property mortgaged was left in the hands and subject to the control and management of the debtors, with the intent that by the rents, issues and profits they might diminish or pay off and discharge the mortgage debt for which the surety was bound, and thus save the property from sale at a time when it was supposed, if offered, it would be sacrificed, is not fraudulent, as tending to "delay, hinder, or defeat creditors." Nor is such an arrangement fraudulent, though made after a degree of foreclosure has been rendered, and an order of sale made, by which the surety was directed to take possession of the mortgaged property, as receiver and commissioner, and to sell, as he might be required by the creditor, and apply the proceeds to the payment and extinguishment of the mortgage debt.

On the 17th day of July, 1847, Charles Barnard, Abel Adams, George M. Barnard and Charles Larkins, merchants, trading as Barnard, Adams & Co., filed their bill for relief and discovery in the Circuit Court of Jefferson County, against William D. Moseley, Daniel S. Graham, George W. Gelzer and William J. Bailey, administrator de bonis non of Abram Bellamy, deceased—setting forth and showing that complainants, on the 4th day of November, 1845, in the Circuit Court of Jefferson County, obtained against Daniel S. Graham a judgment for the sum of $798 49-100, and that execution issued thereon according to law, but that no property of said Graham could be found liable and subject to be seized under and by virtue of said execution. That prior to the rendition of said judgment, Graham executed jointly with one George W. Gelzer a mortgage on all the property owned by him, to Stephen Woolf and William Blackburn, to secure them against loss or damage, by reason of their suretyship for said Graham and Gelzer, on their certain promissory notes, to the estate of Abram Bellamy. That, at the Spring term of the Court, in the year 1843, a decree was made by consent of said Graham and Gelzer, in favor of William Bellamy, executor of Abram Bellamy and Solomon E. Mathers, administrator of Stephen Woolf, and William Blackburn, foreclosing said mortgage, and subrogating the executor of Abram to all rights of the said Woolf and Blackburn, and ordering a sale of the mortgaged property to pay and satisfy the debt due to the Bellamy estate, and appointing William D. Moseley, receiver and commissioner of the mortgaged property. That Moseley, immediately after the rendition of said decree, took into his possession the land, steam saw mill and negroes in the mortgage and decree mentioned, and continued to hold them as receiver, by the direction and consent of the executor of Abram Bellamy, until the first Monday in March, 1847, a period of nearly four years—so that the property could not be seized or levied or under execution, thereby, as the bill alleges, hindering, delaying and defrauding other creditors and particularly complainants who have been execution creditors of said Graham since November, 1845, in the collection of their just debts. The bill charges that the property mentioned in the decree was not the joint property of Gadsden and Gelzer, but that each held and owned a part thereof separately. That the rents, issues and profits of the mortgaged property during the four years it was held by Moseley were amply sufficient to pay off and discharge the debt due the estate of Bellamy. That the rents, issues and profits, as complainants have been informed and believe, have been misapplied or squandered by said Moseley; and that the items in the account of the receiver, in which he gives himself credit for expenses paid in negro hire, &c., are incorrect; and that they are made up by Graham and Gelzer to conceal the fact, that the rents and profits of the mortgaged property have been received by them, and have gone into their own pockets. That, on the said 1st Monday of March, 1847, the said Moseley proceeded to sell, under said decree, enough of the mortgaged property to pay an alleged balance of $7,481 67-100 still remaining due to the estate of Bellamy—when in fact, if the rents and profits of the property had been properly applied, the whole debt would have been extinguished. That in making sale of the property, he sold the individual property of Graham, and that the negroes not sold were the property of Gelzer, and, therefore, not subject to complainants' execution—which, as complainants' allege, was in fraud of their rights, and, therefore, insist that the proceeds of the sale of Graham's property, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose, should be paid over to them in satisfaction of their execution. 323

The bill also states the receiver not only sold the property of Graham, mentioned in the mortgage, but that he seized and sold three negroes, March, York and one whose name is not known, and eight mules, not included in the mortgage or decree, and which, complainants say they are informed and believe, were the individual and separate property of Graham, and subject to their execution; and that said Moseley applied the proceeds of the sales of said slaves and mules to the satisfaction of said mortgage debt. Complainants allege the death of William Bellamy, executor of Abram Bellamy, since the rendition of the said decree, and that no proceedings have been taken, or were taken prior to the sale, to revive it in favor of William J. Bailey, administrator de bonis non. 324

The bill prays an injunction against Moseley, restraining him from paying over the proceeds of said sale to the estate of Abram Bellamy, and from delivering up to Gelzer or to Graham, the negroes mentioned in the decree, and remaining unsold in the custody of Moseley as receiver, which injunction was granted and issued on the 17th July, 1847.

On the 19th day of March, 1849, Moseley filed his answer, admitting the statements of the bill as to the mortgage of indemnity and the decree made thereon in favor of Bellamy, in 1843, but insists that these proceedings were without fraud. That defendant had become surety for the payment of the mortgage debt, with a view to give time to Graham and Gelzer to pay it by the use of the mortgage property. That he was appointed receiver, as alleged in complainants' bill, but that for the purpose of assisting Graham and Gelzer in their embarrassment, he having become their security to Bellamy, he left the property in their hands and subject to their direction and management for the very purpose of enabling them, by time and the use of the property, to work out of their difficulties and to pay off and discharge the debt. That the decree referred to in complainants' bill was entered by consent of all parties, and that defendant was appointed receiver in order that he might control the property, if circumstances required it, and save himself from loss by reason of his securityship. That it was well understood at the time of the decree, that Bellamy would not press for his debt so long as there was a reasonable prospect that Graham and Gelzer would pay the debt through the means and use of the mortgaged premises. That defendant considered himself, (being security) the only party in danger in permitting the property to remain in the hands of Graham and Gelzer. That he suffered it so to remain having the fullest confidence 325 in their integrity and honesty, and for the reason also that they were acquainted with all the business touching the management of the mill. That defendant's sole object in becoming in any wise connected with the indebtedness of Graham and Gelzer was to prevent a sale of their property at ruinous rates, entertaining the hope, that by the profits of the mill, they would be enabled to reduce the amount of their indebtedness very considerably, and that if they should be compelled to sell, that they might be able to do so at a future time with much greater advantage. That the sale made by defendant in the year 1847, was made when property had risen in value, no objection to the proceeding being urged by Graham and Gelzer. That defendant was only bound to sell property to pay the debt for the collection of which he was appointed receiver, and for the payment of which he was security. That having done this, he was bound to pay over the balance or surplus to Graham and Gelzer, and to return the property unsold to the party to whom it belonged. That complainants were strangers, of whom and of whose claim he knew nothing in his office of receiver. Defendant filed with his answer an account exhibiting the expenses of the milling and showing the net proceeds after payment of all expenses during the years 1843, '44, '45, and '46, to be only $1201 60. The answer therefore, denies that the rents, issues and profits of the property were sufficient to pay the debt for which the aforesaid decree was rendered.

The separate answers of Graham and Gelzer are to the same effect as the answer of Moseley, with respect to the matters therein stated. With regard to the negroes York and March, and the mules alleged in complainants' bill to be the property of Graham, the answer of Graham states that they were purchased after the decree rendered in favor of Bellamy, and with the individual means of Gelzer. That he, defendant, had no interest in them.

The following statement of sales of property made under the decree by William D. Moseley, receiver, was filed with his answer:

The notes given by Moseley to Bellamy, the one for the sum of $2,411 90-100, the other for the sum of $4,542 40-100, on both which was endorsed a statement to the effect that they were given as security for a debt due to William Bellamy, executor, from D. S. Graham and G. W. Gelzer, were also on file as proofs in the cause.

At a Circuit Court for the County of Leon on the sixth day of November, 1849, this cause coming on to be finally heard, upon bill, answers, exhibits and proofs on file—it was ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the injunction heretofore granted in this case, be dissolved, and that the bill be dismissed, &c.

From which decree complainants appealed.

Branch, for appellants:

1st. The law will not allow a judgment creditor to use his judgment as a cover to keep off other creditors. The language of the statute (Thomp. Dig., 215) is, "and every bond, note, contract, suit judgment and execution, which shall hereafter be had, made, &c." Decrees in Chancery stand on the same footing as judgments at law Thomp. Dig., 461.

All the facts of this case show that it is a decree or judgment, or suit, within the statute of Florida, to hinder, delay and defraud creditors. The fact that Bellamy, or rather Moseley, who seems to have been in fact both judgment creditor and receiver and commissioner, kept the property about four years without making a sale as directed in the decree, and permitted it to remain all the while in the posses- 327

sion and use of the defendants, allowing them to receive the rents and profits, was a fraud on the junior execution in favor of the complainants in this suit, which will deprive the decree of its prior lien, and postpone it to the junior execution in favor of complainants in this case.

But there is another fact which seems to be conclusive on this head. The answers of Moseley, Graham, and particularly of Gelzer, admit and claim that it was an arrangement made with the view and for the purpose of giving the defendants in the decree an opportunity to work out the debt. That the decree was taken with this view, and Moseley appointed receiver and commissioner with this view. It cannot be presumed the Court rendering the decree was cognizant of an arrangement which proposed thus to use its powers. A decree or judgment rendered not for the purpose of enforcement, would make a mockery of the proceedings of our Courts of justice, bring them into contempt and bring its mandates down to be regarded as merely "brutum fulmen." In the legitimate exercises of its powers, it rendered the decree and appointed a receiver and commissioner to carry that decree into effect, who had no right to evade it in order to exercise any feelings of benevolence or philanthropy toward the defendant. Berry vs. Smith, 3 Wash. C. C. R., 62. Twyne's Case and notes in Smith's Leading Cases.

In the above case of Berry vs. Smith, Judge Washington says, "In consequence of the delay in the due execution of the writ, the time has been so long as to warrant a presumption of a design to protect the property, which, in contemplation of law, amounts to a fraud, however, innocent and praise worthy, on the ground of benevolence, the motive might be which induced it."

In this case, it is not a presumption, but a fact boldly avowed and relied upon by the defendants in their answers.

2d. That the decree having directed rents, issues and profits to be applied "exclusively" to the payment of the mortgage debt, the payment of them over to the defendants for about four years, was in violation of the decree, and a fraud upon the rights of the complainants. That had they been so applied, the mortgage debt would have been fully paid thereby, and the separate and individual property of Graham been left liable to be taken under complainants' execution.

By statement furnished by the receiver, Moseley, and appended to 328 bill, and which is admitted to be correct it appears, that the proceeds of the mill amounted to - - - - - - $14,899 60
Sale 1st March, 1847, - - - - - - - $7,481 67

Total receipts by receiver, - - - - - - $22,381 27
From this, deduct the mortgage debt, which on 1st March, 1847, amounted to, - - - - $8,707 90

Leaving balance in hands of receiver of - - $13,673 37

This large balance of $13,673,37 is sought to be absorbed by expenses, not one item of which does the receiver say is correct, or was paid by him, or even known to him, and to support which not a single voucher is produced, and every item of which is without dates, yet the Court below allowed them.

If the Court will take the trouble to examine this formidable list of expenses, it will be irresistibly forced to the conclusion that they have been trumped up for the occasion. The fact that $13,673 37 of expenses were incurred by a receiver appointed by the Court to sell specified property and collect therefrom $8,707 90, if not evidence of bad management, at least too plainly indicates the nature of the whole transaction, to be easily mistaken. The Court will observe that no authority is shown under which the receiver and commissioner had the right to expend one dollar. The decree directs the proceeds, the rents and profits, to be applied exclusively to the payment of the mortgage debt. A receiver has no powers not expressly granted him in the order appointing him. For powers of a receiver, see 2 Story Eq., 134-5.

3d. The reason assigned in all the books for the appointment of a receiver is, that the fund or property may be taken out of the hands of the debtor and a waste thereof prevented. It was a fraud, therefore, to permit it to remain in the hands of the defendants. 2 Story Eq., 34-5.

4th. Complainants contend that the decree became null and void, and in fact was satisfied by Bellamy's taking the notes of Moseley, the receiver and commissioner, for the debt—(see testimony of Budd, which contains copies of notes,) and that neither Moseley nor Bellamy had a right to keep the same alive so as to hold the property, Barnard, Adams & Co. vs. Moseley, Receiver.—Argument of Counsel.

329 and that he had no right to sell under the same. Noy's Maxims—Reed vs. Pruynn, 7 John. R., 426. Sherman vs. Boyce, 15 John. R., 443. Martin vs. Condy, 1 How. S. C. R., 417.

5th That when a creditor has two funds out of which to make his debt, and another has only one, a Court of Equity will compel him having the two funds to resort to that first on which the other has no claim. 1 Story Eq., 588.

In this case there were three funds or species of property out of which to make the mortgage debt. 1st. The partnership property of Graham and Gelzer. 2d. The individual and separate property of Gelzer contained in the mortgage. 3d. The individual and separate property of Graham contained in the mortgage.

As these three funds confessedly amount to much more than is necessary to pay the mortgage debt, the two first mentioned classes should have been exhausted before the third (which alone is responsible for debt of complainants) was taken. Instead of pursuing this equitable rule, the order has been reversed, and the individual and separate property of Graham has been exhausted, leaving most of that belonging to Gelzer individually, untouched. In this way complainants have been deprived of all remedy, and their debt made a total loss.

Archer, for appellee.

The bill alleges a judgment in November, 1845, in favor of complainants against Graham. This is almitted by defendant. Also, that in May, 1843, judgment or decree was rendered upon a mortgage executed by Graham and Gelzer. The decree is exhibited, see page 10. The bill again alleges that the receiver, under instructions from William Bellamy, held the mortgaged property nearly four years, so that the same could not be levied on by complainants, and that such proceedings hindered and delayed creditors. The answers satisfactorily explain the conduct of the receiver and of Bellamy, and deny the fraud, and no proof is adduced to the contrary.

The arrangement intended by the decree was virtually this, that the mortgagors, notwithstanding the foreclosure, should continue in possession, and be allowed further time to redeem the mortgage of Bellamy's estate. This was no fraud upon Barnard, Adams & Co. On the contrary, it was to their benefit. If Graham actually got 330 $14,000, which should have been paid to Bellamy's estate, but which was not paid, he is the better able to pay Barnard, Adams, & Co. It is clear that the delay was for the benefit of the debtors, to assist them and improve their means, and consequently operated rather to the benefit of their other creditors.

The bill further alleges that Noah and Arthur belonged to Graham, and this is admitted; also, that the land and mill belonged to Graham, but this is denied. These last were the joint property of Graham and Gelzer. The bill also alleges and admits that the other slaves belonged to Gelzer. Complainants insist that including the property of Graham and Gelzer in one mortgage is a fraud. But no fraud in fact is proved, and certainly cannot be inferred from the mortgage.

The bill then charges that the rents and profits of the mill for four years were sufficient to pay the mortgage debt. This is denied by the answers, and no proof to the contrary is adduced. The bill refers to Moseleys accounts to prove the allegations last mentioned, and charges that the credits claimed are "vamped up" by Graham and Gelzer for the occasion. But no proof is offered to sustain any part of the complainants' charges and insinuations.

The bill then charges that Moseley sold in March, 1845, all of Graham's property and only a part of Gelzer's and that he should have raised the money exclusively out of Gelzer's property, so as to leave Graham's property subject to the execution of complainants. But it seems that more of Gelzer's property was sold than of Graham's, and certainly there is no justice in the position that all of Gelzer's property should have been sold to pay the whole debt when there was property of his joint debtor equally bound.

The bill charges that York, March, another slave and the mules belonged to Graham, and that Moseley took them and sold them, although they were not a part of the mortgaged property. This charge, if true, would only show that Barnard, Adams, & Co. had a lien on this property under their execution, and that they were very negligent in not pressing their execution against the property. But unfortunately for complainants, the answers show that York and March and the mules belonged to Gelzer, and that he sold them in preference to and in substitution of his slaves named in the mortgage.

The foregoing covers all the material allegations of the bill. They are sufficiently denied by the answers, and the cause was set down 331 for hearing and finally heard as to all the defendants but Bailey, upon bill and answers and papers on file. What has become of Bailey's interest? who represents him does not appear. Indeed as to him, the case is still before the Circuit Court.

It was insisted in argument that Moseley's notes to Bellamy, given as collateral, amounted to a payment and discharge of the mortgage. This is not averred in the bill, but if this be true, it is too clear for argument that Barnard, Adams, & Co. had a complete remedy at law. The incumbrance being removed by the satisfaction, Graham's property was left subject to levy.

It was also insisted that the receiver being under injunction, had no right to pay over the proceeds of the sales to the mortgage debt, or to Graham and Gelzer; but the sale was on 1st March, and the payments were made on that day. The injunction was issued and served in July—Moseley paid Bailey, administrator, on 1st March, out of the sales, the following sums:

$3,822 50—81 00—233 50—2,105 00—Total, $6,241 50
Whole amount sales, - - - - $7,583 50

Balance, being bids for York and March, $1,342 00
Moseley also paid on the balance of $1,001 60
Net profits of the mill the amount of 720 00
Balance profits mill in hand when injunction was served, and not more than enough to pay expenses, - - $281 60

So that, before the injunction was served, all the moneys beyond expenses were paid over, except the bids for York and March. These slaves belonged to Gelzer. What equity has Barnard, Adams & Co. against that fund?

But suppose, for the sake of argument, that on the 1st March after the sale, Moseley, really had $14,000, the profits of the mill, and $8000 the sales of the property, was it not his duty to reserve enough to pay Bailey, as administrator, and to return the balance to Graham and Gelzer, or to the Court? If so, the surplus is exactly in the proper hands—Moseley would have no right to pay any but the mortgage debt.

But if Barnard, Adams, & Co. had any equities against the funds 332 in the receiver's hands, they have been so negligent as to have lost their claim. They had a judgment, an execution, made no complaint, filed no bill, their attorney was at the sale, became a bidder, and he and they laid by until the proceeds, excepting the bids for York and March, were paid over. And four months afterwards they file a bill of complaint. To sanction such proceedings would be to advertise premiums for negligence, and to entrap diligence and punctuality.

So far as the receiver is concerned, and the fund in his hands, the bill cannot be sustained, for a receiver is but the agent and representative of the Court, and cannot sue or be sued without the permission and sanction of the Court.

HAWKINS, J.

It is contended that the decree made in this case, to which Bellamy, executor of Abram Bellamy, Mathers, Blackburn, Graham, Gelzer, and others, were parties, is fraudulent, as tending to defeat, delay and hinder creditors. If this was the case, the duty of the Court would be a very plain one—but we cannot see that there was any fraud in the transactions. It was arranged by the decree that Gelzer and Graham should deliver the possession of the real estate, mill property and slaves and increase to W. D. Moseley. the receiver and commissioner appointed by the Court, to be sold by him, after thirty days' notice, as he may be directed by complainants, or either of them, and the proceeds to be applied to the Bellamy debt, and that in the meantime, Moseley was to receive, take charge of and manage the concerns of the mill, the issues and profits of which were to be exclusively applied to the discharge of the debt due to Bellamy.

Moseley did not take actual possession of the mill for the purpose of working it, but left it in the possession of Gelzer and Graham to be used by them. The possession of these individuals must be regarded as the possession of Moseley, and they could have been compelled to attorn to him if he had deemed it necessary. It has been seen by the terms of the decree, that the property could have been sold at any time at the instance of Bellamy. Moseley, for the purpose of procuring time for Gelzer and Graham, to enable them to pay their debt to Bellamy, becomes security for the amount of the mortgage debt, and by way of indemnity to him, and security to Bellamy, the 333 decree was made. The property was left in the possession of Graham and Gelzer, because they understood the management of the mill, and Moseley trusted to their integrity and honesty to manage the mill property, and hoped, he says, that the receipts of the mill would contribute to reduce the debt due by Graham and Gelzer. That in 1847, property having risen in value, the property, by consent of all parties, was sold

We cannot see any fraud in this decree, or any thing calculated to hinder or defeat creditors, but it seems merely an arrangement for the purpose of enabling debtors to liquidate their debts by the retention and use of, rather than by sale of the property. Indeed the tendency of the arrangement was rather intended to benefit the other creditors of Graham by the prevention of a summary sale of his property under execution, and in ratio to the amounts paid Bellamy out of the profits of the property mortgaged, to that extent would the chances of the creditors of Graham be increased. Of course a Court of Equity would not permit a fund to be locked up for the purpose of securing it from creditors, even under a decree of a Court, but a party complaining of such a procedure, would have an adequate remedy by an appeal to the equitable side of the Court, which on proper showing, would compel the parties to that decree, to proceed and sell or do what might be deemed equitable. But no steps are taken until the property mortgaged is sold. It is alleged in the bill and urged in argument, that the profits of the mill for four years were sufficient to have paid off the debt due to Bellamy. This is negatived by the answers, and the account of the profits, expenses, &c., if not surcharged or falsified by the complainants, and therefore, we must take it as true and correct. We do not concur with the counsel for complainants, that it was the duty of Moseley to have sold exclusively the property of Gelzer. It was a joint debt, and their joint property as contained in the mortgage, was the property which should have been sold. The record shows, too, that more of Gelzer's property than Graham's was sold. Noah, Arthur, and Mary were the property of Graham, and the rest of the negroes, seven in number, were the property of Gelzer, as well as the mules, and that the mill property was owned jointly. The complainants show no ground for a subrogation to the rights of Graham, for the above reason, and further that Gelzer states in his answer, that Graham owes about three thousand dollars.

It is contended that the note given by Moseley to Bellamy extin- 334 guished the mortgage. There is no allegation of this in the bill, but admitting this, the property of Graham would have been released from the lien of the mortgage and the effect of the decree, and the complainants should have levied their execution upon the property of Graham, and this question could have been settled at law upon a trial of the right of property. It was certainly the duty of Moseley to have paid the debt to the estate of Bellamy, and as to the surplus, if any, to have paid it into Court, to abide its final or further order. But whatever steps might have been legally taken by complainants were not taken until the fund was paid over, excepting the amount brought by the sale of York and March, and these negroes were the property of Gelzer and not Graham. Whatever equitable rights complainants may have had upon the funds in the hands of Moseley, we think clearly waived by their negligence.

No bill was filed until the transaction was closed, and as before remarked, if the individual property of Graham was liable to their execution, they should have levied it upon that property. With these views, we think the decree of the Circuit Court should stand. It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the decision of the Court below be affirmed, and that the bill of camplainants be dismissed with costs.

APPENDIX.

The following opinions have been written out by Judge BALTZELL who decided the cases in the Court below, and are published at his request, as an appendix to this volume of Reports:

WOODS VS. BAILEY, ADMINISTRATOR.

The facts of this case are briefly as follows: In March, 1840, Ransom J. Roberts sold to William H. Williams a tract of land containing 600 acres, lying in Jefferson County, retaining the possession and giving no title but mere agreement "to make out a clear title to the lands and to hold himself responsible for all claims against it." Williams gave his note for $4000, with interest at ten per cent, per annum "for value received in land," payable to the order of Roberts, being in fact the purchase money. This note Roberts traded to Bellamy "for cotton delivered to him," giving also his endorsement on the note.

This note with others due to Bellamy, remained unpaid until the 20th October, 1842, when, according to the allegations of the bill Roberts having gone to Alabama, entered into an arrangement with Bellamy by which he confessed judgment for his entire indebtedness including also this note. Bellamy agreed in a separate instrument, amongst other things, "to release Roberts as endorser of Williams' note and upon the debt and interest of the judgment thereon, on Roberts' giving a full, perfect and complete title to the 600 acres of land, the incumbrance of the Union Bank and all others to be first discharged, &c., said conveyance to be either to said John or said Williams as said John may direct, so that said Williams may be compelled to pay said note; said Ransom to make said conveyance and discharge all incumbrances on said land within 90 days from the date hereof." This agreement was dated 22d October, 1842. On the first of June, 1843, Roberts tendered a conveyance which Bellamy refused to accept, alleging, according to one witness, "that the land in question was not worth the money mentioned in the deed;" according to another, "that he could not give the consideration of $4000 for the land, but was willing to give what it was worth ac-338 cording to the valuation of the witness." This tender was made 223 days after the date of the agreement.

After Bellamy's refusal to accept, Roberts sold the land to Woods for $2000, and the present bill is filed by the representative of Bellamy, to have a sale of the land by decree of Court to pay the note of $4000, insisting that there is an equitable lien through it in their favor against all persons.

That there was such a lien in favor of Roberts for the payment of the note of $4000 is not contested. He held possession of the land and retained the titles until payment. By the transfer of the note, he gets payment from Bellamy, becoming the trustee to make title when Williams should pay the note to Bellamy, or to hold it subject to be sold in favor of any holder of the note in case of Williams' not paying. He was not, and could not by possibility, be owner, otherwise than by taking up the note himself. Such a case is regarded as analagous to that of a mortgage taken to secure the purchase money, and in case of mortgage it is a well established principle, and so held by our Supreme Court in Preston vs. Stewart, that the assignment of the note carries all its securities with it. 1 Florida, 10. A decision expressly in point to the present one was made by the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, in a case tried before that Court. Ritchie purchased certain town lots, obtained a conveyance, and gave his bonds for the purchase money. The lots having been bought at a sale under a decree of foreclosure against Ritchie, suit was brought against the purchasers by an assignee of one of the bonds given for the purchase money, to have the lots sold again in payment of this claim, and the Court allowed it, asserting the general principle that "if a vendor of land have an equitable lien upon it for the purchase money, it passes to the assignee of the note given by the vendee and the assignee may enforce his lien." Poston vs. Eubank, 3 J. J. Marsh. 45. 5 Monroe, 285.

If conveyance had indeed been made in the first instance by Roberts, so that he had a mere equity, then the assignment might not have this effect.

The right of the lien being unquestionable, it remains to inquire into the effect of the agreement made with Roberts in Alabama. By it, Roberts was to have a release on his conveying "the land in Jefferson to Bellamy or to Williams, as Bellamy might direct, the conveyance to be within 90 days." We have here the case of a debtor 339 compounding with his creditor, who consents to receive something else than money in discharge of his judgment. The rules and principles pertaining to such a case, are quite familiar, and have been long since ascertained and declared by repeated decisions of the Courts. "A composition is not binding upon a creditor unless its conditions are strictly performed." Amb., 332. Forsyth's Comp. Cred., 26.

"The Court will not dispense with the point of time in compositions. Therefore, whatever the accident in which happens to the debtor, it shall not affect the creditor who has compounded to take a less sum than the original debt." Again, "this Court has been so strict in regard to compositions, that, if there be an agreement to pay the compounded sum at a day certain, and the person fails, they will not relieve him, but he must pay the whole debt to the creditor." 2 Atkins, 526. Leigh vs. Barry, 3 Atkins, 585.

"All the cases hold, that, if the terms of the composition agreement be not exactly followed out by at least a tender of the substituted securities at the very day, the creditor is remitted to his remedy for the whole original debt." Fellows vs. Stephens, 24 Wend., 302. "There is a distinction between a private accord of the immediate parties and one which is common to them and other creditors. In the latter case, a tender satisfaction will do; in the former, there must be an actual acceptance—as between them and the defendant alone there could be no satisfaction short of an actual payment to the full extent of the debt, or the acceptance of a collateral thing. A mere accord is no bar, even though satisfaction be tendered." Ibid., 299.

In Strong vs. Holmes, 7 Cowen, 225, it is decided that "giving and accepting some third thing, as a conveyance of land, in satisfaction of a debt due by bond, is a good satisfaction," and the American Editor of Smith's Leading Cases remarks "that the cases there reviewed, show that 'if such satisfaction be specially pleaded, the plea must allege that the matter was given and accepted in full satisfaction of the amount due.'" American Notes to Smith's Leading Cases, 326.

In the case of the Brooklyn Bank vs. DeGraw, the defence was an agreement to accept a deed of trust of a house and lot in Brooklyn to sell in payment of the debt, &c., the Court say "even in the 340 case of a tender and refusal of specific chattels which operate to discharge the debt and extinguish the further relation of debtor and creditor, the property of the article is deemed to vest in the creditor, and the parties afterwards stand in the relation of bailor and bailee. If the tender in this case was valid at all, an interest, I apprehend, vested in the Bank, which would enable it to enforce the securities, &c. But waiving all this, it is sufficient to say that the tender here it not governed by the rules applicable to specific chattels. It is like a tender of money or things that may be brought into Court. In such a case, defendant pleads that he has been and still is ready with the money or things tendered, and it must be in Court on the trial." 23 Wend., 345.

Independent of all authority, and relying solely upon the fair import of the agreement between the parties, with what color of right may it be maintained that Bellamy should have accepted this deed when tendered? He agreed to release if the conveyance was made in 90 days. It was not made in this time, but in 223 days—133 days after the stipulated time. To compel Bellamy to accept the deed thus tendered, is to force upon him a new bargain, and bind him by a contract to which he never assented.

It is not denied that Courts of Equity, in some instances, have dispensed with time in the execution of agreements, but it is now admitted "that they went beyond the true limit to which jurisdiction of this sort should be confined, as it amounted to a substitution pro tanta of what the parties had not contracted for." 2 Story Eq., 90.

This learned author and jurist, the late Justice Story, quotes with approbation the remarks of Mr. Baron Alderson in Hepwell vs. Knight, 1 Yonge and Collyer, 415. "So also if it appears that the object of one party, known to the other, was, that the property should be conveyed on or before a given period, as the case of a house for a residence and the like, I do not see, therefore, why, if the parties choose even arbitrarily, provided both of them intend so to do, to stipulate for a particular thing to be done in a particular time, such a stipulation is not to be carried literally into effect in a Court of Equity. That is a real contract. The parties had a right to make it. Why then should a Court of Equity interfere to make a new contract which the parties have not made?" 2 Story Eq., 86, n.

341 The rules on the specific performance of contracts, even if applicable, will be found not to aid the case of Roberts. They are "that there has been no change of circumstances affecting the character or justice of the contract," "that compensation for the delay can be fully made," "that he who asks is in a condition to perform his part of the contract," "that he has shewn himself ready, desirous, prompt and eager to perform it," "that the remedies of the parties be mutual, and that a performance will never be decreed where only one party is bound by the agreement." 2 Story Eq., 89. Fonb., 441, id., 48, n. 327. 1 John. Chy., 282, 373—4.

If mutuality be one of the requisites, the present case has not that feature, the agreement being that of Bellamy and not of Roberts. It was not signed by Roberts and imposed no obligation upon him. The agreement was signed by Bellamy alone, and bound him to allow Roberts the privilege of releasing the judgment and not by a transfer of the land. Roberts was not bound and under no obligation to convey the land to Bellamy. Indeed not a single one of these requisites has Roberts fulfilled or performed; with none could he have complied if an applicant for specific performance, and I have considered the case most favorably to him, in regarding him as an applicant for the benefit of the release, whilst the case before the Court is that of a party praying that a lien be enforced, the existence of which being admitted, the only question is, whether he has waived or discharged it.

It would be a strange kind of equity to permit Roberts not only to retain the land, but to have the benefit of the release too. This would be to allow him to retain the $4000 received from Bellamy, the price of the land as agreed with Williams, and then sell the same land to another purchaser for $2000 more.

But is it not most clear and obvious that the release cannot exist or prevail unless the title vests in Bellamy? The one is the consideration for the other. If the tender was good, the title vested independent of the acceptance of Bellamy, and by this means alone Roberts was entitled to his release. If there was no tender or an insufficient one, there could be no release.

I have considered the case so far without reference to Woods, whose answer removes all difficulty as to him. He does not pretend that he is a purchaser for value without notice. On the contrary, he 342 admits notice. He is then bound by the equities and state of facts existing at the time between Bellamy and Roberts.

HUNTER, ADM'R, VS. BRADFORD, ADM'R. CARPENTER AND WIFE. ET AL., VS. MCBRIDE, ET AL.

On the 22d December, 1839, Leigh Read sold to Archibald R. S. Hunter his plantation of 940 acres of land—20 negroes, with planting utensils, hogs, cattle, oxen, mules, corn and fodder, and household and kitchen furnitture, for $27,500, to be paid in part upon the delivery of the property on the 1st of January, 1840, in promissory notes of Mrs. McBride, secured by Mrs. McBride and C. H. Dupont and Daniel McBride, and the widow, to be paid in annual instalments as may be agreed upon.

On the 2d of January, 1840, Read made a bill of sale of the 20 negroes, and on the same day took Hunter a mortgage of them providing for the payment of $18,500 in three promissory notes due in one, two and three years. The land was not conveyed, but Read bound himself on or before the 1st of January, 1843, or in case of his death his heir or heirs within a reasonable time after his decease (if each heir be of full age,) and if not, then his executors or administrators, upon the reasonable request of said Hunter, to make deeds, &c.

In February, 1845, the administrator of Read obtained judgment against Hunter's administrator for the sum of $9,432, being the sum supposed to be due upon this sale and purchase. The present suit is instituted in chancery by the administrator of Hunter to enjoin this judgment on the ground, 1st, that there is an incumbrance in favor of the Union Bank. 2d, That the estate of Read is insolvent and unable to answer in damages for the breach of his covenant to make titles.

There was incumbrance on part of the property sold, to wit, the land and 13 of the negroes, but this objection is obviated by the discharge of the incumbrance, the parties having agreed "that the property sold by the execution of the Union Bank vs. Read's administrator brought $5079, $4754 of which sum was received by the Bank in full satisfaction of their execution against Read's estate, and of 343 their lien upon the property sold by Read to Archibald Hunter." Thus has been done through the agency of the law what it was the agreement of Hunter with Read to do, and what the Court itself would have directed to be done without any agreement.

As at first agreed, the property was to have been put in the Life and Trust Bank; afterwards the agreement was to put it in the Union Bank. It was already mortgaged to the latter, having been bought by Read from Havis, as his mortgage recites. Both James Hunter and Bembry say that A. R. S. Hunter "purchased the Union Bank stock, and was to substitute his mortgage for Gen. Read's. James Hunter says "Gen. Read told me if I would pay his stock note he would not only credit the note of A. R. S. Hunter, as I had bought my brother's interest in the land and negroes, but that he would allow me to take to myself an assignment of his stock and mortgage the same." In a memo. in the hand writing of General Read found amongst the papers of A. R. S. Hunter and presented by his administrator, a credit is allowed Hunter of $8000 on account of the stock.

A purchaser has the right independent of agreement, to discharge an incumbrance. He need not wait until he is evicted, but may satisfy the incumbrance and then resort to this action on the covenant. 7 John., 358. 16 John., 254. If the estate is subject to an incumbrance, the purchaser should apply to the Court for leave to buy off the charge and pay the residue into the Bank. 1 Sugden Vend., 61. 2 Daniel Chy. Prac., 1458, Per. Ed. The Court made an order to relieve the estate from incumbrance. 13 Vesey, 80.

Hunter then would be entitled to a credit upon his purchase to the extent of this payment to the Bank.

In addition to this, A. R. S. Hunter sold this property to his brother James, who was to pay the heirs what was due to them. How then, can he complain of breach of covenant, of incumbrance, &c.? Now as to the personal property mortgaged, it is well settled, that on the failure to pay as provided by the deed, the legal right of the property becomes vested in Read—he then became the owner on the 2d of January, 1843, and had the legal right to sell. Philips vs. Hawkins, 1 Florida, 268.

A second ground is the inability to answer the covenant for the breach of covenants.

There is no allegation that Hunter has been evicted from the land 344 or disturbed in his possession either of the land or negroes, nor is it pretended that there is a superior or better title in any one else. Is there any thing in the remaining objection that titles were not made on the 1st of January, 1843? By the terms of the agreement, in case of Read's death, his heir or heirs within a reasonable time after his decease, if of full age, if not, then his executors on reasonable request, were to make conveyance. Now it is not pretended that request has ever been made, there is no allgation in the bill nor is there proof of any, so that his right would be by no means clear in a Court of law. Complainant applies to a Court of Equity and must have conscience, good faith and reasonable diligence to call its powers into action. 17 Peters, 179. 9 Peters, 416. "He must show that he has been in no default in not having performed the agreement, and that he has taken all proper steps to performance on his part." 2 Story Eq., 771. "If a purchaser when he made his contract, knew that there was a defect in the title, and that it would take a considerable time to remove it, or if he acquiesces in the delay or proceeds with knowledge of the defect in the execution of the contract, he cannot complain." 2 Rob. Prac., 177. 4 Randolph, 481. 4 Call, 288.

We see here that no demand has been made for titles—that complainant never furnished endorsed notes agreeably to his obligation as part payment—that he has entered into the possession and had the use of the property—cultivated the land, taking its proceeds and profits—using the negroes and having the benefit of their labor for nine years, thus acquiescing in the delay of the title, indeed that the only complaint is of an incumbrance that he could have removed himself, and was by his agreement bound to remove, and which before the trial, was wholly removed; where then is the equity to enjoin?

Another view of the subject will show the entire groundlessness of the application. The rent of the land, the hire of the negroes for nine years, with the prices of the corn, mules, furniture, cattle, farming utensils, &c., would at least estimate, have largely exceeded Hunter's payments and the amount of the Bank execution.

Rent of 400 acres cleared land, 9 years, $1 per acre,	$3,600
Hire 10 negroes, (half the number) $150 each, per year,	13,500

Carpenter and wife vs. Read's Adm'r.—Opinion of Justice BALTZELL.

345 Corn, fodder, mules, &c., 5,000

$22,100

Payments by Hunter to the Bank, 13,888

Excess, $8,212

The amount of the purchase money with interest to the 22d January, 1849, the date of the master's report, is $47,443 73, the payments by Hunter to the Bank amount to $13,888, interest about $7000, making an aggregate of $20,888, leaving unpaid and due to Read's estate $26,455 73. So that the effect of the grant of the injunction will be to release Hunter's estate from the payment of this large debt, and make him owner of a large amount of property with the rent and hire, and without any equivalent or consideration. On the pretext of an incumbrance of $5,009 he is to be acquitted of a debt of $26,000. In this computation, I have excluded the McBride obligation, the ownership being contested; the master's report credits Hunter with the McBride obligation and $8,466, the Bank stock. This will be to rescind and dissolve the contract and nullify on the part of Read, whilst it is permitted to remain in operation so as to give to Hunter's estate all the benefits and advantages of it. If the contract is to be rescinded so as to deprive Read of the purchase money, Hunter should restore the negroes, and a mutual return by each be made of money paid, of negroes, rents and profits; neither should be permitted to retain any portion of the proceeds of the contract.

I now proceed to the second branch of the case—that of Carpenter and wife vs. Read's Administrator. These parties claim that the McBride obligation shall be paid to them and not to Read's administrator. They admit that it was delivered by Hunter as collateral security in pursuance though not in full compliance with the agreement with Read. There is no distinct ground asserted in the bill for this claim by the complainants. The most that can be made of their bill is, that they claim as distributees of their father, alleging in general terms "that the balance due on said obligation ought to be paid to them in equal proportions—that Read's estate is insolvent, and A. R. S. Hunter's also will be insolvent."

346 There is no question as to validity of the sale of the land and negroes by A. R. S. Hunter to McBride, as the heirs expressly ratified and confirmed it after they came of age, and their confirmation makes the matter as binding as if they had been of full age and assanted to the bargain when made.

The only question is as to the power and authority of A. R. S. Hunter, as guardian, to assign and transfer the obligation and of their right to intercept the fund from a third person. The obligation was payable to A. R. S. Hunter, individually, as guardian—he had the clear right to receive the money and to give a discharge and release it—he also had the right to assign it.

This subject is so well and ably treated, and the authorities on the subject so fully considered by the late Chancellor Kent, in the case of Field vs. Schieffelin, as to leave nothing farther to desire in its solution.

"That he, the guardian, had a legal control over that bond and mortgage, and a right to collect and receive the money due thereon, and a legal right to sell and assign the same in the due exercise of his discretion as guardian, is a proposition that does not seem to admit of dispute. The bond was not due when it was assigned to the plaintiff, but if the money was wanting for the purpose of the trust, either for discharging incumbrances or for making more advantageous investments, or for payment of debts and for the better maintenance and education of the ward, or for any purpose whatever connected with the faithful discharge of the trust and beneficial to the infant, the guardian had just and lawful authority to raise the money by the assignment of the bond and mortgage. The necessity or expediency of the measure rested entirely, in the judgment and discretion of the guardian. He was as between him and the purchaser the proper and exclusive judge of that expediency. It was not the duty or business of the purchaser to enquire into the necessity of the assignment, or to see to the application of the purchase money. He had the right to presume in the absence of all direct and plain proof to the contrary, that the guardian was exercising his power fairly and faithfully in conformity with his duty. If there was any fraud or collusion between the plaintiff and guardian, or if the plaintiff knew or was sufficiently informed when he accepted of the bond and mortgage that the guardian had in contemplation a breach of trust, and intended to misapply the moneys, then I apprehend, that the 347 plaintiff must be deemed to have taken the bond and mortgage in trust for the infant. In every instance the guardian acts under responsibility to his ward for the faithful and judicious of his trust, but the stranger who deals with him justly and fairly has a right to presume that he acts for the benefit of the infant, and he does not partake of that responsibility until the presumption of fair dealing is destroyed by evidence of fraud or collusion." 7 John. Ch., 155.

In the case under consideration, there is no charge of fraud, collusion or unfair dealing on the part either of Read or Hunter, and the evidence throughout establishes the contray. Where then is pretext for intercepting this fund at the instance of these heirs? Indeed it is difficult to resist the belief that their claim was an afterthought. In February, 1845, judgment was botained by Read allowing credit for this obligation as a payment. In December, 1845, James M. Hunter, the adm'r of A. R. S. Hunter, files his supplemental bill, claiming this obligation under oath, to be the property of the estate of A. R. S. Hunter. It is only in June, 1847, five years after these parties had ratified the sale by their brother A. R. S. Hunter, that the heirs for the first time assert their claim. During this time the subject was for the most part in controversy in the Courts, and it is incredible that they could during all this time have been ignorant of their rights. This of itself should be regarded as a ratification. The omission to disaffirm a contract within a reasonable time has been held sufficient evidence of ratification. In Holmes vs. Bloog, the Court thought four months sufficient. This principle, says the Chief Justice, is recommended by its justice and general convenience. It is unjust that the infant after his arrival at maturity and the lapse of a reasonable time, should hold the scales in his hands and decide as future circumstances should incline. 8 Taunt., 35-39. His confirmation may be justly inferred after he has come of age, from his positive acts in favor of the contract, or from his tacit assent under circumstances not to excuse his silence. Slight acts and circumstances will be ground from which to infer assent. 2 Kent., 195, 237. Acquiescence merely for an unreasonable time is an act that denotes an intent not to rescind the contract. 6 Conn., 506 9 Vern., 368.

Here we have the express ratification by these heirs after they 348 came of age of the sale by their guardian of their land and negroes —a ratification made to the party then indebted for the purchase money—obviously that was the time to have asserted their right, and to have claimed it. They did nothing of the kind. So far from it, according to the testimony of the witness on being presented the deed, they hesitated to sign, alleging "they had never received any thing for it, but when I showed them the obligation of A. R. S. Hunter, they said they were willing to be bound by it." I can regard this in no other light than a ratification as well of the transfer of the obligation as of the principal sale. At all events, there was notice express and direct with silence and acquiescence for the period of five years, sufficient to have barred an ordinary debt by the statute of limitation, connected with the additional fact that they in the meantime permitted their brother, the administrator of A. R. S. Hunter, to claim it on the part of the estate in a bill filed in Court for that purpose.

These Claimants too, are heirs and distributees of this estate, and a claim on their part comes with a very questionable grace. Indeed I have not been able to resist the conviction that the entire arrangement was a family concern, the purchase being in the name of the elder brother, but for the benefit of his brothers and sisters. They all united in the sale to McBride, they were together in the other purchases, and the testimony would seem very clearly to show co-operation.

On the whole case, I see no reason to grant the injunction, nor to deny the right of Read's estate to the McBride obligation.

NOTE.—The reporter in consenting to publish the foregoing opinions of Judge Baltzell as an appendix to this volume of Reports, does not thereby intend to indicate a concurrence with the views taken and expressed by the learned Judge. On the contrary, he sees no reason to be dissatisfied with the opinions of the Supreme Court. The opinions are published merely to give the views which Judge B. entertained in the Court below.

ADDITIONAL GENERAL RULES

ADOPTED BY THE SUPREME COURT, AT ITS SESSION AT TALLAHASSEE, JANUARY, 1852.

Ordered, That hereafter upon every appeal in Chancery causes, the appellant shall file with the transcript of the record a petition of appeal, in which the grounds upon which a reversal of the decree is placed shall be distinctly and plainly set forth; and counsel for appellant will not be permitted in argument to insist upon any matters except such as are so stated and set forth.

Ordered, That hereafter when any appeal shall be entered in any Circuit Court, whether the case be in Equity or at Law, it shall be the duty of the party Appellant, at the time of entering his or her appeal, to apply to the Clerk of the Circuit Court from which the appeal is taken, or the Clerk of this court or some of the Deputies, to issue a citation requiring the Appellee or Respondent to be and appear at the next ensuing term of this court to which the appeal is returnable, to show cause, if any he can, why the judgment or decree appealed from should not be reversed; and that said writ of citation shall be served and returned in like manner as a writ of scire facias ad audiendum errores, upon a writ of error sued out: Provided, however, that this rule shall not be deemed applicable to any cause where the appeal shall have been prayed and allowed in open court during the term wherein the judgment or decree appealed from shall have been made or passed.

DECISIONS
OF THE
Supreme Court of Florida
AT
JANUARY TERM, 1851.

The following acts, organizing the Supreme Court of Florida, were passed at the late session of the General Assembly; and the questions which are discussed in the first opinion delivered by the court, arising under the provisions of the laws in reference to Circuit Judges, having been brought before the court, it is deemed proper for the better understanding of the subject, to publish so much of the said acts as have relation to the matter.

AN ACT to organize the Supreme Court of the State of Florida.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Florida in General Assembly convened. That, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand, eight hundred and fifty-one, the Supreme Court of the State of Florida shall be composed of one Chief Justice and two Associate Justices, who shall be chosen and elected according to the provisions of the constitution, and hold their offices for eight years.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That said Chief Justice and Associate Justices shall each receive for his services, an annual salary of two thousand dollars, to be paid quarterly at the treasury.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the Justices of the Supreme Court shall hold four terms of the said court in each and every year—that is to say, one term at Tallahassee, in the middle circuit, on the first Monday in January; one term at Jacksonville, in the eastern circuit, on the third Monday of February; one term at Tampa, in the southern circuit, on the first Monday of March; and one term at 2 Marianna, in the western circuit, on the third Monday of March: Provided, however, That said Justices may have power to order special terms or sessions of said court, whenever, from any cause the regular terms could not be held, and whenever the public service may require the same: And provided further, that for the year 1851, there shall be but one term of the Supreme Court, to be held at Tallahassee, on the first Monday in January, or as soon thereafter as organized, which court shall hear and determine all cases before them from every circuit in the State.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That the Supreme Court, when in session at Jacksonville, in the eastern circuit, shall hear and determine all appeals and writs of errors, and all other matters of jurisdiction, brought from, or which shall arise in, the eastern circuit; and when in session at Tampa, in the southern circuit, shall hear and determine all appeals and writs of error, and all other matters of jurisdiction, brought from, or which shall arise in, the southern circuit; and when in session at Tallahassee, in the middle circuit, shall hear and determine all appeals and writs of error, and all other matters of jurisdiction, brought from or which shall arise in, the middle circuit; and when in session at Marianna, in the western circuit, shall hear and determine all appeals and writs of error, and all other matters of jurisdiction, brought from or which shall arise in, the western circuit: Provided, That no Justice of said court shall sit upon the determination of any case which he may have decided as Circuit Judge, or in which he may have been engaged as counsel: And provided, That by agreement of parties, any case may be heard and decided by the court at either of its sessions.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That whenever, from any cause, any one or two Justices of the Supreme Court are disqualified or disabled from hearing and determining any cause brought before them, it shall be the duty of the Jus-
3 tices of the said court to notify the same to any one or two Judges of the Circuit Court, as the case may be, and the time and place when such causes shall be set for hearing; and it is hereby made the duty of such Circuit Judge or Judges, upon receiving such notice, to attend at the time and place designated, and he or they shall be, and are hereby, invested in full authority, in conjunction with the remaining Justice or Justices of the Supreme Court, to hear and determine the causes of which they were notified as aforesaid.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That, in the event of the death, resignation or removal from the State of any one of the Justices of said court, the Governor of this State shall appoint some suitable person who shall supply the vacancy, until the same is filled by the General Assembly.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That, from and after the said first day of January, in the year one thouseand eight hundred and fifty-one, all laws and parts of laws conflicting with or coming within the purview of this act, shall be repealed

[Passed the House of Representatives, December 20, 1850. Passed the Senate, January 6, 1851. Approved by the Governor, January 11, 1851.]

First section of An Act to amend An Act to organize the Supreme Court of the State of Florida.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Florida in General Assembly convened, That, whenever one or more Judges of the Circuit Court shall, under the provisions of the fifth section of the act to which this is an amendment, hear and determine causes in the Supreme Court, the said Judge or Judges of the Circuit Court, for the time during which he or they shall be so engaged in hearing and determining said causes, shall be and constitute a part of the Supreme Court of the State 4 of Florida, anything in the act to which this is an amendment to the contrary notwithstanding.

[Passed the House of Representatives, January 22, 1851. Passed the Senate, January 23, 1851. Approved by the Governor, January 24, 1851.]

The eighth section of the fifth article of the constitution does not render a Judge of the Circuit Court ineligible to the office of Justice of the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court is established by the imperative terms of the constitution, and by the third section of the fifth article, the powers of the court were vested in, and its duties directed to be performed by, the Judges of the several Circuit Courts, for the term of five years from their election, and thereafter, until the General Asembly should otherwise provide. The General Assembly, by the acts of January 11th, 1851, and January 24th, 1851, has not otherwise provided altogether, but in part only. The powers of the Circuit Judges, as Judges of the Supreme Court, have not been taken away, or dispensed with. On the contrary, their services are, by the fifth section of the one, and the first section of the other, expressly required and retained in the cause therein specified.

The fifth section of the act of January 11th, and the first section of the act of January 24th, 1851, are not, therefore, in conflict with the constitution.

In the matter of the authority of the Judges of the Circuit Courts to sit in this court as Justices thereof, THOMPSON, Justice, delivered the opinion of the court.

The fifth section of the act of January 11, 1851, entitled An act to organize the Supreme Court of the State of Florida, provides that, whenever from any cause, any one or two Justices of this Court are disqualified or disabled from hearing and determining any cause brought before them, it shall be the duty of the Justices of this court to notify the same to any one or two Judges of the Circuit Court, as the case may be, and the time and place when such causes shall be set for hearing, and it is made the duty of such Circuit Judge or Judges, upon receiving such notice, to attend at the time and place designated, and he, or they, shall be, and are, invested with full authority, in conjunction with the remaining Justice or Justices of this court, to hear and determine the causes of which they were notified as aforesaid.

And by the first section of the act of January 24, 1851, to amend the foregoing act, it is provided that such Circuit Judge or Judges as may be called on as provided, for the time during which he or they shall be so engaged in hearing and determining causes in this court, shall be and constitute a part of the Supreme Court of the State of Florida.

The contingency mentioned and provided against in the fifth section of the act of January 11, 1851, having arisen in consequence of the disability of two of the Justices of this court, who had been of counsel in several causes pending, and on the calendar for trial, this court proceeded to make the necessary requisitions upon the Judges of the Circuit Courts, to supply the deficiency. But the question of the eligibility of the Judges of the Circuit Courts to election as Justices of this court, having been raised and mooted in the General Assembly during its late session, and the opinion of the Attorney General thereon called for by the House of Representatives, and it being understood that some members of the bar entertained opinions adverse to that of the Attorney General—under these circumstances, the Honorable THOMAS DOUGLAS, Judge of the Circuit Court of the Eastern Circuit, on being requested to preside in the adjudication of several cases, stated these facts, and requested of this court the expression of an opinion on the subject; his Honor holding, that if the opinion of the ineligibility of the Judges of the Circuit Courts to be elected
6 Justices of this court was well founded, it followed, as a legitimate deduction, that they could not legally sit herein, and take part in the adjudication of causes, which the Justices of this court were disabled to hear and determine

For the purpose of satisfying the learned Judge, who was very properly unwilling to assume the exercise of a doubtful power, we consented to consider the question, and for this purpose, invited the members of the bar to discuss it before us. Whether we were wise in thus consenting to consider the subject in its present shape, and to express an opinion thereon, is, in itself, a question of very doubtful propriety; yet we shall feel some gratification if our judgment, although it may be deemed extra judicial, shall possess sufficient weight to put the question at rest.

The decision of the question as presented, involves an inquiry into the constitutionality of the acts of January 11th and 24th, before referred to, so far as they provide for calling in the Judges of the Circuit Courts to assist in the determination of causes in this court. The Judiciary has no direct delegation of power to declare an act of the General Assembly unconstitutional and void, but it is an incidental authority, unavoidably exercised in administering the paramount law of the Constitution. To call this incidental power into action, there must be a suit or judicial proceeding in which a conflict arises, or is supposed to arise, between the Constitution and a statute, and which affects the rights of the parties litigant. In the present case, there is no such suit, or other proceeding before us; and if we had a doubt upon the subject, it would be our duty to decline the expression of any opinion, until the question was directly presented for adjudication. Fearing that a refusal to express our opinions may imply a doubt, which we do not entertain, we proceed to give our views.

The clause of the Constitution which is supposed to render Judges of the Circuit Court ineligible to the office of Justice of the Supreme Court, is the 8th section of the 6th article, and is in the following terms: "No Governor, Justice 7 "of the Supreme Court, Chancellor, or Judge of this State, "shall be eligible to election or appointment to any other "and different station, or office, or post of honor, or emol- "ument, under this State, or to the station of Senator or "Representative in Congress of the United States from "this State, until one year after he shall have ceased to be "such Governor, Justice, Chancellor, or Judge." We have been referred to the opinion given by the Attorney General upon the call of the House of Representatives, and the interpretation which he gives to this clause of the Constitution meets with our entire approbation.

The use of the terms, "any other and different station," &c. would seem to imply that the words other and different were used in contradistinction to each other—they were not to be considered as synonymous, or convertible terms. We concur with him in the belief, that the language employed points not alone to another station or office, but to one which is also different in its structure, character, duties and the nature of its functions. It is to be observed, that the restriction acts alone on the magistracy composing the executive and judicial departments of the government, and it would seem that the convention intended to remove from the officers of those departments all temptation to prostitute the duties of their station to courting popularity, or hunting after other and different stations during the time they so held office, by rendering them ineligible during that period, and for one year afterwards. The Government is created for the purpose of securing the happiness and safety of the people, and nothing can tend so much to the attainment of that end, as that the executive officer shall, without fear, favor, or affection, perform his duty in the enforcement of the laws, and that the officers composing the judicial departments shall preserve the fountains of justice pure and uncorrupted. There are, therefore, obvious reasons 8 why the convention, in the formation of the scheme of government, should have inserted the restriction; but we do not think it should be extended beyond the plain import of the terms used. The promotion of an officer of the judiciary, or his translation to another office or station in the same department, is in no just sense, within the reason and spirit of the Constitution.

We think, however, that the Attorney General might have gone further, and have maintained with equal conclusiveness, that if one holding the commission of Judge of the Circuit Courts of this State, had been elected to be one of the Justices of this court, he would not have been elected even to another office or station, within the meaning of the Constitution.

The 3rd section of the 5th article of the Constitution provides, that, "for the term of five years from the election of "the Judges of the Circuit Courts, and thereafter, until the "General Assembly shall otherwise provide, the powers of "the Supreme Court shall be vested in, and its duties per- "formed by, the Judges of the several Circuit Courts within "this State, and they, or a majority of them, shall hold such "sessions of the Supreme Court, and at such times as may "be directed by law." The Circuit Court Judges, it is clear, were, by force of this provision, Justices or Judges of the Supreme Court for the term of five years, and afterwards, until the Legislature should otherwise provide. An election to the Supreme Court bench would, therefore, be a re-election to the same office which they had held, and the powers of which they had exercised previously. They had performed the duty ever since the organization of the government, and if they continued to perform the same duties and exercise the same powers by virtue of a new commission, and even with a new title, can it be said that they are holding and exercising another office? We think not, and are very clear in our opinion that the Circuit Judges are not ineligible to sit in this court, because of the restriction before referred to.

Was it competent for the General Assembly to make the provision contained in the fifth section of the act of January 11th, 1851? The Supreme Court is established by the imperative terms of the constitution, and by the 3d section of the 5th article, for the term of five years, and thereafter, until the General Assembly should otherwise provide, the Judges who were to preside in the Supreme Court are designated. The powers of the court are vested in, and its duties were to be performed by, the Judges of the Circuit Courts. Has the present General Assembly otherwise provided? It is not pretended that the Legislature has interfered with the organization provided by the constitution, save by the acts of January 11th and 24th, 1851, before referred to, and we must look to these acts for a solution of the question. The Legislature can only deprive the Circuit Court Judges of their constitutional power, as Judges of this court, by the organization of the court, in some mode or manner, so as by express enactment, or necessary implication, their services may be dispensed with, and their power taken away. Although the first section of the act of January 11th, 1851, provides that the Supreme Court shall be composed of one Chief Justice and two Associate Justices, yet the whole act must be taken together; and on referring to the fifth section, we find their services are not dispensed with, or their power to perform the duties of Judges of this court taken away, but by express enactment are retained; thus preventing the necessary implication which would result from the terms of the first section. It is as if the first first section had read—the Supreme Court shall be composed of one Chief Justice, two Associate Justices, and such of the Circuit Judges as may be called in by the Chief and Associate Justices, to supply any defect arising from the disability or disqualification of either one or two of the said Justices. It was well remarked at the bar, that the constitution did not prescribe the number of Judges, but vested that in the discretion of the Legislature. Such a number might have been provided for, as would have rendered a call for the assistance of the Circuit Judges wholly unnecessary, and thus enabled the Legislature to dispense with their services. A proper economy in the infant condition of our State Government, and its scanty exchequer, determined the Legislature to fix the number at three, and to retain the services of the Circuit Judges, and the power given them by the constitution, in the cases mentioned in the fifth section of the act, to prevent a failure or delay of justice. The Legislature foresaw that any lawyer who might be selected for this service, would be interested as counsel in pending litigation, or a judge of one of the Circuit Courts might have decided causes removed into this court for the correction of errors, or the persons selected might be otherwise disqualified or disabled to determine causes brought here for trial, and, therefore, provided against such contingency. The Legislature, we think, has not exercised the power given by the constitution to provide otherwise, so as to supercede the Circuit Court Judges fully and completely, but have done so in part only, leaving still in those functionaries the power to execute the duties and office of Justices of this Court in certain cases. The Legislature has not conferred the power to sit in this court, upon the Judges of the Circuit Court—it is only that they have purposely omitted to take it from them in toto.

We take occasion to return our thanks to the gentlemen of the bar for the argument of the question before us, and to state that we feel great pleasure in the reflection, that the last view we have taken of the subject appears to be the unanimous opinion of the bar, as well as of the court.

TURBUTT R. BETTON, APPELLANT, vs. ROBERT W. WILLIAMS AND THE HEIRS AT LAW OF GENERAL LAFAYETTE, RESPONDENTS.

Where a bill is taken pro confesso, and a final decree passes by default, an appeal cannot be taken.

Under the statute of this State, an appeal may be taken only after a final decree—and, consequently, the appeal opens every question decided by the Chancellor during the progress of the cause, and, also, the regularity of the proceedings therein prior to a default.

A demurrer to a bill, for want of proper parties, is well taken, if the defect appears upon the face of the bill, especially if, on examination, it is found that the persons omitted are indispensable to a complete adjudication of the right of all interested.

Under the general rule in equity, that all persons materially interested in the subject ought to be parties to the suit, either plaintiffs or defendants, the vendors of land should be parties to a suit against the vendee, to enforce the lien of the purchase money on the land; and this rule applies where they have assigned the bonds or notes given for the price of the land, if there are any remaining rights or liabilities of the assignors which may be affected by the decree. Where there are such rights, or the assignment is not absolute and unconditional, or the extent or vitality of the assignment is denied, then an assignor is not only a proper, but a necessary party.

Where there is a contract to make title to land, upon payment of a certain sum of money, though the bond securing the payment of the money is assigned, yet the obligation remains to make the title, when the condition is performed; and this obligation cannot be delegated to another, without the consent of the vendee. An objection that the person who has so contracted is not made a party to a bill to enforce the lien upon the land is well founded, and ought to be sustained. The allegation of the insolvency of the assignor in such a case is not sufficient to excuse the omission.

The original vendee of an estate is not a necessary party to a bill against his assignee, for a specific performance of an agreement to purchase.

Appeal from a decree of the Hon. THOMAS BALTZELL, Judge of the Middle Circuit of the State of Florida, made on the 20th of June, A. D. 1850.

To the bill of complaints in the court below, Betton filed a demurrer—among other causes stated, for want of proper parties. The demurrer was overruled by the Judge on the 29th day of December, 1848, and the defendant had leave to answer by the first Monday in February thereafter. The defendant not having answered at the time required, a decree was entered upon the rule book in the clerk's office, taking the bill as confessed. A final decree passed on the 20th of June, 1850, and on the next day, the defendant appealed.

The object and purpose of the bill, and all other matters involved in the case, are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

The cause was argued by ARCHER for Appellant, and BRANCH and HOGUE, for Respondents.

The court pronounced the following opinion, reversing the decretal order of the court below, by which the demurrer of the appellant was overruled, vacating and annulling all the subsequent proceedings up to and including the final decree of June 20th, 1850, and remanding the cause to the Circuit Court of the Middle Circuit, sitting in and for the County of Leon, with directions to allow the demurrer, with leave to complainants to amend their bill, and for such other proceedings as the case required, in accordance with the usual course of chancery practice.

THOMPSON, Justice, delivered the opinion.

In 1833, General LaFayette, of France, sold on a credit to William B. Nuttall, Hector W. Braden and William P. Craig, twenty-six sections of land in Florida, receiving their bonds for the purchase money and interest, and executing and delivering them a bond to make titles, on payment of the purchase money. Soon afterwards, Messrs. Nuttall, Braden and Craig sold out a large portion of these lands to other persons, and among others, to John M. G. Hunter, a tract containing nine hundred and sixty acres, which is particularly described in the bill. This sale was also on credit. Hunter having executed and delivered his bonds for the purchase money and interest, received from Nuttall, Braden and Craig the possession of the land contracted for, and their bond to make titles, when the purchase money should be paid. Hunter sold and assigned his contract to one Baker Johnson, from whom, by successive sales and assignments, the right and interest of Hunter in said contract, and the possession of the land thereunder, were passed through divers persons to the appellant, Turbutt R. Betton, who, at the time of filing the bill, was, and for some time previously had been, in possession of the premises, and claiming to hold under the contract of purchase aforesaid.

At some time subsequent to the sale to Hunter by Nuttall, Braden and Craig, the time not being set forth in the bill, the latter entered into an arrangement with the Union Bank of Florida, by which, in consideration of the transfer of a sufficient number of the bonds which they had received from their vendees of the said lands, among which were the bonds of Hunter before mentioned, the Union Bank contracted and agreed with Nuttall, Braden and Craig, to pay their debt to General LaFayette, for principal and interest of the original purchase money, as their bonds should respectively fall due, and become payable. The Union Bank failed to pay the debt due to General LaFayette by Messrs. Nuttall, Braden and Craig, and, becoming embarrassed in its affairs, with the view to secure the payment of the said debt, transferred to the respondent, Robert W. Williams, who was the agent and attorney of General LaFayette, amongst other bonds of a similar character, the said bonds of John M. G. Hunter, upon trust, to sue for and collect the same, and apply the proceeds to the payment of the debt due LaFayette, in redemption of the engagement of the bank.

The bill in this case was filed to subject the land sold to 14 Hunter to the payment of the purchase money debt; and although the heirs at law of the original vendor, Gen. LaFayette, join in the suit as parties complainants, yet the suit is substantially a proceeding by Williams, the assignee of the bonds, to enforce the lien on the land, under the contract between Nuttall, Braden and Craig, and Hunter; the heirs of LaFayette join, we presume, as the persons holding the legal title, and who are willing to convey the estate, upon the execution of the sub-contract by the purchaser, or his assignee. Betton demurred to the bill, and the demurrer, upon argument, was overruled, and he was ordered to answer by the first Monday of February, 1849. No answer being filed, the bill was taken for confessed at Rules, at the clerk's office on that day. The cause then proceeded ex parte, and a final decree passed on the 20th June, 1850, and on the next day, Betton entered his appeal to this court. It is contended by respondents that this appeal cannot be sustained, because the appellant, in the court below, suffered the bill to be taken pro confesso, and the final decree passed by default. This is undoubtedly the rule in chancery in England, and which has been recognized and adopted as the correct rule in several of the States of the Union. 2 Smith's Chancery Practice, 22. 1 Bland's Reports, 12, 35. 8 Wendell's Reports, 219. 25 Wendell's Reports, 249. 12 Johnson's Reports, 493; and we think such rule is consonant with reason, and should be enforced here, so far as it can be made applicable to our practice. In New York, as in England, an appeal may be taken from an interlocutory order or decree, and if the party declines to appeal, or omits to do so, within the time limited, he will be considered as acquiescing in the propriety of the decree, and a subsequent default, will debar him from bringing any question in the cause before the appellate tribunal. Sands v. Hildreth, 12 Johnson's Reports, 493. Kane v. Whittick, 8 Wendell's Reports, 219. Under our statute, an appeal may be taken only after a final decree, the consequence of which is, that the appeal opens every question decided by 15 the chancellor in the Circuit Court during the progress of the cause, and, also, the regularity of the proceedings therein prior to a default. Betton could not appeal from the decretal order of December 29th, 1848, overruling the demurrer, because it was not a final decree. He could, we conceive, adopt either of two courses;—to answer the bill, defend the cause upon the merits, and, on appeal, present the questions arising on the demurrer to this court for its review, as well as the merits of the final decree; or, it was competent for him to do as he has done, after the judgment of the court on the demurrer, to abandon further defence, and rely on what he considered the erroneous judgment of the chancellor. Mr. Betton was not in default until February rules, 1849, consequently we consider he has the right, after final judgment, to enter his appeal, and bring before this court the matters in the record prior to his default—the decree pro confesso, and all other subsequent proceedings in this cause, no matter how erroneous they be, cannot be examined into upon his complaint.

From the view which we have taken of the effect of a decree pro confesso, or a default in a chancery proceeding, it results in this case, that our inquiry must be limited to the decree of the Circuit Court of the 29th December, 1848, overruling the demurrer, and if that judgment be found correct, the final decree must be affirmed.

The demurrer does not allege a want of equity in the bill—indeed, it is conceded in the argument by counsel for the appellant, that Williams, as the assignee of the bonds of Hunter, given for the price of the land, and the interest thereon, has the same right, which the assignors, Nuttall, Braden and Craig, had, to subject the land to the payment of the debt; but it alleges a want of proper parties defendants in general terms.

It is objected by the counsel for the respondents, that a demurrer, for want of proper parties, must show who are the 16 proper parties—not, indeed, by name, but in such manner as to point out to the plaintiff the objection to the bill, and to enable him to amend by adding the proper parties. Such is the rule laid down in all the treatises on chancery pleading and practice. Mitford's Chancery Pleading, 180. 1 Daniel's Chancery Practice, 385. Story's Equity Pleadings, 238, 543. However, in Tourton vs. Flower, 3 Peere-Williams', 369, there was a demurrer for want of a particular party pointed to in the demurrer, by reference in compliance with the rule, and the demurrer, being held to be ill for that cause, as the party referred to was, in fact, before the court, it was then alleged ore tenus at the bar, the absence of another and necessary party, and the demurrer was held good for this last cause, though without costs—this seeming to be, according to the judgment of Lord Chancellor Talbot, the penalty for a demurrer ore tenus at the bar, as this was held to be. So in Pyle v. Price, 6 Vesey Junior's Reports, 780, there was a general demurrer, and the objection of the want of proper parties was alleged ore tenus. It was insisted in this case, that a demurrer for such a ground must point to the parties, by name or by reference. Lord Eldon is reported to have said, it was doubtful whether there was a general rule that a demurrer, for want of parties, must state the parties; and in a late case in the English chancery, The Attorney General v. Poole (4 Mylne & Craig's Reports, 32,) Lord Cottenham says upon this point, that Lord Redesdale, in his book, certainly so states the rule, and that that passage has been adopted by subsequent writers upon equity pleading, but no authority is referred to in support of the dictum. He says further "that it is not necessary to inquire how far that proposition is consistent with the general doctrine upon the subject of demurrers, or with the well established practice of allowing demurrers ore tenus, for want of parties. There seems, at least, sufficient ground for the Betton vs. Williams, et al.—Opinion of Court.

doubt suggested by Lord Eldon, in Pyle v. Price." We find, also, a dictum of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Whiting v. The Bank, in which it is said, that the objection of a want of a proper party ought properly to have been taken by the parties in that suit at the original hearing, or upon appeal, if any, before the Appellate Court. See 13 Peters' Reports, 14. We are, however, satisfied that the objection to the demurrer, if available at all, should have been taken in the court below, by a motion to have the demurrer taken off the file, or some other appropriate motion, by which the court would have passed upon the validity of the pleading, and the judgment thereon being entered of record, its propriety could have been reviewed by this court, on appeal.

In the case at bar, the ground stated in the demurrer is, that the proper parties are not made defendants to the suit; and as this objection is taken by demurrer, and the defect, if it exists at all, must appear on the face of the bill, we are inclined to think it sufficiently certain, especially if, on examination, we find that the persons omitted are "indispensable to a complete adjudication of the rights of all interested, so that the performance of the decree of this court may be perfectly safe to those who are compelled to obey it, and, also, that future litigation may be prevented." Story's Equity Pleadings, §72.

It is alleged in argument by the appellant, that the following persons are necessary and proper parties, and who should have been made defendants in this suit: 1 William P. Craig, the heirs at law of William B. Nuttall, and the heirs at law of Hector W. Braden, who are the vendors of the land in question to Hunter, and who are bound by their contract with him to execute a title, on payment of the purchase money. 2 John M. G. Hunter, the vendee of Nuttall, Braden and Craig, who is still liable on his bonds for the purchase money and interest, and is interested in taking 18 the account of what is due thereon, and who is entitled to be exonerated from liability, on payment of the purchase money, or recission of the contract. 3. The Union Bank of Florida, as the assignee of Nuttall, Braden and Craig, and the cestui que trust of Williams, as to the residue of the fund transferred to him, after the satisfaction of the debt due the heirs of LaFayette.

It is insisted for the respondents, that it does not appear that Nuttall, Braden and Craig, the Union Bank, or Hunter, are necessary parties—that they have no rights to be affected or concluded by the decree, nor are they under any obligations necessary to be noticed, when the person holding the legal title to the land, and holding the notes given by Hunter, are offering to convey, on payment of the purchase money—that the requisition of the title of Nuttall, Braden and Craig, is a mere pretence, Betton knowing, from the beginning, that the legal title to the land was in LaFayette, and not in Nuttall, Braden and Craig, and that the latter could not convey any title thereto.

The general rule in equity is thus stated by Lord Redesdale: "all persons materially interested in the subject ought generally to be parties to the suit, plaintiffs or defendants, however numerous they may be, so that the court may be enabled to do complete justice, by deciding upon and settling the rights of all persons interested." Mitford's Pleadings, 164. See, also, Story's Equity Pleadings, §72. And in treating of the necessity of making an assignor a party to a suit, Judge Story says, that "where the assignment is not absolute and unconditional, or the extent or validity of the assignment is denied, or there are remaining rights or liabilities of the assignor, which may be affected by the decree, then he is not only a proper, but a necessary party." Story's Equity Pleadings, §153.

1. Applying the rules thus laid down to the facts stated in the bill, are not the vendors of the land to John M. G. Hunter materially interested, not only in the subject mat- 19 ter of the suit, but also in its object? Are there not remaining rights and liabilities of those persons, which will be affected by the decree? The subject matter of the suit is a contract which they made with Hunter, by which they bound themselves, on the payment of certain sums of money, to make title to certain lands; now, although they have assigned the bonds, by which the money was secured to be paid, yet the obligation remains that they should make the title, when the condition is performed; and this obligation they have not delegated, and, indeed, cannot delegate to another, except with the consent of their vendee, or his assignee. Nuttall, Braden and Craig did not assign to Hunter the contract which they had made with LaFayette, either in whole or in part, neither did they stipulate that they would procure the title to be made to Hunter by LaFayette; but for aught that appears in the bill, Hunter may have supposed that they possessed a full and complete legal title, and such must be the inference from the statement of the contract between them. It is true that neither Hunter, nor his assignee, could be compelled to accept a conveyance from Nuttall, Braden and Craig, unless the title was in them, and they had a good right to convey the property. If, upon an examination of title preparatory to the consummation of the contract, it was found that the legal title was in LaFayette, he might well insist on a conveyance directly to himself of LaFayette's title, as well as a conveyance from his vendors. It might be deemed necessary to his perfect assurance. Clark vs. Redman, 1 Blackford's Reports, 179. Lawrence v. Parker, 1 Massachusetts Reports, 191. Taylor v. Porter, 1 Dana's Reports, 422. It would, therefore, result as a necessary consequence, that, in a suit against the vendee to enforce the lien of the purchase money on the land, the vendors should be parties to the suit, so as to be bound by the decree of the court to make the conveyance which they had contracted to make, and which the vendee or his assignee 20 has a right to require, before he parts with his money. They should properly join as complainants with their assignee; but if their authority cannot be obtained for this purpose, they may be made defendants—it is not of much importance how they appear, so they are before the court, and may be subject to the decree to be rendered.

So, also, we think Nuttall, Braden and Craig have rights connected with their liabilities—they are indebted to the heirs of LaFayette for the original purchase money, or some portion thereof, as alleged in the bill, and are, therefore, interested in its payment, to be relieved from liability. It is true that the bill alleges that Nuttall and Braden are both dead, and that their estates, as well as the survivor, Craig, are insolvent, but the latter may not always remain so. At any rate, insolvency does not always render it unnecessary to make the individual a party. In the case of Brooks v. Stuart, 1 Beavan's Reports, 514, the insolvency and discharge of a principal debtor, in a joint and several contract, was held by Lord Langdale, Master of the Rolls, not a sufficient excuse for omitting to make him a party defendant in a suit against the surety, and a demurrer was allowed for that objection; and we think there is much stronger reason why the vendors of Hunter, though insolvent, should be parties to this controversy. So, also, it may be true, as alleged, that the Union Bank has, for a full and valuable consideration, undertaken to pay the debt due to LaFayette; but it is distinctly averred in the bill, that the latter has not accepted the bank as his debtor, or in any wise released his claim upon Nuttall, Braden and Craig; and, besides, the Union Bank is alleged to be insolvent. There can be no doubt but that Nuttall, Braden and Craig are materially interested in the object of the suit, which is to recover a fund, which is to go in liquidation of their debt. The court below should have allowed the demurrer, for want of these parties.

We are relieved from the consideration of the question of the notice, which it was alleged in argument, Hunter and his assignee had of the fact that Nuttall, Braden and Craig had only an equitable title, and that the legal title was in LaFayette, because we find no such allegation in the bill. The only allegation of any knowledge on the part of Betton, is contained in the following averment at the conclusion of what is termed the charging part of the bill: "And they," the said complainants, "further well hoped that the said Turbutt R. Betton, who now holds possession of the same, well knowing the premises, would have paid, or tendered to your orators the said amount of the purchase money," &c. This allegation cannot be extended, so as to amount to an averment of notice by Hunter, or Betton—that, at the time the first named entered into the contract, or the latter acquired title thereto by assignment, they were informed of the state of the title, and how the vendors, Nuttall, Braden and Craig, expected to acquire the legal title.

3. As to Hunter, there is more doubt whether he is an indispensable party to the suit. It would seem from the application of the principle, that, as he is liable on his bond to Nuttall, Braden and Craig, so he is interested in taking the account of what is due thereon, and should, therefore, be considered a necessary party." But in Hall v. Sever, 3 Younge and Collyer, Equity Ex. C., 191, it was held, that the original vendee of an estate is not a necessary party to a bill against his assignee for a specific performance of an agreement to purchase. Upon this authority, we are inclined to consider that Hunter is not a necessary party, but as the case will, necessarily, be remitted to the Circuit Court to make other parties, it might be better that the complainants should bring him before the court. He would be a proper, although not a necessary party.

3. As to the Union Bank of Florida, we cannot perceive the necessity for bringing this corporation before the court in this controversy. Whatever interest it may have in the subject matter, or object of this suit, it is sufficiently represented herein by the complainant, Williams.

The decretal order of December 29th, 1848, overruling the demurrer of the appellant, Betton, is reversed and set aside, and as a consequence of said reversal, all the subsequent proceedings in said cause, up to and including the final decree of June 20th, 1850, are hereby vacated and annulled. Let the cause be remanded to the Circuit Court of the Middle Circuit, sitting in and for the county of Leon, with instructions to allow the said demurrer of the said appellant, for the reason stated herein, giving leave, however, to the respondents to amend their bill, by making William P. Craig, the heirs at law of William B. Nuttall, and the heirs at law of Hector W. Braden parties thereto, either as complainants or defendants, and in such other manner, and upon such terms, as the Judge of said court, upon application to him, and on notice to the adverse party, may think proper to direct, and for such other proceedings, according to the usual course of chancery practice, as may be requisite and necessary in the premises.

Let each party pay his own costs in this court; and that the respondents may proceed without delay in this cause, let the mandate of this court to the Judge of the Circuit Court of the Middle Circuit issue at any time, on the application of the respondents, or their solicitor.

Decree reversed.

WILLIAM G. PONDER, EXECUTOR OF ARCHIBALD GRAHAM, APPELLANT, v. MARY GRAHAM, APPELLEE.

As respects third persons, a man who lives with a woman, and holds her out as his wife, is estopped from denying it, when charged with liabilities as her husband, but such recognition cannot affect the rights of property even as between themselves.

The executor of a person who has recognized a woman as his wife, is not estopped from setting up and asserting the illegality of the marriage, where it was absolutely void, as where there existed a civil disability to contract marriage. The marriage being void, no civil rights can be acquired under it, and it is competent for the executor, representing the interests of distributees and creditors, to impeach its validity.

The act of Congress, approved March 30, 1822, by which the Territorial Government of Florida was organized, and the several acts amendatory thereof, are to be regarded as the Constitution of the Territory, differing, however, from the Constitution of the State Government in this—that the former contains grants of power, while the latter are restrictions of power primarily possessed.

By the organic law, the judicial power of the Territory was vested in two Superior Courts, &c., and the legislative power in a Governor and Council, and this power was to extend to "all rightful subjects of legislation."

An act of the Legislature which undertakes to determine questions of fact and law, affecting the rights of persons, or of property, is judicial in its character, and is not, therefore, a rightful subject of legislation. And though the facts and reasons alleged in an act of divorce are such as, by law, would warrant the sentence or decree, yet the inquiry into those facts and reasons is judicial in its nature, and the determination upon them is a judicial act.

The act of the Legislative Council, passed in 1828, gives to the courts jurisdiction in cases of divorce.

The Legislative council had no power or authority, after the act of 1828, to take jurisdiction of, and decide questions of divorce, and to pass an act dissolving the marriage contract between two persons, lawfully made and entered into—nor was the power or authority possessed by the Legislative body either before or after said act.

Marriage is a contract, in the strict, legal definition of the term, and a law dissolving the marriage relation, impairs the obligation of the contract, and is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and is, therefore void.

Appeal from judgment of the Circuit Court of the county of Leon, rendered at the Spring term, 1850, the Honorable THOMAS BALTZELL, Judge, presiding.

Mary Graham filed her petition in the Circuit Court of the county of Leon, representing that her husband, Archibald Graham, died on or about the 2d January, 1848, after having in his life time made and executed his last will and testament—that said will and testament bears date 16th November, 1847, and that one John R. Cannon, and the defendant, William G. Ponder, were therein named and appointed executors—that defendant alone qualified and took out letters testamentary—that the provision made in the said will is not satisfactory to petitioner, and that she, in due form, and in proper manner, signified her dissent thereto, within the time limited by law. The petitioner further states, that her deceased husband died seized and possessed of a large estate, real, personal, and mixed—out of which, petitioner prays that dower may be allotted to her, under the law in such case made and provided.

The defendant for answer, or plea to said petition, alleged that the said Mary Graham ought not to have her dower, as in her petition she claimed and prayed, because the said Mary never was accoupled to the said Archibald Graham, deceased, in lawful matrimony. To this plea, there was a replication, affirming that petitioner was accoupled in lawful matrimony with the said Archibald Graham, and issue thereon. The jury found for the petitioner; and thereupon it was adjudged and ordered, that said petitioner is entitled to an assignment of dower, and a writ of dower issued as prayed for, commanding the sheriff to summon five discreet free holders as commissioners, to allot and set off, by Ponder, Executor, vs. Graham.—Statement of Case.

25 metes and bounds, to Mary Graham, widow of Archibald Graham, one-third part, according to quantity and quality of the real estate of which the said Archibald died seized, whereof the said Mary had not relinquished her right of dower, and at the same time to allot and set off to the said widow her portion, or one-half of the personal estate of the deceased.

The commissioners summoned by the sheriff made their report, August 8th, 1850, which was confirmed—but to which the counsel for appellant excepted, for the reason that the "said commissioners have assigned, allotted and set apart to the said Mary, one-half part of the gross amount of the personalty, without having first deducted therefrom the amount of debts due by said decedent at the time of his death—this exceptant contending, that the widow of one deceased is only entitled to a share of the nett personal estate, deducting all debts and charges upon the same, at the time of the death of decedent, and the expenses of administration"—which exception was, however, overruled by the court.

The facts of the case are succinctly these: The respondent, then Mary Buccles, about the year 1820, in South Carolina, intermarried with one Solomon Canady. Some time afterwards, they removed to, and resided in, Georgia, but soon, in consequence of domestic dissentions, separated.—Mary went to reside with Graham, a bachelor, and continued to live with him, under circumstances from which an adulterous cohabitation might be inferred.

In 1832, and while the said cohabitation continued, a bill was passed by the Legislative Council of the then Territory of Florida, entitled "An act for the relief of Mary Canady."

By this act, the Legislative Council, for the cause expressed in the preamble, assumed to judge and declare that the said Mary Graham was thereby divorced from her said husband, Solomon, and the bonds of matrimony subsisting between them, were thereby to be entirely and abso-
26 lutely dissolved, as if the same had never been solemnized. (See pamphlet acts of 1833, page 123.) There does not appear to have been any petition, affidavit, or proofs—a reference to a committee to ascertain the facts, or any notice to the absent husband. In 1834, the cohabitation between Mary and the testator still subsisting, the ceremony of marriage is celebrated between them, and from this time up to the period of the testator's death, which occurred in 1848, he lived with her, and acknowledged her as his wife, and in his will he provides for her by that name, and in that relation.

On the trial of the case in the court below, defendant's counsel prayed the court to instruct the jury as follows, viz:

1. That the Legislative council of the Territory of Florida had no power or authority to take jurisdiction of and decide questions of divorce, and to pass an act dissolving the marriage contract between two persons, lawfully entered into between them; and that, therefore, the act of the Governor and Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, entitled an act for the relief of Mary Canady, passed February 9th, 1832, rejected February 10th, 1832, and reconsidered and passed by the requisite majority, February 11th, 1832, is void and of no effect.

2. That it is incumbent on the party claiming the benefit of the said act, to show that the other party, to wit, Solomon Canady, had notice of the said proceedings before the Legislative Council, and had an opportunity to appear before it, and cross-examine the witnesses—introduce evidence in his favor, and make defence to the said complaint; and that in the absence of such proof, especially if the jury believe from the evidence that Solomon Canady was not a resident of the Territory of Florida, the said act is to be disregarded, as invalid.

3. That all judgments rendered any where against a party who had no notice of the proceeding, are rendered in vio- 27 lation of the first principles of justice, and are null and void—which instructions so prayed, numbered one, two and three, the court refused to give to the jury.

The court then gave the following instructions:

1. That the marriage of Graham with the petitioner is legal and valid, unless the act of the Legislative Council of 1832 was against the provisions of the organic law, so as to make it void.

2. That prima facie, the action of the Legislature is to be regarded as valid, and it lies upon the party contesting it to maintain its invalidity, by showing that it was passed under circumstances not justified by the constitution and laws then existing.

3. If you shall be of opinion that the marriage contract between Canady and his wife was in full force and operation, securing to each the rights and privileges inherent to such relation, so that the contract was not abrogated and annulled, but operative and in force, and especially that the same was in full force, so far as the husband was concerned—then it was not competent for the Territorial Legislature to declare a divorce between the said parties, and such action was illegal and void, as impairing the obligation of the contract.

4. That if a party has, beyond all question, impaired and broken the marriage contract, so that its existence as a contract may no longer, with propriety, be asserted—that the clause of the Constitution of the United States, providing that no States shall pass a law impairing the obligation of a contract, is not affected by the action of a Legislature declaring a divorce, and allowing a new marriage.

5. If you shall be of opinion that the husband had violated the contract, and in fact impaired its main provisions and constituent elements, by deserting his wife, withdrawing from her society, refusing to her a suitable maintenance and support, and by other acts and conduct impairing, repu 28 diating and rejecting his contract, so that it could not in fact be regarded as a subsisting contract—that then it was competent for the Legislature to declare the same, and to give her the privilege of forming another contract, by contracting a new marriage. To which instructions, the counsel for defendant excepted.

The errors assigned in this court are—

1st. The court below erred in the instructions given to the jury, as set forth in the bill of exceptions.

2d. The court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, as prayed for by appellant.

3d. The court erred in overruling the exceptions of appellant to the report of the sheriff and commissioners.

The case was very elaborately argued by ARCHER for appellant and by RANDALL and WOODWARD for respondent.

Judge BAKER, of the Middle Circuit, sat with the Chief Justice, and SEMMES, Justice, at the hearing of this cause, THOMPSON, Justice, being disqualified, by reason of his having been of counsel in the court below.

SEMMES, Justice, delivered the opinion of the court.

This cause comes before this court on appeal from Leon Circuit Court. The suit was commenced in the court below by the respondent, representing herself as the widow of the testator, Archibald Graham, and praying for an allotment of dower in the estate of her deceased husband. The appellant filed his plea, "ne unques accouple en loyal matrimonie,"—to which, there was a general replication of valid marriage. On the trial of the cause, the Judge in the court below gave to the jury several instructions, which were excepted to by counsel for appellant. Other instructions were asked for by the same counsel, which were refused, and which refusal was also excepted to.

29 In considering this case, it is unnecessary to notice the instructions given by the court on the trial. Passing by these, I proceed to the consideration of the first instruction asked by the appellant, and refused. That instruction in substance is this: That the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida had no power or authority to take jurisdiction of and decide questions of divorce, and to pass an act dissolving the marriage contract between two persons, lawfully entered into between them; and that, therefore, the act of the Legislature divorcing Mary Canady, passed February 11th, 1832, is void and of no effect.

In considering the important questions which arise under this instruction, and to which the attention of counsel was mainly directed, I frankly confess in the outset my unqualified concurrence in the doctrine, as laid down by the court in the case of The State v. Cooper—that it is the duty of a court to sustain the validity of a statute, unless its unconstitutionality is so obvious as to admit of no doubt. 5 Blackford's Reports, 259. On the other hand, it must be conceded, that, however grave and interesting the questions presented for the determination of a court, it is its duty to shrink from no responsibility imposed upon it by the laws and the Constitution.

A question has been raised by the counsel for respondent, which it is necessary first to dispose of. It is insisted that, inasmuch as Graham by his will recognizes respondent as his wife, his executor is estopped from setting up the illegality of the marriage, and that by his probate of the will, he is bound to execute it. I do not understand that the executor is seeking to avoid the execution of this will, by depriving respondent of the benefit of its provisions, as one of the legatees. But, on the contrary, she has renounced the provision in her favor, and claims dower, as the widow of Graham, adversely to the will. The doctrine of estoppel has no application to this case. It is not denied that, as respects 30 third persons, a man who lives with a woman, and holds her out as his wife, is estopped from denying it, when charged with liabilities as her husband, but it cannot affect the rights of property even as between themselves. 5 Iredell's Reports, 495.

The objection, I apprehend, arises from not considering the distinction between void and voidable marriages. Whenever any of the canonical disabilities exist, the marriage is not ipso facto void, but is esteemed both by the canon and common law valid for all civil purposes, until sentence of nullity is pronounced by the spiritual court, which can only be done in the life-time of the parties; and in the event of either of the parties dying before the Ecclesiastical Court proceeds against them, the marriage becomes good, ab initio, to all intents, and the wife and husband may have dower and curtesy, and the issue will be legitimate. Coke on Littleton, 32, 33. But where any civil disability, as prior marriage, exists, the marriage is void absolutely, and no civil rights can be acquired under it; and it may be inquired of in any court where rights are asserted under it, though the parties be dead. 5 Iredell's Reports, 493-4.

Where any civil disability exists, the judgment of the court is but declaratory; it does not make it void; for though a marriage de facto, it had no legal existence. It is competent for a party to set up the nullity of his first marriage, in bar of a sentence praying the nullity of the second marriage. Shelford, 332. Either of the parties to a marriage, or the parent or guardian of either of the parties, or any other person interested, may apply to the court, and they have a right to a declaratory sentence, and it is upon the ground that the public, as well as the parties in interest, have a right to know the real character of these domestic relations. Shelford, 334. It is, therefore, upon principle and authority, competent for the executor, representing as he does the interest of distributees and creditors of this estate, to impeach the validity of this marriage.

Ponder, Executor, vs. Graham.—Opinion of Court.

The main question raised in this case, as to the power of 31 a Legislative body, as such, to grant divorce, is not altogether a new one. It has been investigated by some of the American Courts, and grave constitutional questions have been necessarily involved in the discussion; and yet the question still remains an open one—opinions clashing—nothing settled. It is to be regretted that amid the conflict of opinion, upon a question of such deep interest, we are unable to avail ourselves of the investigation of any one of the great jurists of our country, to relieve the subject from embarrassment and difficulty, and that while almost every other legal question of importance has had light and authority imparted to it, this, one of the most important of all, has been allowed to slumber on in doubt and uncertainty.

The Legislatures of some of the States of the Union exercise exclusive jurisdiction over this subject; one or more of them by reason, as is contended for by their courts, of the absence of any constitutional inhibition—while others claim this authority by reason, it is said, of an inherent power, analogous to that of the Parliament of Great Britain. Some exercise the power as a constitutional right, while others claim it as an original right, and without the sanction of constitutional authority.

No one doubts the right of the people by their constitution, to invest this power in the Legislature, or any where else; but the question is, when the constitution is silent on the subject, in what department of government does this authority rest? I believe that much, if not the whole difficulty, has arisen from overlooking some of the great principles which enter into the constitutional government of the States, and from not preserving the obvious distinction between legislative and judicial functions—by confounding the right which a legislative body has to pass general laws on the subject of divorce, with the power of dissolving the marriage contract.

There is an important and well recognized distinction be- 32
tween the powers of the Federal and State Governments. The former was created by the States directly, not by the people; designed not as a government for the people, but of the States; with authority to legislate on questions of national policy in which the States, as sovereign communities, had and felt a national interest; in short, to represent, by its action, the united will of these distinct sovereignties. The domestic relations, and all questions affecting our civil institutions, remained where they were—with the people of the respective States. The powers of the General government are, therefore, purely derivative. The constitution is a mere delegation of power, and as a consequence, Congress can exercise none not expressly given, or which does not arise by necessary implication. The limitation of power contained in that instrument is, necessarily, applicable to the government created by the instrument itself. All power, therefore, not delegated by that instrument, or inhibited to the States, is reserved to the latter.—On the other hand, the legislature of a State, aside from any constitutional restriction, possesses the law-making power, and is undoubtedly vested with all the legislative powers possessed by the people themselves, and may exercise the same in any manner consistent with the great and fundamental principles of natural justice.

The people, in organizing their respective State Governments, never contemplated, by their several constitutions, a grant of power, but a limitation of inherent power in the legislature, their legally constituted delegates. See Smith on the Constitution, and Story on the Constitution.

The legislative department, unless restricted by constitutional provisions, possesses every power not delegated to some other department; although as to other departments, it is in the nature of a general grant of power. 2 Scammon's Reports, 81.

Ponder, Executor, vs. Graham.—Opinion of Court.

These general principles will be found not without their application to the case before us, and especially to the decisions of some of the State Courts on this subject, which I will hereafter notice.

The Territorial Government of Florida was organized by act of Congress, approved 30th March, 1822. For several years subsequent, Congress passed several acts amendatory of this, but not altering any of its essential provisions. This government was formed under that clause of the Constitution of the United States, which vests in Congress the power "to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, or other property belonging to the United States." It is a question by no means free from doubt, whether it ever was contemplated by the use of these words, to vest in Congress the power to establish separate and distinct Territorial Governments. Be this as it may, the exercise of the power has been acquiesced in, and I know of no useful purpose to be gained by calling it in question.

The act of Congress above referred to, being the organic law, is to be regarded, as it is in point of fact, the Constitution of the Territory. This organic law, unlike the Constitutions of the States, is a grant, and not a restriction of power primarily possessed, and in this respect, similar to the Constitution of the Federal Government. The Territorial Government being the creature of Congress, derives all its powers from this charter, giving it a political existence. It is to this grant, that we are mainly to look for a solution of the question before us—all powers not enumerated, or arising by implication, are reserved, and this is the correct rule in the construction of this grant. See 3 Story on Constitution, 133. The act provides that "the judicial power of the Territory shall be vested in two Superior Courts," &c. The legislative power shall be vested in the Governor and Council, and "shall extend to all rightful sub- 34 jects of legislation." The question here arises, was the act of the Legislative Council, in 1832, divorcing the respondent from her husband, Solomon Canady, a legislative or judicial act? What are we to understand by rightful subjects of legislation?

It is insisted in argument, that a legislature possesses inherent power, over and above that of making laws. If this were true, then the terms, "rightful subjects," are a restriction imposed by Congress on the grant itself, confining the action of the Council to such matters as legitimately attach, and from necessity belong, to the law-making power. But the proposition is not true. The legislature and the law-making power are convertible terms, and the one has no greater or less import than the other. No legislature, as such, has any other power than that of making laws. Its inherent authority does not extend beyond this. Were those restrictive words erased from the grant, I know of no rule of construction which would, under the general terms, "legislative powers," vest in the Council any other power than that of enacting laws and special acts, which confer privileges without invading rights, (of course, excepting rules for its own government.) But from the plain and obvious import of the terms used in the grant, I believe it the only sound and consistent interpretation which the act is susceptible of.

It is said that this act of the Legislative Council was a law, and, consequently, was a legitimate exercise of power. If this were true, it was competent for the Legislature to repeal it; for all laws can be repealed, (except where vested rights are created.) And it would scarcely be contended that any legislative body could dissolve the contract one day, and restore it the next. But the act was not a law in any sense. The term is defined by all legal writers to be a rule of civil conduct, prescribed for the future actions of men—from its very nature, it must be prospective, otherwise it can-35 not be a rule of civil conduct, but partaking of a judicial proceeding as contra-distinguished from a legislative power. It is said by an eminent jurist, "that the very essence of a law is a rule for future cases." It must be of general and uniform application. If an act of the legislature, in terms, judicially determines a question of right, or of property, as the basis upon which the act is founded, so far the proceeding must be regarded as judicial. Smith on the constitution, § 347; or where the act determines matters of fact, or of right, dependent on matters of fact, it is the exercise of judicial powers. Smith on the constitution, § 351.

An act which is limited in its operation, and which exhausts itself upon a particular person, or his rights, is, in its very spirit and terms, a judicial proceeding. 9th Gill and Johnson, 365.

The judicial power of a State is that which administers justice, under the sanction and according to the forms of law. When speaking of the legislative and judicial departments of a government, our meaning is well defined and comprehensive—why should it be less so, when referring to their respective powers?

The act of the counsel undertakes to determine questions of fact and law exclusively within the province of the courts. If, as is contended with much reason, there were no existing causes of divorce, as set forth in the preamble to this act, then the dissolution of the marriage contract was a mere assumption of power, exercised in the most arbitrary manner.

An act declaring that to be a crime which, by the laws of the land, was no crime, and punishing an innocent party, by depriving him of important legal rights without a hearing, without notice, and who had not, in any mode, made himself amenable to our laws, such proceeding could not be justified, on any principle of natural right, or common justice. But assuming the fact to be so—that the grounds 36 on which the legislature acted were recognized by our law as causes for divorce—then the legislature, assuming the high prerogatives and character of a judicial tribunal, proceeds to determine the facts and administer the law—upon ex parte showing, pronounces judgment against an absent defendant, and declares a forfeiture of his marital rights, for causes happening in a foreign jurisdiction, and to whose laws he was alone amenable. Is there no distinction between making a law and expounding and administering a law? Between declaring that certain acts may work a forfeiture, and passing judgment of forfeiture? Between enacting a law affecting the remedy, and pronouncing a judgment dissolving a contract? Had any court dissolved this marriage contract, with the facts before it disclosed in this record, it would have been but a poor compliment to its own sense of justice, or the high and solemn trust with which the law had clothed it.

Chancellor Kent (2d Commentaries, 106,) says, the question of divorce involves investigations which are of a judicial nature, and the jurisdiction over the subject ought to be confined to judicial tribunals. If the question of divorce be a rightful subject of legislation, then it is very clear that it is an improper subject for judicial cognizance, unless it can be shown that the right of the courts to legislate, is coextensive with that of the legislature to administer the laws. And if the courts have no jurisdiction, of what avail is that political maxim which we find engrafted in our declaration of rights, but which exists above and independent of all constitutions—"that the courts of the country shall be open to every citizen for the redress of his wrongs, and enforcement of his rights."

In this country, at least, no man can be compelled to surrender his rights, except by due course and process of law, administered by the courts.

The case reported in 4th Condensed Supreme Court Re-

Ponder, Executor, vs. Graham.—Opinion of Court.

37 ports, 520, decided by Chief Justice Marshall, has been referred to, and the dictum of this great jurist has been invoked by counsel for respondent, as an authority in support of their position. Did I believe his language susceptible of the construction given it I would more than doubt my own convictions on this subject. The Chief Justice says—"it never has been understood to restrict the general right of the Legislature to legislate on the subject of divorces. Those acts enable some tribunal, not to impair the contract, but to liberate one of the parties," &c. Mr. Justice Story in the same case says—"A general law regulating divorces, like a law regulating remedies in other cases of breaches of contract,"&c., and he further adds, "that he was not prepared to admit a power in the State Legislatures to dissolve the marriage contract," &c., "without a judicial inquiry to ascertain the breach of the contract." Chancellor Kent, (2d Commentaries, 89,90,) in commenting on the above case, fully recognizes the general right of a legislature to pass laws on the subject of divorce, and so far as I am aware, the exercise of this power has never been questioned by any legal writer.

It is said, and the doctrine is broadly intimated in several of the authorities, that a legislature in this country can grant divorces, in analogy to the Parliament of England. I can see no parallel in the two cases. Political writers in England claim for their Parliament omnipotent power. It is said that in that country, "there is no written constitution, no fundamental law, nothing visible, nothing tangible, nothing real, nothing certain, by which a statute of Parliament can be tested." See 3 Dallas's Reports, 308; and yet, with all this acknowledged and untrammelled power, it does not assert or exercise the right of dissolving the marriage contract, to the extent and in the summary mode adopted by the Legislatures of some of the States.

Parliament never decrees a divorce, a mensa et thoro—
38 that power belongs exclusively to the courts. Parliament never even decrees a divorce a vinculo, but for adultery, and that upon a judgment a mensa et thoro, first pronounced by the Ecclesiastical Courts, and unless sufficient cause is shown, a verdict for damages in a Court of Common Law is requisite, before Parliament will take jurisdiction. The whole proceedings, from the libel filed in the Ecclesiastical Court, up to the final decree by Parliament, are, in every essential requisite, judicial. The formal petition to the House of Lords, with an office copy of the judgment and proceeding in the court, notice to the defendant, the examination of witnesses, the hearing of counsel, and the judgment pronounced, all clothe it with a judicial character, of which it is impossible to divest it—done, it is true, by Parliament, but by virtue of its omnipotent power.

The case in the Supreme Court of Maryland, reported in 1st Gill and Johnson, 464, was where the legislature had granted a divorce a mensa et thoro. This authority, and the one from Connecticut, are mainly relied on by respondent's counsel.

If the Legislature of Maryland based its rightful exercise of this power, as is intimated in the authority, upon any analogy of Parliament, it is obvious it cannot be sustained. The claim of omnipotent power in Parliament rests upon the fact, that it is unfettered by a written constitution—that it stands in place of the people, and speaks the language of absolute sovereignty. Smith on the Constitution. But this principle in the English Government is not recognized in the United States. It is at war with our institutions, and is but another name for despotism. See 1st Kent's Commentaries, 426. It is also said by the court in this case, "that the General Assembly of Maryland exercised the power of granting divorces, for the want, perhaps, of Ecclesiastical Courts to effect it." But the Ecclesiastical Courts of England had not the power of granting divorces a vinculo, and in this respect, at least, their existence in that State, with all their 39 power of ex-communication, would have been of no avail. But if the reason assigned be a good one, why is it that the legislature does not also claim cognizance of all other matters appertaining to the marriage relation, and decree alimony to the wife?—for that was and is, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts of Great Britain. But the conclusion of the court, why the divorce granted by the legislature in that case was a legislative and not a judicial act, is manifestly based upon another point. In Maryland there is no law authorizing any court to decree a divorce, and from this it was insisted that the authority was within the province of the legislature. The Court says:—"She could have recovered a suitable maintenance in a Court of Chancery. If she could have been thus redressed by an exercise of judicial authority, we would ask is it not fair to conclude that the redress (alimony) granted to her by the legislature is an exercise of judicial authority?" The court held the act of the legislature valid as to the divorce, but invalid as to alimony, upon the ground that, for the latter, the party had her redress in the courts—for the former, none; and hence the conclusion of the court, that the first was a legislative, and the latter a judicial act. Without adopting the opinion of the court, the authority as it stands is against the respondent—for, if the law vesting this power in any particular branch of the government be a true test of its character, then the act of the Legislative Council of Florida, giving to the courts jurisdiction in cases of divorce, passed in 1828, is conclusive proof that the act divorcing respondent was a judicial act.

I regret being also compelled to differ from the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court in the case reported in 8th Connecticut Reports, 547; but in my opinion the authority cannot be sustained on principle. The Supreme Court of that State (Peters, Justice, dissenting,) held that the legislature possessed the power of granting 40 divorces—that, under the original charter of the government, this power was exercised like that of the Parliament of England—that the constitution of 1818 was not a grant but a limitation of power in the legislature, and that if this body was authorized to make a law, giving power to some tribunal to grant divorces, it could do so itself directly, by a sovereign act, and in the exercise of a constitutional right.

I fully concur in the construction given by the court to the constitution of 1818, but the fact of its being a limitation and not a grant of power leads my mind to a different conclusion from that arrived at by the court; for conceding the absolute supremacy of the legislature of that State prior to the constitution of 1818, yet that instrument, by declaring as it does, that the executive, legislative and judicial departments of the government shall, thereafter, remain separate and distinct, did, in terms and emphatic language, restrict the legislature from the exercise of judicial functions, and if that body had "reserved rights," (which was doubtless true,) it certainly was not one of them, in the face of this limitation, to assume the administration of the laws by dissolving a contract.

Every legitimate body necessarily has the power to pass laws affecting the remedy, and empowering the courts to enforce that remedy; but it does not follow that it can administer the law itself; for the obvious reason, that the exercise of the one is within its province, and the other out of it. The legislature of Connecticut, it is true, has exercised judicial powers from the commencement of her civil polity, and probably to a greater extent than any other State in the Union. This, no doubt, has arisen from the fact, that originally there was a union of all the departments of government, and a concentration of the powers of all in the legislature, or general court. I am aware that it has been held that this usage, on the part of the legislature, to exercise judicial functions, "made up a part of the constitution of that State," and, under this construction, the right to grant new trials and divorces, has been conceded to the Legislature. If it be true, as is contended by the courts, "that usage and the Constitution are synonymous terms in that State," (2 Root's Reports, 350,) then the argument is at an end, and, by a parity of reasoning, the principle will apply to Florida, and every State in the Union. But I humbly submit, that the terms are not synonymous in any conceivable sense. I cannot well understand how the usage of a legislative body can be appealed to, to determine the limitation of power imposed by the Constitution of a State. If usage is to be the test of constitutional power, and the interpreter of constitutional rights, then it becomes the paramount law, and government is thrown back, and resolved into its original elements. Whence the necessity of the people assembling convention, asserting their power, and declaring their rights? Why have a constitution, if its operation is to be controlled, and its powers fettered and restricted, by previous custom?

If this be the science of government, then it must forever remain stationary—no progress—no improvement—and the principle upon which our's is based is a false one—false both in theory and practice. If usage and the constitution are convertible terms, then I can well understand the doctrine, that a State Legislature may claim the omnipotence of the British Parliament. It has been truly said, that our constitutions originated in a spirit of distrust to legislative power, (Smith on the Constitution,) and we are not without evidence in our own country that, while other departments of government are content to remain in the spheres marked out for them by the constitution, the tendency of the legislative department is to absorb all power. Mr. Madison says—"The legislative department is every where extending the sphere of its activity, and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex." Federalist, page 278.

42 It is very far from being true, even in political science, that the exercise of a power by a legislature is evidence of a right. The exercise proves nothing but the fact—it does not establish a principle, and it would be a most fearful doctrine in a free government to hold, that a legislative exposition of a constitutional restriction upon its own powers was proof of the fact. It would be a judicial determination of a constitutional question, of right belonging to a co-ordinate branch of the government.

If the constitution of a State has any vitality at all, its provisions, separating the several departments of government, do necessarily, as they were designed, restrict this prior usage within constitutional bounds, and prevent a blending together of those powers, which the wisest and best of men have considered the only safe guarantee to public liberty and private rights. I am satisfied in my own mind, that when a constitution declares that the judicial and legislative powers shall remain separate and distinct, or where, as in the organic law of Florida, they are separated without the use of these words, the exercise of judicial power by the legislature is an infraction of the constitution, and, therefore void. The use of these words is as positive and well defined a restriction, as that contained in the Constitutions of Massachusetts and Alabama, declaring that the legislature should never exercise any judicial powers. See Watkins v. Holman, 16 Peters, 60.

The fundamental principle of every free and good government, is that these several co-ordinate departments forever remain separate and distinct. No maxim in political science is more fully recognized than this. Its necessity was recognized by the framers of our government, as one too invaluable to be surrendered, and too sacred to be tampered with. Every other political principle is subordinate to it—for it is this which gives to our system energy, vitality and stability. Montesquieu says there can be no liberty, where the judicial are not separated from the legislative powers. 1 43
Spirit of Laws, page 181. Mr. Madison says these departments should remain forever separate and distinct, and that there is no political truth of greater intrinsic value, and which is stamped with the authority of more enlightened patrons of liberty. Federalist, 270.

It is only by keeping these departments in their appropriate spheres, that the harmony of the whole can be preserved—blend them, and constitutional law no longer exists. The purity of our government, and a wise administration of its laws, depend upon a rigid adherence to this principle. It is one of fearful import, and a relaxation is but another step to its abandonment—for what authority can check the innovation, when the barriers so clearly defined by every constitutional writer, are once thrown down. Each department is a blank in government without the aid and co-operation of the others; and when one is encroached upon, its powers, to that extent, become paralyzed, and the whole system fails to carry out those high purposes for which it was designed. Under all circumstances, it is the imperative duty of the courts to stand by the constitution.

It is contended that the provision in the constitution of our State, declaring that divorces shall not be allowed but by judgment of a court, is to be construed into an admission of this power in the legislature prior to the constitution. Just the reverse is true—the provision itself was unnecessary—the separation of the departments of government was comprehensive enough. But this provision has a meaning not apparent on its surface. In my opinion, it is a strong and emphatic condemnation by the people of this usage on the part of the legislature to assume powers not of right belonging to it.

It is also said that, inasmuch as Congress repealed many acts of divorce passed by the Legislative Council, and did not repeal this, it became valid, by the implied sanction of Congress. My answer to this is, that it was out of the 44 power of Congress, itself to pass the act, and that it could not, by its approval, make that valid, which was, ipso facto, void under its own grant, as well as the Constitution of the United States, which I will endeavor to show; and, secondly, no approval of Congress is to be inferred from its silence. Many acts of the Council silently acquiesced in by Congress, have been declared unconstitutional, and set aside by the courts of the Territory, in the exercise of legitimate powers granted to them.

If the legislature passed this act in violation of the organic law, it was void, and if Congress could, by its approval, make that a law which was no law, it was assuming to legislate directly on the question of divorce. This it could not do. But it is said, how can Congress authorize any tribunal to do that which it cannot do itself? The answer is a plain one. The powers of the Federal Government being purely derivative, the authority of Congress to establish and organize a Territorial Government is not an original power, but a limited one, derived from a specific grant in the constitution; and in the exercise of this power, it could establish judicial tribunals, possessing all the powers incidental to them; but it does not follow, that Congress could exercise judicial functions. Chancellor Kent (2d Commentaries, says the repeal of these acts of divorce by Congress, amounts to a strong national condemnation of the exercise of this power by a legislature. There is another point presented by the record in this case, which I think it my duty briefly to consider—it is, whether this act of the legislature is not unconstitutional, on the ground that it impairs the obligation of a contract

It is insisted that marriage is but a civil relation, and not embraced within the definition of a contract, as used in the constitution. In England, as well as in this country, all legal writers consider it as purely a civil contract. It is true it is a civil relation, but nonconstat, it is not a contract in the strict legal definition of the term. Every contract creates a legal relation between the parties. Blackstone says that "the law of England considers marriage in no other light than as a civil contract, and viewing it in this civil light, the law treats it as it does all other contracts." 1 Blackstone's Commentaries, 448. Rutherford says the contract of marriage creates important legal rights in the person and property of the other. 1 Institutes, 314. See, also, Bacon, 476, 488. The contract creates mutual rights, duties and obligations, deeply interesting to society, it is true, but none the less important and valuable to the contracting parties. It is municipal, as it affects the public—it is a contract, as it affects the rights of the person and the rights of property—it has all the attributes of a pure contract, whether we consider the capacity of the parties to contract, the subject matter or the consideration; and the rights growing out of it can be asserted and enforced in a court of justice. A man has as good a right to the property acquired by marriage, as that acquired under any other contract. Mr. Justice Story says, "As to the case of the contract of marriage, which the argument supposes not to be within the prohibitory clause, (of the constitution,) because it is a manner of civil institution, I profess not to feel the weight of the reason assigned for the exception. In a legal sense, all contracts, recognized as valid in any country, may be properly said to be matters of civil institution, since they obtain their obligation and construction, jure loci contractus." 4 Condensed Supreme Court Reports, 520. I know of no reason why the word contract, as used in the constitution, should be restricted to those of a pecuniary nature, and not embrace that of marriage, involving as it does, considerations of the most interesting character and vital importance to society, to government, and the contracting parties. It is comprehended by the words of the constitu-46 tion, and there is no rule of construction that would exclude it, in the absence of any thing to show that it is not within its spirit. 9th Gill and Johnson. And what was the obligations of the contract, but the rights and duties which grow out of it? A legislative act which discharges the duties and destroys the rights acquired under any contract, must, of necessity, impair its obligation. A law affecting the remedy, does not impair the obligation, but an act of the legislature dissolving the contract, destroys the obligation.

In every respect in which I have been able to see this case, I can find no reason to sustain the act of the legislature. It appears by the record, that the parties were domiciled in the State of Georgia, where, it is alleged, the desertion and ill treatment occurred. The wife, living with the testator, Graham, removed to Florida—while the husband returned to Carolina, his former residence. The bill was introduced into the legislature one day, and passed the next. It is very clear that this divorce would not be recognized by the courts of Georgia or Carolina, were any rights asserted under it in those States. There was an utter want of jurisdiction over the person, as well as the subject matter, and an act thus passed in defiance of the maxim, audi alteram partem, has no merit to recommend it to this court. The husband, in this case, in the language of Chief Justice Story, "had as good a right to his wife as his property acquired under the marriage contract—he had a legal right to her society and fortune, and to divest him of these rights, without his default, and against his will, was as flagrant a violation of the principles of justice, as the confiscation of his estate." 4 Condensed Supreme Courts.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the act of the Legislative Council of February 11th, 1832, was in conflict with the organic law of Florida and the Constitution of the United States, and is, therefore, void.

Per Curiam—Let the judgment of the court below be reversed.

Sarah A. Lines, Appellant, vs. William Smith, Appellee. 47

Promissory note and bills of exchange are presumed to be founded on a valid and valuable consideration—but this presumption, which the law raises for the protection of negotiable paper, may be rebutted by proof to the contrary.

The statute requiring the promise to pay the debt of another to be in writing, in order to bind the party to be charged thereby, does not dispense with the consideration required by the common law to support the contract.

The sale of a slave carries with it an implied warranty of title—and it is the sale of the title which creates the liability of the purchaser, and constitutes the consideration for the promise. If the vendor had no title, there would be no consideration for the promise; and the failure of consideration, or want of title, may be set up as a defence, whether the party promising, or a third person, was the purchaser.

A mere naked promise to pay the existing debt of another is void. Such a promise must have a new, independent, or original consideration to support it.

The debt of a third person is an adequate consideration for a promise, provided the promise is in writing, and the instrument bears on its face, "value received," or some other words, which raise a presumption of legal consideration sufficient to sustain the promise, independently of the original debt.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Gadsden county, Hon. Thomas Baltzell, Judge of the Middle Circuit, presiding, rendered at the Spring term, A. D., 1850.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Judge Baker, of the Middle Circuit, sat in the place of Justice Thompson, who had been of counsel in the case in the court below.

White, for appellant, contended—

1st. That the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer of appellee to the pleas of appellant, which alleged a want and failure of consideration.

There must be an actual, valid and valuable considera-
48 tion to support a promise. Story on notes §§ 181, 187.— The defence of failure of consideration is one that may be made, and will apply to all cases where a party takes a a note, even for value, after it has been dishonored, or is over due—citing Story on Notes, § 190. The demurrer in this case admits the total want or failure of consideration, set up by the pleas.

2d. That a past transaction cannot be made good consideration, unless it is the result of a previous request—Citing Archibald's Nisi Prius, 49. Hunt v. Bates, Dyer, 272. Hayes v. Warren, 2 Strange, 933. Jones v. Williams, 5 Barnawell and Alderson, 1109. Mills vs. Wyman, 3d Pickering, 207, and other authorities.

3d. The statute requiring the promise to pay the debt of another to be in writing does not dispense with the consideration required by the common law. 1 Saunders' Reports, 211, (note 2.) Cowper, 289. 5 East, 10.

Dupont, for Appellee, insisted—

1st. That the appellant, defendant in the court below, had not any legal interest in the matter of defence.

2d. That the pleas do not sufficiently set forth the want of consideration relied on—citing the rules of court, 1st Chitty's Pleadings, 516. 1st Stephens' Nisi Prius, 932. 3d Adolphus and Ellis, 521, 522. 6th Car and Payne, 736.

3d. That the pleas are inconsistent and repugnant, and, therefore, bad on demurrer. 1st Chitty, 231. Gould on Pleading, 154, 155. 14th East, 291, and other authorities.

4th. The bare existence of a debt due by a third party, is a sufficient consideration for the making of a bill, or note. In this case, the plea is, that the note was given for the debt of another. In the case of Ridout v. Bristow, Tyrwhitt's Reports, 84, the promissory note was, "for value received by my late husband." It was objected that the note on its face negatived any consideration between the parties. The objection was overruled. See, also, Chitty on Bills, §33,

Lines vs. Smith.—Opinion of Court.

83—9th American, from 8th London edition. Chitty on Contracts, 413, 414.

SEMMES, Justice, delivered the opinion of the court.

This was an action in assumpsit, commenced at the spring term, 1849, of Gadsden Circuit Court, by respondent, against appellant, on a promissory note, in the following words:

"$300. One day after date, I promise to pay James O. "Goldwire, or bearer, three hundred dollars, for value re- "ceived, this the 12th day of January, 1849. The above "note is given in payment for a negro girl named Priscilla, "which Sarah J. Goldwire has purchased from James O. "Goldwire. SARAH LINES."

To the declaration in this case, the defendant in the court below filed twelve pleas. The first, non assumpsit, was, on motion, stricken out, and the others were demurred to. The Circuit Court sustained the demurrer, and from its judgment, this appeal is taken.

The grounds of error assigned by counsel for appellant are, the judgment of the court below sustaining the demurrer to the three last pleas, numbered on the record ten, eleven and twelve.

The first of these pleas avers that the note declared on was given in part payment for a negro slave, which James O. Goldwire, the payee, had sold to Sarah J. Goldwire, and that, at the time of said sale, the said James O. Goldwire had no right, title or interest whatever in said slave, and that shortly after said sale, John W. Goldwire, the rightful owner, took possession of her, whereby the consideration failed, &c.; and that the note was transferred after it became due. The last two are substantially the same—the twelfth alleging that the note declared on was made and delivered to James O. Goldwire, for a debt then and there before that time due and owing to the said James O. Goldwire by Sarah J. Goldwire, and that there never was any 50 consideration or value for the making and delivery of said note, or for the payment thereof, and that the same remained in the hands of the payee after it became due, &c.

All the allegations contained in these pleas, the respondent, by his demurrer, admits to be true, and the questions presented to the consideration of this court are—first, whether it is competent for the appellant, in her defence to the payment of this note, to avail herself of a want or defect of title in the vendor to this slave? and, secondly, whether the existing debt of a third person, as set forth in the pleadings, is a sufficient consideration to support the promise of the appellant? If the respondent was a bona fide holder of this note, being a negotiable instrument, it is very clear that no defence, impeaching the consideration, could be relied on, and that no equities between the original contracting parties could be inquired into. But having taken the note after dishonor, he became a purchaser with notice, and the note in his hands is subject to all the defences which might be made to it in the hands of the original payee. Story on Promissory Notes, 216.

The note declared on, like all other similar contracts, must have an actual, valid and valuable consideration to support it. If there is no consideration, it is nudum pactum; for the law of the land supplies no means, nor affords any remedy to compel the performance of an agreement made without sufficient consideration. 7 Term Reports, 350.—17 Johnson's Reports, 304. Promissory notes and bills of exchange, it is true, are presumed to be founded on a valid and valuable consideration, and for this reason, it is not requisite to establish a consideration between the original parties, or others who become, by transfer, bona fide holders; and the burden of proof rests upon the other party to prove the contrary, and rebut the presumption of validity and value which the law raises for the protection and support of negotiable paper. Story on Notes, 206

Our statute, requiring a promise to pay the debt of another 51 to be in writing, in order to bind the party to be charged thereby, does not dispense with the consideration required by the common law to support the contract. But it is contended by counsel for respondent, that the consideration of this note cannot be inquired into by appellant, because she has not such an interest in the title to the slave as would give her the right of action for a breach of warranty. This is not necessary. The sale of the slave carried with it an implied wararnty of title—it was the sale of the title which created the liability of the purchaser, and which was the sole consideration of the note. If no liability on the part of the purchaser existed, by reason of a defect or want of title in the vendor, then there was no debt, no consideration to support the promise, and no principle of law can be invoked which would deny to appellant the right of establishing the fact. If the memorandum to this note were stricken out, it is obvious the maker could plead a want or failure of consideration to any action on it; and it is equally clear, that the plaintiff could reply in confession and avoidance, that the consideration was the debt of a third party, as set forth in this memorandum. Would the appellant be estopped from asserting that there was no debt or liability at the time the promise was made? If a person undertakes to pay a certain sum to a plaintiff in execution, upon his forbearing with his debtor a certain time, can it be said he would be bound, if the creditor failed to forbear? and yet the party promising, would have no interest in the execution debt. And so, where goods are agreed to be furnished a person, upon a guaranty of a third, the guarantor is not bound, if the creditor fails to comply with his undertaking.

It may be said that these are conditions precedent; true—but that does not affect the principle; for, if the goods were actually sold, and a written guaranty executed and delivered, and the party selling had no title, and admits it, 52 and they are taken possession of by the owner, the consideration has failed, and the guaranty is void. In the case before the court, the note was made and delivered upon the fraudulent representations of the payee, the vendor of the slave; and in answer to the argument of counsel, I know of no reason why the appellant could not have recovered back the amount of this note, had she paid it voluntarily, and in ignorance of the facts.

But it is said "the legal inference is, that the appellant was indebted to the purchaser of this slave the amount of this note, and for convenience, the former executed and delivered her note to the vendor." If this were so, then the appellant was discharging her debt to the purchaser, by paying a claim for which the latter was not liable. But no such legal presumption exists; and I am aware of no authority that even intimates that it is necessary that a consideration should exist between the promissor, and the party for whose benefit the promise is made. Like all other cases of a similar character where the contract is valid, upon the guarantor's paying the money for the original debtor, he would have his right of action against the latter; and in a suit for the recovery of this advance, it would be the assertion of a novel principle, that he could be met by a legal presumption of indebtedness to a party for whose benefit he had advanced the money.

In regard to the two last pleas, it is contended by counsel for respondent, that they are contradictory, and otherwise at variance with the rules of pleading; that they allege a good and valuable consideration for the making and delivery of the note, and then deny that there ever was any consideration. If this were true, they would manifestly be bad for repugnancy, and the repugnant matter could not be rejected, without destroying the sense and effect of the pleas. See Stephens Pleadings, 420. But the latter plea, particu-

Lines vs. Smith.—Opinion of Court.

53 larly, is in strict conformity with the rules of the court, setting forth with sufficient certainty the matters relied on in defence of the action. The objection is, that the consideration as set forth is matter of inducement to the defence relied on. This may be partially true, but still it would here constitute an exception to the general rule, that a traverse cannot be taken on matters of inducement. In this case, the introductory matter is, in itself, essential, and though in the nature of inducement, might, nevertheless, have been traversed. See Stephens Pleading, 285. Neither do these pleas allege, as is contended, a good and valuable consideration; but, on the contrary, aver that the consideration of the note was the debt of a third party, then, and before that time, due and owing. And this brings us to the consideration of the second question growing out of the pleadings.

It is said this is an original undertaking on the part of appellant; and in support of this position, counsel relies on the authority in Chitty on Bills, 83, n. a., that "the engagement of each party to a bill or note, is an original undertaking for himself, and not a promise for the debt of another, although it may have the effect of discharging the debt of a third person." This is true; but it does not disturb the principle recognized by every authority without an exception, that a mere naked promise to pay the already existing debt of another, without consideration, is void. 8 Johnson's Reports, 30.

The true rule to determine whether a promise to pay the debt of another is original or collateral is—to whom is the credit given? If the whole credit is given to the person who comes in to answer for another, his undertaking is original. If a person comes in aid of another who obtains the property, so that there is a remedy against both, according to their distinct engagements, then the undertaking is collateral. 2 Term Reports, 80. 1 Salkeld, 27. And in the case of a collateral undertaking, if it is made subse-54 quent to the creation of the debt, and is not the inducement to it, the consideration of the original debt will not support the subsequent promise. See 8 Johnsons Reports, 31.

In this case, the note is given in payment and discharge of a previously existing debt of a third party; and the promise is, as counsel asserts it to be, an original one. But this, so far from avoiding the difficulty is, under the facts, conclusive against the respondent. Were it not for the demurrer, it would be but a fair, if not the only inference, that the sale of the slave, and the making and delivery of the note, constituted one transaction. In that case, the sale would have become incorporated in the promise—it would have become an essential part of the contract; and if a sufficient consideration had existed, that consideration would have sustained the promise. But the demurrer repels any such inference, and places the entire undertaking of appellant upon the sole consideration of the previously existing debt of a third party. To support such an undertaking, the previous contract of sale of the slave would not be sufficient, but a new, and independent, or original consideration, of benefit or harm, must exist between the new contracting parties. 8 Johnson's Reports, 31.

The court in the case reported in 1st Saunders' Reports, 211, say, that this principle, requiring a new consideration, extends to all cases of promises to answer for the debt of another; for it is clear, that the mere existence of the debt of a third party is not sufficient to support the promise; and in the same authority it is said, there must be a sufficient new consideration, as forbearance, &c., otherwise the promise is not binding, though reduced to writing. As where A has sold and delivered goods to B, and afterwards, C promises A in writing to pay for them, the promise is nudum pactum, because it was so at common law, and the statute makes no alteration. In the case of Waine v. Warlters, in 5 East's, 10, the promise of the defendant was not made at the time, 55 nor did it form a part of the original contract between the creditor and the third person. It was made after the debt was created, and, therefore, required a new consideration to support it.

An executed consideration will not support a promise, unless it be executed at the request of the promissor; for the obvious reason, that there is no legal consideration apparent, to support the contract. Story on Contracts, 93, 94.

The reason why a promissory note, given in fact in payment of the debt of a third person, is valid and binding on the maker, is, because—first, the consideration cannot be inquired into in the hands of an innocent holder; and, secondly, the words, value received, generally contained in these instruments, import a sufficient new consideration between the contracting parties; and bearing this in mind we can readily understand why a contract of this sort is an original undertaking on the part of the maker for himself, and not a promise for the debt of another, though the note has the effect of discharging that debt. The principle, therefore, that the debt of a third person is an adequate consideration for a promise is true, with these qualifications—that the promise must be in writing, and the instrument must bear on its face value received, or some other words, which raise a presumption of a legal consideration sufficient to sustain the promise, independently of the original debt.

The case of Eyck v. Vanderpoel, reported in 8th Johnson's Reports, 93, is directly in point. In that case, the note was for value received by third parties, and on demurrer to the declaration, the court say, that the note was for value received by a third person, being the debt of another. There was no consideration or inducement for the promise. The instrument repels any presumption of consideration from the words "value received," because it admits that the value was received by a third person. See, also, Rann v. Hughes, 56 7 Term Reports, 350.

For these reasons, the court is of opinion that the judgment of the Circuit Court, sustaining the demurrer to tenth, eleventh and twelfth pleas, was erroneous.

Let the judgment of the court below be reversed.

A. E. Gregory, Administrator de bonis non of the Estate, of J. M. Nixon, Deceased, Appellant, v. Robert Harrison, Respondent.

An administrator de bonis non cannot call to account a removed executor, and charge him with a devastavit, as to the goods and chattels of his testator which have come to his hands.

The title of an executor in the effects of his testator is derived from the will, and exists independently of the letters testamentary; and so far as it relates to money collected, and goods reduced into possession and converted cannot be divested by the revocation of the letters testamentary. The revotion of letters testamentary, and the appointment of another administrator, can only have relation to the goods not reduced into possession, and to choses in action not recovered. As to goods reduced to possession, a removed executor holds them—not as his own, but as trustee for the creditors, legatees and distributees of his testator, and to them he is accountable. The administrator of a deceased executor occupies precisely the same position, and is a trustee for the same persons, as to the goods or effects reduced to the possession of the executor.

The commission of an administrator de bonis non gives him no warrant to demand from a removed executor, or administrator, any other goods or effects than those which were the goods and chattels of the testator, or intestate, at the time of his death.

An administrator is correctly defined to be a "change, alteration or conversion" of the goods of the testator,or intestate, and by this is meant a change in the property,not a change in specie. An administrator de bonis non takes possession of the goods and chattels of the testator, or intestate, which re-

57 main in specie and unadministered. He is appointed to finish what is left unfinished, and for no other purpose.

Creditors have a right to sue the representative of a deceased executor,or a removed executor, for a debt of the original testator, without having first obtained a judgment against the executor in his life time,and heirs, legatees and distributees can assert their rights against the same persons.

This case was decided in the court below, by the Hon. THOMAS BALZELL, Judge of the Middle Circuit, sitting in and for the county of Gadsden, on the 20th of November, A. D., 1850. The demurrer of defendant to complainant's bill was sustained, and the bill dismissed, and from this decision, an appeal was taken.

The case is fully stated in the opinion delivered by the court, affirming the opinon of the court below.

The main, if not the only, question in the case presented for the decision of the court is, whether an administrator de bonis non is entitled, by virtue of his commission as such, to call a removed executor to account, and charge him with a depostavit, as to the goods and chattels of his testator which have come to his hands.

Dupont, for Appellant, argued—

That there is nothing in the English books, of a positive character, opposed to the exercise of such authority by an administrator de bonis non. That the definition given of an administration, viz: "a change, alteration, or conversion," as understood and applied by those who contend for a contrary doctrine, is not correct—for if so, then it would follow, that, in a contest between the representative of a deceased executor and the administrator de bonis non, for the possession of a security or evidence of debt, taken by the deceased executor for any demand due the estate of his testator, the possession and control of the same would not be awarded to the administrator de bonis non; and yet the contrary has been held. See 1 Barnewall and Creswell, 150.

58 The negative of this proposition which appellant contends for, would leave one class of creditors without any remedy for the recovery of their demands—as, in the case of an estate wholly administered, or converted, before they had time to establish their demands by judgment. See Judge Coalter's dissenting opinion, in 5th Randolph, 97 to 108.

A better definition of the term "'administered" is this—the faithful performance by the executor, or administrator, of the duties required of him by law." Vide Williams on Executors, 205, 207. See, also, as to the authority of an administrator de bonis non, 1 Wiliams on Executors, 362. 1 Haggard, 139.

This is not the case of an administrator de bonis non, but of a substantial adminstrator; and the reasons which apply in favor of the exercise of the right claimed in the case of the former, apply, with more cogency, to the case of an administrator of the latter character. The statute of this State provides that, "in the case of the death of any administrator, or of the revocation of his letters of administration, the Judge of Probate shall grant new letters to the person applying, &c.," (not letters de bonis non,) evidently intending to give them a relation back to the date of the original letters. Thompson's Digest, 198, 199.

As to the operation and effect of the order of the Judge, removing and dismissing the executor in this case, see 1st Florida Reports, 127. 1st Howard's Supreme Court Reports, 286. 1st Toller on Executors, 131.

If the administrator de bonis non, or the substituted administrator, has not the authority contended for, who has? The heir cannot maintain an action at law, 13 Wendell, 456; nor can he sue in equity, 4 Paige, 47, 51. 4 Littell, 264. Neither the heir nor distributee can sue, without first assuming the character of administrator.

Erskine, for Respondent. 59

An administrator de bonis non cannot bring an action at law, nor a suit in equity, for an account, against a removed executor, 1st Bacon's Abridgment, Accompt (c.) No powers are transmitted from the former executor to the administrator de bonis non, who is but the representative of the unadministered estate. Story's Equity Pleadings, sections 382, 619. 1st Kelly, 80, 2d Kelly, 428. 5th B. Monroe, 490. 5th Randolph, 51. 3d Kelly, 256.

Gregory, being merely the officer of the court of Ordinary, appointed to finish a business began by another, he is only entitled to all the property which was of Nixon, the testator at the time of his death, which remained in specie, and was not administered by Harrison, the removed executor. 4th Bacon's Abridgement, 24. 5th Randolph, 51 to 126. 1st Gill and Johnson, 270. 7th Missouri Reports, 471. 11th Alabama Reports, 872.

An executor is a trustee, but there is no trust affecting the assets themselves. The administrator de bonis non cannot follow the assets disposed of by the executor, or sue for their value, because the property vests absolutely in the executor, on the death of his testator. If it wastes it, he, or his representatives, are responsible directly to creditors, and others entitled, but not to the administrator de bonis non. 2d Williams Executors, 670, 672. 1st Howard's Mississippi Reports, 92. 8th Blackford, 168.

But it is contended that, if this doctrine be correct, then creditors, who have failed to establish their debts, are without remedy. It is answered, that an action at law may be maintained against the executor of an executor who has wasted the estate. 1st Saunders, 219, e. And since the statutes, 30th Car. 2, c 7, and 4 and 5 of William and Mary, c 24, there is no reason why an action cannot also be sustained against the administrator of an executor, who has committed a devastavit, without having first obtained judgment against the devastating executor. At any rate, a 60 removed executor or administrator is directly and personally liable, and may be fixed with the debt. 11th Viner's Abridgement, 119.

Again: it is said that the appellant is a "substituted administrator." This is true; but for what, and whose substitute is he? He is the substitute of the ordinary, to administer what is left unadministered of the estate of Nixon. This is the extent of his authority; and his letters show that he was appointed administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo, and he has, therefore, incurred the obligations, and acquired the rights of an administrator of that character. As to the authority relied on by appellant's counsel 1st Haggard, 139, it has been questioned, if not overruled, by the Supreme Court of Alabama. See 6th Alabama Reports, new series, 36. See also, 1st Howard, (Mississippi,) 89. 8th Blackford, 567. 9th Cowen, 320. 1st Richardson's South Carolina Reports, 123. 5th Johnson's Chancery Reports, 388, 409.

ANDERSON, Chief Justice, delivered the opinion of the court.

This case is brought up by an appeal from Gadsden Circuit Court.

A bill in equity was there filed by A. E. Gregory, as administrator de bonis non administratis of the estate of James M. Nixon, deceased, the purpose of which bill was to call Robert L. Harrison, former executor of Nixon, but who had been removed or dismissed from his executorship by the Probate Court, upon the complaint of some of the parties in interest, as provided for in our statutes. The bill charges a devastavit, and prays "that an account be taken, &c., and that what may be found to be due by the said defendant, be decreed to be paid by the said defendant to complainant, as administrator as aforesaid."

61 It is not necessary to state at large the several allegations of the bill, nor to refer to the exhibits, further than to say, that they exhibit amongst other matters, a large balance to be due by the removed executor to the estate of his testator, on an order for a final settlement made by the Judge of Probate for Gadsden county, on the 27th of July, 1843.

The defendant, Harrison, demurred to the complainant's bill, "denying the right of the said complainant, as such administrator of the estate of said James M. Nixon left unadministered by this defendant, to call upon and require of this defendant any account of the administration of the said estate by this defendant, in his capacity as executor of the last will and testament of the said James M. Nixon, deceased." It was the opinion of the court below, that this demurrer was good, and the bill was thereupon dismissed. It will be perceived by this statement, that a single point is presented to the consideration and decision of this court, and that is, whether an administrator de bonis non can call to account a removed executor, and charge him with a devastavit, as to the goods and chattels of his testator which have come to his hands.

It is the first time that this question has been before the appellate tribunals of this State, and it cannot be denied that it is one of some difficulty. This difficulty, however, we apprehend, grows rather out of the loose practice which has prevailed in some of the States of this country, and the consequent leaning of the courts to sustain, for the sake of expediency, a practice regulating, by long acquiescence, the settlement of numerous estates, that out of any inherent obstacle to the ascertainment and adjustment of the respective rights and liabilities of parties standing in the relation to each other occupied by those before the court.

To arrive at a proper understanding of these rights and liabilities, we propose, in the first place, to inquire whether, in any respect material to this controversy, a removed ex-62 ecutor differs from the personal representative of a deceased executor, and then to look briefly into the early law respecting the character, rights and liabilities of administrators, de bonis non, and of executors, and their personal representatives after their decease.

An executor derives his interest in the personal effects of his testator from the will itself, and the property in them vests in him, from the moment of the testator's death.

In England, with certain exceptions peculiar to that country, the Ecclesiastical Courts have exclusive jurisdiction of the probate of wills, and in this country, the Courts of Probate have succeeded to that jurisdiction. It results from the exclusive character of this jurisdiction, that an executor, though deriving his title from the title itself, cannot assert that title in any of the other courts, until he is prepared to exhibit there a proof of the will from the Spiritual Courts; in other words, he must have a probate of the will, or letters testamentary, before he can proceed effectively with the duties of his office—nevertheless, these letters testamentary are only attestations of his title, and, as a consequence of being only such, they have, when procured, relation back to the time of the testator's death. For the same reason, the executor, before probate, may do almost all the acts which are incident to his office, except only some of those which relate to suits. See 1st Williams on Executors, book 4, Chapter 1, Sections 1 and 2, and the authorities there cited. The courts of our own country, in numerous cases, recognize these positions. Johns v. Johns, 1st McCord, 132. 3d McCord, 371. 3d Massachusetts, 514.

It follows necessarily, from this view of the origin and source of an executor's title, that it exists independently of his letters testamentary; and so far as relates to money collected, and goods reduced into possession, it cannot be divested, by the revocation of the letters testamentary. It is true that our statute (Thompson's Digest, 211,) gives to the

Gregory, Administrator de bonis non, vs. Harrison.—Opinion of Court.

Judge of Probate authority to revoke letters testamentary, 63 upon grounds not known to the English Courts; but there is no authority given to divest the executor of the title which he acquired from his testator's will. The appointment of another administrator can only have relation to the goods not reduced to possession, and to choses in action not recovered.

A removed executor, then, notwithstanding the revocation of his letters testamentary, still holds his interest in the chattels reduced to possession—not as his own absolute property, but as trustee for the creditors, legatees and distribute of his testator, and to them he is accountable.

The administration of a deceased executor occupies the same position. The death of the executor is a virtual revocation of his letters testamentary from that time, though they may be used in his behalf, as evidence of his authority, for acts done during his life-time—as the removed executor may resort to his cancelled letters, to justify his antecedent acts. The administrator succeeds to the deceased executor's title in the first testator's effects, so far as they have been reduced to possession—that is to say, to his title as trustee for the creditors, legatees and distributees, and is bound to account to them just as the removed executor retains his title and obligation to account. It is not correct to say that the adminisrator de bonis non is the substitute of a removed executor—this last derived his authority from the testator's appointment, and the other from the ordinary, in virtue of the ordinary's right to take charge of the goods of a deceased person, which are not in charge of an executor of his own choice. The exercise of the ordinary's right begin where the exercise of the better right of the testator stops, or is arrested, by the removal of his appointee. By the common law, the rights of an executor and of an administrator de bonis non to the residuum of the estate were essentially different, and, therefore, the one cannot be correctly regarded as the substitute of the other—the former 64 being entitled to the residuum in his own right—the latter, as the bailiff of the ordinary, and accountable to him that the assets might be distributed, en pios usus, at the ordinary's pleasure.

Without tracing this analogy any farther, we think it very evident that, in regard to the accountability of a removed executor to an administrator de bonis non administratis, he stands on the same footing with the representative of a deceased executor, and in the further consideration of this subject, we shall so consider him.

We proceed next to inquire into the character, rights and liabilities of an administrator de bonis non administratis.

I think a very clear and accurate apprehension of these, may be derived from the terms of the warrant under which he acts. His commission gives him power to represent the testator, or intestate, so far as there remained unadministered "the goods, and chattels, and credits which were of the testator, or intestate, at the time of his death." All the difficulty and obscurity which have rested upon the extent of the power of an administrator of this character, grow out of a lack of definiteness in the import of this word unadministered. Taken alone, it is conceded that its meaning may not be precise and obvious beyond all danger of mistake, but taken in connection with the other words employed in the commission, there can be no real difficulty in fixing its precise meaning. Let us turn our attention for a moment to these other words, and for the purpose of illustration, let us advert to the facts of the case before the court.

At the time of Nixon's death, it appears, from the inventory found among the exhibits, that he was possessed of much real and personal estate, and had large and numerous debts due to him upon bonds and notes. All these, with the exception of the real estate, were strictly and truly

Gregory, Administrator de bonis non, vs. Harrison.—Opinion of Court.

65 "the goods and chattels, rights and credits, which were of the testator at the time of his death," and as such, they passed, in entire conformity with the commission of an executor, into the hands of Harrison, the defendant in this suit.

The complainant's bill alleges among other things, that Harrison rented out the real estate, and received the rent; that he hired out the negroes, and received the hire; that he collected the bonds and notes, and has not accounted for the proceeds; and it further charges, that, chiefly in consequence of unaccounted for sums of money, the defendant is indebted to the estate of Nixon, in an amount exceeding eleven thousand dollars. He demands from Harrison this sum—that is to say, the complainant, under his authority to represent Nixon, so far as there remained unadministered goods, chattels and credits, which were of Nixon at the time of his death, demands the rents and hires which have issued subsequently to Nixon's death, out of the lands and negroes left by him, and he demands the money paid to Harrison on the bonds and notes, in extinguishment of the "credits" which once belonged to Nixon. Were the rents received by Harrison, of the goods and chattels of Nixon at the time of his death? Surely not. Were the hires received on the negroes after Nixon's death, of his goods and chattels at the time of his death? Surely not. Is the money now in the hands of Harrison, arising from the collections of the bonds and notes, in any sense "of the goods and chattels, rights and credits" of Nixon at the time of his death? Again, we may reply, surely not; and if not, then the commission of the administrator de bonis non gives him no warrant to demand them.

It may be said, and has been said in the argument of this case, that, as these various sums have passed into Harrison's hands, he thereby became a debtor to the estate of Nixon, and that this debt became one of those rights and 66 credits which Gregory, the complainant, has authority to administer. In reply to this, all that is necessary to say is, that, although it may be called a debt to Nixon's estate, it certainly is not a debt which was due to him at the time of his death, and if not, it comes not within the reach of the commission of the administrator de bonis non.

These considerations establish very clearly, I think, that, to the money coming into the hands of an executor from the various sources to which we have adverted, an administrator de bonis non can assert no claim. The want of right to assert a claim to goods which have been converted by the executor, is based upon the same general principles, though, perhaps not so obviously. And this brings us to the definition of the word administered; for what has been administered has passed, without dispute, beyond the reach of the administrator de bonis non. In the case of Coleman v. McMurdo, 5th Randolph, 51, (to which we shall have occasion to refer more at large hereafter,) the word administer is defined by two of the Judges, in their opinions, to be equivalent to "alter, change, or convert," and we think these words, properly understood, may, for all necessary purposes, be regarded as a correct definition of the term. But we think these terms, change, alter and convert, have to some extent, been misapprehended, and this has led to the confusion of ideas manifest in some of the opinions referred to. Although Judge Carr speaks of "a change, or conversion of the goods," he very clearly means a change in the property of the goods. This is apparent from the very first authority which he quotes in elucidation of his definition. In 2 Peere Williams, 340, Attorney General against Hooker, Lord Chancellor King said, "As to what has been urged, that, if an executor dies intestate, all the personal estate, the property whereof is not altered, shall go to the administrator de bonis non, and not to the next of kin to the executor—this is true, &c." A change in the property of the goods is, therefore, what is meant by these learned judges, 67 as amounting to an administration—not a change in specie. This is further and strikingly illustrated in one of the cases that have been cited, where an executor collected the debt of his testator, and having kept the money separate and distinct in a bag, it was, after his death, adjudged to belong to the administrator de bonis non. In this instance, there had been a change in the goods, for a debt due had been changed into money; but, inasmuch as the property had not been changed, as was apparent, from the executor keeping the money apart and marking it as the property of his testator, there was no change, alteration, or conversion, in the technical, legal sense. That this conversion of the goods of the testator is no wrong, is evident from a consideration of the object and purposes of the executor's trust. The title of the goods vests in him, upon the death of the testator, subject to the condition of his reducing them to possession. He can give title to such alienees as purchase from him, and if he so chooses, by exercising acts of ownership over them, he may convert them to his own use; but in the former case, he is responsible for the purchase money received, and in the latter case, for the value of the goods converted; but responsible to whom?

This inquiry brings us to the consideration of the rights and liabilities of an executor. The latter of these we will first ascertain, as it will lead us to a better understanding of the former, and it will be found that the one is correspondent to, and exactly commensurate with, the other. Before the statutes of 22d and 23d Charles 2d, no executor could be called to account for the portion of the estate remaining in his hands, after the debts and legacies had been paid; but that statute, known as the statute of distributions, provided for the distribution of the fund, and gave a remedy for enforcing it, to the parties in interest. Before that time, the Ecclesiastical Courts had authority to enforce the payment of legacies, and in Lord Nottingham's time, the Court of 68
Chancery undertook to extend its aid also to legatees. Toller's Law of Executors, 489.

The debts, covenants and other contracts of the testator, the Courts of Law have provided abundant means of enforcing, (Toller, 457;) and the Court of Chancery also lends its searching and powerful sanctions in behalf of enforcing claims of this class, which are of an equitable nature. Toller, 478.

The liabilities, then, of an executor are of such a nature, that they necessarily embrace the entire fund which may come to his hands. What remains, after the claims of creditors and legatees are satisfied, goes, by a certain law, to certain specified persons. What is this fund which is thus ascertained to be the measure of the executor's liability? In the words of an elementary writer of high reputation—"all the personal estate whereof the testator died possessed, whether it consist in chattels real, or chattels personal, belongs to the executors, and are assets in their hands, "for the payment of the testator's debts and legacies." 3d Bacon's Abridgement, 57; and so of debts due to the testator, after they have been recovered by the executor. 3d Bacon's Abridgment, 58.

It results from this, that, when money has been collected by the executor out of the debts due to the testator, and when any personal estate has been sold by him, or converted to his own use, he becomes, to that extent directly liable by means of the various remedies of which we have spoken, to the several persons having claims as creditors, legatees, or distributees. To refer again, by way of illustration, to the case before us. Harrison, upon the death of Nixon, and the receipt of his letters testamentary, became responsible—first, to the creditors of his testator, then to his legatees, and, lastly, to his distributees. The measure of this responsibility is furnished by the amount of assets

69 realized by him—that is to say by the amount of the very fund which the complainant here is seeking to have made payable to him by Harrison.

This undoubted liability of Harrison must have a correspondent right, and that right can be no other than the right of being protected from the claims of a third party to this very same fund. The discharge of Harrison from his executorship does not release him any more than his death would have released his personal representative from his responsibilities to the creditors and others; and there is no principle of law, or equity, or of common justice, that will hold him at the same time, and out of the same fund, responsible to another party.

Another well established rule of the law of administration, may be called to our aid in favor of the conclusions which we have deduced, from a comparison of the respective rights and liabilities of the removed executor, and of the administrator de bonis non.

The claim which the creditor of a testator has, is not in the nature of a lien upon the goods of the testator, but is a personal claim against the executor. Mr. Justice Buller has said—"At law there is no such thing as a fund in the hands of an executor being the debtor; but the person of the executor, in respect of the assets which he has in his hands, is the debtor." And to the like effect, Lord Hardwicke has stated—"By law, undoubtedly the executor has power to dispose of and alien all the assets of the testator, and when he has done so, no creditor of the testator can, in point of law, follow those assets; for the demand is not at law a lien, or charge upon the assets, but a demand against the executor, in right of the testator, in respect of the assets and so is a personal demand." Ram's Treatise on Assets, page 494, and authorities there cited.

The claim of the creditor, then, being a personal one upon the executor, in respect to the assets which have come 70 into his hands, does not follow those assets into the hands of other parties, except that, in some excepted cases, equity will aid a creditor in doing so; but these exceptions do not disturb the conclusions derived from the general rule. The recovery, therefore, of assets by an administrator de bonis non from the removed executor, would not transfer the creditor's claim—in the words of Lord Hardwicke, just quoted, "no creditor can follow those assets;" the claim against the executor being a personal one, would survive the transfer of the assets, and in this way the law would be made the occasion of working gross injustice.

The true rule, and the consistent one, evidently is, that, for the value of the goods administered, or converted, the executor is liable only to the creditors, and those standing in like relation; for any other liability would be a cumulative, and not a substituted one, and, therefore, cannot be supposed to be contemplated by the law.

It does not interfere with any of these general conclusions, that an administrator de bonis non may take possession of the goods and chattels of the first testator, or intestate, which remain in specie, and unadministered. Though the title of the first executor attaches to them upon the testator's death, as it does to all the personal effects, that title being, en autre droit, and not personal to himself, requires that the goods be reduced to possession, before the title is consummated. The courts, both of law and equity, will lend him their aid, in thus perfecting his title; but, as we have seen, they require, before doing so, the exhibition of proof of his having established before another tribunal his authority as executor—in other words, his letters testamentary must be exhibited. These courts refuse to invade the province of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and to admit any other evidence but their's of the alleged authority, and it follows that, when the Ecclesiastical Court withdraws its testimony, when it revokes the letters testamentary, there remains no other mode by which the executor in the other 71 courts can show his right. They, therefore, refuse to hear him—his title to the personal effects not reduced to possession, cannot be consummated for want of a remedy, or rather of a forum before which to assert it. Then comes in properly and consistently with the rights and interests of all parties, that other officer of the law, known as an administrator de bonis non administratis. The effects of the first testator remaining unadministered, or unconverted, by the deceased or removed executor—being beyond the reach of administration by the representative of the deceased executor, or by the removed executor, by reason of the absence of the necessary evidence, whereby to reduce them to possession—are not suffered to be lost to the estate of the testator, but the Ecclesiastical authority appoints, in respect to them, a new administrator, and clothes him with power to possess and administer them to the extent of his authority, and no more. He is appointed to finish what is left unfinished, and for no other purpose. Let us illustrate the extent and the limitation of this latter officer's power and authority, by a reference to the successive steps he would take in using the remedy provided for him, in reducing a chattel of the original testator into possession. He finds such a chattel in the possession of a stranger, who refuses to deliver it up on demand—he sues in trover, and proves the original property of the testator, and exhibits his own letters of administration.

The defendant relies upon the title derived from the executor. If it came from the executor during his life time, or before his removal, the court will permit the defendant to exhibit the letters testamentary, as evidence of the executor's title under the testator, and the defence is complete. If the title came from the executor after his removal, or from his administrator after his decease, the court allowing no other evidence than the letters testamentary, and they, at the time of passing the title, having been cancelled 72 by the Ecclesiastical Court, or virtually cancelled by the executor's death, then there is no proof of the defendant's title, and the administrator de bonis non must recover. So, if he were to sue in assumpsit for a debt due the testator at the time of his death—if it had been paid to the executor before his removal—the letters testamentary would have been allowed as competent evidence of the executor's authority to receive, and this defence properly set up would be a bar to the action. If it had been paid to the executor after his removal, the right of the executor to receive it could not be made available, either in abatement, or in bar, not so much of the absence of title in the executor, as on account of the want of the evidence in that title—the letters testamentary having been cancelled, and the court refusing to admit any other evidence.

To apply this species of illustration to the parties now before the court. If Gregory were to sue Harrison in trover, for a chattel converted by Harrison, his right to recover would depend upon the time of the conversion by Harrison—if it were subsequent to the revocation of his letters testamentary, he, Harrison, would be without evidence of his title, and therefore, without defence—if prior, his letters would be a sufficient warning for the conversion—his inchoate title, derived from his testator, had been made consummate by conversions, and he would, necessarily, prevail against Gregory; in other words, the chattels would have been administered, and, therefore, beyond the reach of one whose authority only extended to goods unadministered. If Harrison had not yet accounted to the estate for the value of the chattel, he must owe a debt somewhere; but all that is necessary to say about it, in reference to the rights of Gregory, is, that it was not a debt due to the testator at the time of his deah.

It will be perceived, from a review of the general princi-

Gregory, Administrator de bonis non, vs. Harrison.—Opinion of Court.

73 ples of law, regulating the respective rights and liabilities of the parties of which we have spoken, and of the corresponding remedies which have been provided for the assertion of those rights, and the enforcement of those liabilities, that the entire system is harmonious and symmetrical throughout. The creditors, legatees and distributees of the testator, have a certain recourse and adequate remedies against the first executor, and the extent of this recourse is well defined; for it is exactly commensurate with the value of the effects of the testator which come to the executor's hands. These rights of the creditors and others being personal as to the executor, and not attaching to the effects themselves, are not divested by the removal of the executor from his executorship. They still remain, and although they may be curtailed in their extent, in consequence of the disability of the removed executor to proceed in collecting the uncollected debts due to the testator, and in reducing to possession the other unadministered assets, yet, to that precise extent, are the rights of the creditors and the others transferred to the new administrator. Thus these rights are co extensive with the estate—personal as to the removed exe cutor, to the extent administered by him, and personal as to the new administrator, to the extent unadministered by the former. The two responsibilities of the executor and administrator de bonis non are, in mathematical phrase, complements of each other—making, together, an entirety.

By the just and equal operation of these general rules, these two officers, representing the testator's estate successively, are protected from conflicting and contradictory claims. Each stands alike, in the relation to the creditors, legatees and distributees, of responsibility, to an extent well defined and easily ascertained, but neither is responsible to the other; for any such responsibility would mar the symmetry of the system, and introduce disorder and injustice.

74 Having thus looked into the elementary principles of the law of administration, and drawn from them certain conclusions, as to the relative rights and liabilities of the parties before the court, we will proceed to inquire how far these conclusions are sanctioned by authority.

It has been said in argument, and also in the opinions of some American Judges, to which we shall have occasion to refer, that there are no reported cases to be found in the English books, sustaining the views we have taken. This may, perhaps, be so, if express adjudications of the question are meant; but the incidental denial of the right of an administrator de bonis non to sue a representative of a deceased executor for goods converted by the executor, may be repeatedly found. The following instances are quoted from the opinion delivered by Judge Carr, in the case of Coleman v. McMurdo:

In 2d Peere-Williams, 340, Attorney General v. Hooker, Chancellor King said—"As to what has been urged, that, if an executor dies intestate, all the personal estate, the property whereof is not altered, shall go to the administrator de bonis non, and not to the next of kin of the executor—this is true, because, from the time the executor dies intestate, the first testator dies intestate also, and it was the executor's own fault that he did not, as he might, alter the property."

In Rutland v. Rutland, 2d Peere-Williams, 210, the same doctrine is explicitly laid down.

In 1st Bosanquet and Puller, 311, Tingrey v. Brown, Chief Justice Eyre and the court say—"That every thing is unadministered which has not been reduced into actual possession, and converted by the administrator."

In 1st Salkeld, 316, Chief Justice Holt, after laying down the rule, that the same hand having to pay and receive, is an extinguishment, puts this case—"If the executrix of the obligee takes the obligor to husband, that is no extinguishment, for he may pay her money as executrix, and if she 75 lay this money by itself, the administrator de bonis non of her testator (if she dies intestate) shall have that money, as well as any other goods that were the testator's; for if the goods remain in specie, they shall go to the administrator de bonis non, because, in that case, it is notorious which were the goods of the testator, and they are distinguishable; and there is the same reason where money is kept by itself, and the husband permits it so to be; but if the husband seizes it, it will be his, and will be a devastavit." The elementary writers of England concur in the distinctions thus made by the courts.

In 3d Bacon's Abridgment, page 19, the enumeration given of the property which an administrator de bonis non is entitled to, corresponds with the views we have taken of his rights. "An administrator de bonis non is entitled to all "the goods and personal estate, such as terms for years, "household goods, &c., which remain in specie, and were "not administered by the first executor or administrator— "as, also, to all debts due and owing to the testator, or in- "testate. Also, it is holden, that, if an executor receives "money, in right of the testator, and lays it up by itself, "and dies intestate, this money shall go to the administrator "de bonis non, being easily distinguished to be a part of the "testator's effects, as goods in specie. But if A dies intes- ""tate, and his son takes out administration, and receives "part of a debt, being rent arrear to the intestate, and ac- "cepts a promissory note for the residue, and then dies in- "testate, this acceptance of the note is such an alteration "of the property as vests it in the son, and, therefore, on his "death, it shall go to his administrator, and not to the ad- "ministrator de bonis non." Mr. Bacon here furnishes at once authority for, and illustrations of, the most of the positions which we have been considering at length.

The goods to go into the hands of the administrator de 76
bonis non must be in specie, and also unadministered. The two illustrations show what meaning the author gives to the word "administered." In the first, the money to the administrator de bonis non, because there is no conversion of property, though there had been a change of a debt into money. In the second illustration, there had been "an alteration of property," and it is taken as an act of administration, and, therefore, the note does not go to the administrator de bonis non. In this last instance, it will be observed, also, that the note had been in no wise applied by the administrator to the payment of his intestate's debts. The simple act of altering the property, by making it his own, was administering it, so far as the administrator de bonis non was concerned. It will be observed, also, that, in the case stated, there was a change in the character of the goods—in the first, there was no change of the property, but in the second, there was, and hence in the first, the money, being unadministered, went to the new administrator, but in the other, the money represented by the note, being administered, did not.

In Lovelass on Wills, at page 89, it is said, "All those "goods, chattels and effects, which belonged to the deceas- "ed, in action or possession, as his own, and so continued at "the time of his death, and which, after his death, the ex- "ecutor or administrator gets into his hands, as duly apper- "taining to him in right of his executorship or administra- "tion, shall be assets in the hands of the executor, to make "him chargeable to a creditor, legatee, or party in distribu- "tion, as far as such property extends." Here it will be perceived that the possession of the goods makes him chargeable. He may relinquish this possession after his removal, or his representative may do so after his death, to a new administrator, and thereby he will be discharged; but so long as he retains possession, or waste having been committed, restitution becomes impossible, he remains charge-77 able, and so does his representative; but to whom?—to creditors, legatees and parties in distribution, but not to the administrator de bonis non.

The American cases, in confirmation of the views we have presented, are numerous and decided. We proceed to refer to some of them.

The case of Coleman v. McMurdo and Prentiss, reported in 5th Randolph, 51, is precisely of the character of the one before us, so far as regards the controverted points, and the court having bestowed much labor and research on its consideration, the opinions of the Judges, delivered at great length by every member of the court, are entitled to very great respect. The courts of several other States have regarded this decision as settling the question, and to us it appears that the arguments of the majority of the court are unanswerable. The head note of that case is as follows: "An administrator de bonis non cannot sue the representative of a former executor, or administrator, either at law or in equity, for assets wasted or converted by the first executor or administrator; but such suit may be brought directly, by creditors, legatees, or distributees." The opinion of one of the Judges of the court (Coalter) was opposed to this conclusion; but I think it will be perceived from an attentive reading of his opinion, that he was influenced in a very great degree by a consideration of the inconvenience likely to arise from the decision of the court, which, it was alleged, was in conflict with the long established and uniform practice of the Inferior Courts of Virginia, and that, in view of these consequences, his reasoning was directed to conclusions not warranted by the premises. It will be proper here to remark, that Judge Coalter, in his opinion, doubts whether the statute of 30th Car., 2 explained and made perpetual by that of 4th and 5th William and Mary, affords a sufficient remedy against the personal representatives of a deceased executor, to any but judg-

78 ment creditors. If this doubt was well founded, it would certainly interefere with the reasoning by which we have endeavored to establish the respective and harmonious rights of all the parties representing and interested in a testator's estate; but we think it is not, as is shown in the opinions delivered by the other Judges.

The case of Sibley v. Williams' Executors, 3d Gill and Johnson, 52, elsewhere cited on another point, expressly affirms the right of a creditor to sue the representative of a deceased executor for a debt of the original testator, without having first obtained a judgment against the executor in his life time. The Judge, who delivered the opinion of the court, says that such a right was given to creditors by the statute of 30th Car., 2, and 4th and 5th William and Mary, and he quotes the construction given to those statutes by Sergeant Williams in his Notes on Wheatly v. Lane, 1st Saunders' 219, as authority for the opinion. To sustain his construction of the statute, Judge Coalter is forced to question this authority of Sergeant Williams. He says, "Sergeant Williams seems to intimate that it (an action) may be sustained against the executor or administrator of the executor or administrator, without a previous judgment establishing a devastavit." On reference to the note, it will be found that the learned Sergeant's intimation is expressed in very decided and unequivocal terms. Speaking of the distinction between an action against the executor in his life time upon a judgment, suggesting a devastavit by him, and one against the executor of such an executor, suggesting a devastavit by the former executor, he says: "The former action can only be brought upon a judgment previously obtained against the executor de bonis testatoris, or where he is made a party to a judgment against a testator, by scire facias; but in the other an action may be brought in every case, where the testator, in his life time, was in any way guilty of an act which amounts in law to a devastavit."

Gregory, Administrator de bonis non, vs. Harrison.—Opinion of Court.

In perfect accordance with this so called imitation of 79 Sergeant Williams, Judge Green, in the case from 5th Randolph, says: "It seems to me that the statute gives a right to all creditors, whether they had obtained judgment against the executor or administrator in his life-time, or not, to sue the representative of the executor or administrator, and to allege in the declaration the existence of the debt—that assets sufficient to pay it had come to the hands of the executor or administrator, and that he had wasted or converted them. This construction is necessary to give effect to the statutes."

But this doubt of Judge Coalter, as to the construction of these statutes, even if well founded, does not affect the particular case before us. Upon this point, there is a difference between a removed executor, like Harrison, and the representative of a deceased executor. By the principles of the common law, Harrison, though removed, would be responsible for a devastavit, and recourse need not be had to the statute to prove, by analogy, this liability. But a devastavit being a tort, died with the person, and the creditor's rights and remedies were at an end, where the executor committing a devastavit died, until continued by the statutes, and transferred as against his representative. Without the statutes, therefore, Harrison would be still liable, as are executors de son tort, and a displaced administrator, after a wrongful administration has been revoked. 11th Viner's Abridgment, 119.

In the case of Alsop v. Mathers and others, the Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut says: "The extent of the liability of an administrator de bonis non is defined by the condition of his bond—this is prospective, and restricted to estate not administered. No part of the condition of his bond creates or recognizes any privity between him and his predecessor, nor makes him responsible for any devastavit or default of another, either of omission or commission." 8th Connecticut Reports, 564.

In the case of Chamberlain, administrator de bonis non, v. 80 Bates, 2d Porter's Reports, 550, it was decided that an administrator de bonis non cannot sustain an action at law against the representative of a former administrator to recover money received by the latter, in the course of a partial administration, and not accounted for, or paid over. Delivering the opinion of the court, the Chief Justice adopts and endorses the reasoning of the court, in the case of Coleman v. McMurdo, from 5th Randolph, and affirms its judgment. In speaking of the distinction between a removed administrator, and the representative of a deceased one, he says: "The statute authorizes the Orphan's Court, where administration has been granted on insufficient security, to require other that is sufficient—also, where any administrator has embezzled, wasted, or misapplied all or any of the decedent's estate, or shall refuse or neglect to give bond, with security, as aforesaid, to forthwith revoke or repeal the letters of administration, and grant others to such persons entitled thereto, as will give the requisite bond. The subsequent administration may have action of trover, detinue, account and on the case for such goods and chattels as came to the possession of the former administrator and were withheld, wasted, embezzled, detained, or misapplied by any of them, and na satisfaction made for the same. By this, I would understand that authority is given to the new administrator immediately to institute either or all the actions mentioned, that may be the most appropriate for any misconduct, or either of the wrongs therein specified. It is justly to be inferred that the Legislature, by expressly prescribing these remedies, intended to confer on the subsequent administrator more extensive powers than by the common laws are incident to administrators de bonis non; otherwise, it would have been sufficient merely to have authorized the removel and the subsequent appointment." It thus appears that the analogy which we have attempted to show exists between the case of a removed executor, and the representatives of a deceased one, according to the principles of law, apart from any statute, is sanctioned by the opinion of the Chief Justice. 81

In Pennsylvania, it was held, in the case of Potts v. Smith, 3d Reports, 361, that "an administrator de bonis non can claim nothing but the goods of the intestate remaining in specie unconverted and unchanged at the time of the death of the original administrator." The law, as thus interpreted, was afterwards changed in that State by statute.

The Court of Appeals of Maryland, in the case of Hagthorp and others v. Hook's administrator de bonis non, 1st Gill and Johnson, 271, and in the case of Sibley v. Williams, 3d Gill and Johnson, 52, sustains the principles which we have been asserting, except so far as they are modified by the statutes of that State.

The Supreme Court of Georgia, in the case of Thomas v. Hardwick, 1st Kelly, 78, adopts fully the reasoning and conclusions of the Virginia case. Judge Lumpkin, quoting from the opinion of Judge Carr, repeats that the statute of 30th Car., 2d chapter, 7, explained and perpetuated by the 4th and 5th William and Mary, expressly declares in its preamble, that executors and administrators, for want of privity, were not before answerable, nor could be sued for debts due by the first testator, or intestate—notwithstanding such executors or administrators had wasted the estate of the first testator, or intestate, and to remedy this evil, it makes such second executors or administrators chargeable. How? To the administrator de bonis non? No. but chargeable in the same manner as the first executor or administrator should, or might have been—that is, directly to the creditors. The court decides that "an administrator de bonis non cannot call the representatives of a deceased executor or administrator to account for any property which their testator, or intestate, may have converted, or wasted." This case is the more noticeable, because the defendant was a removed executor, and the decision of the court sustained the right of a creditor to recover from him after his removal, for a debt due by the testator. 82

The Court of Appeals in Equity of South Carolina, in Smith v. Carrere, 1st Richardson, 123, fully approved the views of the court in the case of Coleman v. McMurdo.—We shall have occasion hereafter to refer to a case subsequently decided in South Carolina, in which this case is reviewed, with dissent from some of its conclusions.

The Supreme Court of the State of Indiana, in Young v. Kimball, 8th Blackford's Reports, 167, adopting the Virginia precedent, held, where an administrator having committed a devastavit, died, and his administrator was sued in Chancery by the administrator de bonis non of the first in testate for such devastavit, that the suit would not lie; and, also, that, under the statutes of 30th Car. 2d, and 4th and 5th William and Mary, and a similar statute of the State, that the administrator, thus sued, was liable for the devastavit to the creditors, &c., of the first intestate.

We think that these citations show sufficiently that the rule established in the case of Coleman v. McMurdo, (significantly enough called in argument the mother of American cases,) has met with the general approbation of the courts of the several States. The case of Villard v. Roberts, before alluded to, as seeming to dissent from Smith v. Carrere, may, to some extent, be admitted to be an exception to the general acquiescence; but the court, on that occasion, was not very decided in its dissent, and was evidently under the bias of a fear that the adoption of the Virginia decision would introduce an inconvenient change in the practice of the Probate Courts. The case is reported in 1st Strobhard, 393. The chancellor, in delivering the opinion of the court, frankly admits that the court "were more influenced by the uniform and recognized practice in our own State, than by any other consideration." "This, of itself, would be a sufficient reason, in the eye of this court, for the judgment it now delivers—for the loss and disappointment to parties who have made settlements upon faith in the prevailing usage would be incalculable, if a different rule were suddenly adopted." 83

The judgment of a court, however reputable, which thus avows that the argument of convenience is paramount with it to all other considerations, can have but little authority beyond the borders of its own State, when in conflict with the numerous other courts whose decisions have been cited, and when the same considerations of convenience are not applicable elsewhere. But besides this, though the Chancellor, in his opinion, calls in question the principles established in the cases of Coleman v. McMurdo, and Smith v. Carrere, yet the point decided by the court is in perfect harmony with those cases, as well as with the rules which we have been endeavoring to establish.

A bill was filed by persons claiming under a legatee, against the personal representatives of deceased executors of McKenzie, praying for an account, &c. The defence set up in answer was, that the defendants had settled with Chovin, the administrator de bonis non of the first testator. In reference to this defence, the Court of Errors say, in the judgment of the court—"It is ordered that it be certified to the Court of Appeals in Equity as the opinion of this court, that the account and settlement between the representatives of the executors of McKenzie, and Chovin, the administrator de bonis non of said McKenzie, pleaded as a bar to the account sought in the bill against the said representatives, is a sufficient bar thereto." This order is in perfect consistency with the principles which we have been maintaining, and is not contradictory of any of the cases cited. It will be recollected that, in an early part of this opinion, in anticipation of the very difficulty presented by this case, and, also, with a view of fixing more accurately the points involved in this question, I endeavored to give a more precise meaning to the words "alter, change and convert," than prevailed in some of the authorities cited, when they were used as defining the word administer. I said that the change, the alteration, the conversion, must be understood as applying to the property, and not to the goods themselves—that the property in goods, which themselves might remain in specie, might, nevertheless, be changed; and on the other hand, the goods might be altered in specie, and yet remain unchanged as to property. This distinction was illustrated and proved by the case of money received by an executor, in payment of a debt due to his testator, and kept by him in a bag, separate and apart, and distinguishable from his own money—it was held to belong to the administrator de bonis non, as not having been converted or changed as to property by the executor, because, by keeping it apart from his own money, he showed that he did not consider it as his own. 84

The application of this distinction to the case of Villard v. Robert, makes the judgment of the court consistent with the general conclusions at which we have arrived. The personal representative standing in the place of the deceased executor, pays over to the administrator de bonis non the assets of the first testator remaining in his hands, and by so doing, negatives the idea of a devastavit, or an intention to convert, on the part of him whom he represents. The goods may have been changed in specie, but that the property was not changed, is evidenced by the voluntary relinquishment of it by the executor, through his personal representative. When we remember that a creditor, in suing the personal representative, would have had to establish a devastavit against the executor, and that this cannot be done where the executor and his representative disprove the waste, by having always recognized the property as in the original testator, and relinquished it as such, to his new representative, we perceive that this case forms no exception to the rule, and does not conflict with the principles we have asserted.

In the case of Hagthorp v. Hooks, administrator de bonis non, heretofore cited, the chancellor says: "In a court of equity particularly, an executor or administrator, who is there considered as a trustee for the creditors, legatees and next of kin of the deceased, is expected and required to preserve the property of the deceased, apart from his own, and by itself—to give it, as is said, an ear mark, that it may be always known, and readily traced to any one into whose hands it may happen to fall; and if he does so, the court will do every thing that can be done to protect and assist him."

In the case of Villard v. Robert, the executor, and his representative after him, "had preserved the property of the deceased apart from his own," and in accordance with the equitable rule laid down by Chancellor Bland, when this separation was consummated by the delivery of the property to the new administrator by the executor's representative, "the court did every thing which could be done to protect and assist him."

It remains to advert briefly to one or two points in the ingenious argument of the counsel for the appellant, which we have not noticed in the general consideration of the elementary law upon this subject. It is alleged to be "an uncontroverted doctrine, that the administrator de bonis non may pursue and recover from the purchases any specific chattel which has been collusively disposed of by the first executor; and yet he is denied the right to recover the proceeds of this property, because it happens to be in the hands of the representative of him who participates in the fraud." No authority is quoted in support of the proposition here set forth, but we take it to be unquestionably true. The case stated supposes a fraud on the part of both parties to the purchase, and the collusive fraud vitiates the contract. It was no purchase on the part of the purchaser—no conversion or change of property on the part of the executor, and therefore no administration. It remained of the goods and chattels of the testator unadministered and undisposed of, and belonged of right to the administrator de bonis non.

Again, it is alleged by counsel that no one in the character of heir can maintain an action at law (or in equity,) for the personal estate of the testator, and, to entitle himself to sue, he must obtain "a grant of administration," and distributees are supposed to be under the same inability Again we say this is undoubtedly true, but non constat that the distributee, though disabled from suing as such for the personal estate of the testator, may not sue the proper party for a devastavit. The legal maxim asserted by counsel obviously applies to the suit of heirs or distributees for property of their ancestor in the hands of strangers, and not to their suits against executors or their representatives.

This opinion has already extended to so great a length that we shall have to pass over, without remark, some of the minor difficulties which have been suggested. We think they may all be easily removed or explained by a careful reference to the general rules which we have deduced from the law, from precedents and from authority The great importance of these rules, in the settlement of the estates of deceased persons, and the necessity of their being well defined and clearly understood, have induced us to enter into the discussion of the principles upon which they are based, more elaborately than would be necessary on subjects of less interest, and we have regarded it as especially desirable to establish, thus early, some uniform and authorized practice in reference to the administration of estates, before loose and vicious precedents become established and consecrated by long usage, and thereby tempt the courts, through consideration of convenience, to swerve from the rigid discharge of the duties of their high commission. 87

Believing, as we do, that an administrator de bonis non has no authority to call to account the representatives of a deceased executor for a devastavit, and, by parity of reasoning, that he has no authority to call to account a removed executor, we are of opinion that the order of the court below, dismissing the bill of complainant, was correct, and it is therefore affirmed.

LOWELL HOLBROOK AND JAMES T. ARCHER, ASSIGNEES, &C., APPELLANTS, vs. B. F. ALLEN, APPELLEE.

The engagement of the drawer of a bill is collateral only, and ceases entirely upon failure of the holder to present it, when due, to the person who is directly liable. If it is presented and not paid, then notice must be given to the drawer—otherwise, all privity between the payee and the drawer is at an end.

An action for money had and received will lie for money paid by mistake. The acceptance of a bill constitutes the consideration of the indebtedness of the drawer to the acceptor.

The right of a debtor, in failing circumstances, (in making a deed of assignment) to give preference to one creditor over another, is unquestionable.

This was an action brought by Allen, in the Circuit Court of the County of Leon, against Holbrook and Archer, Assignees of the mercantile firm of Lloyd & Flagg, who failed in 1849. The suit was founded on two bills of exchange drawn upon and accepted by Lloyd & Flagg, prior to their failure. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff below at the Fall Term of the Circuit Court of Leon County, in the year 1850. From this judgment defendant appealed, and the case is brought up to this Court upon the following agreed statement of facts, to-wit:

George W. Galphin, on the 18th day of March, 1848, drew his draft on the firm of Lloyd & Flagg, payable on the 21st December, 1848, in favor of one Neeley, for the sum of one hundred and sixty-seven and twenty-hundredths dollars, which was endorsed by Neeley to the plaintiff and was accepted by Lloyd & Flagg, and charged to the debit of Galphin on their books. 88

Lloyd & Flagg were the factors or merchants of Galphin, who is a planter, and were in the habit of accepting his bills and making advances to him, receiving his crops when made, and which were either purchased by them or him, or sold for his account, and proceeds of sale carried to his credit.

The bill in question was presented to Lloyd & Flagg for payment at or about the time of his maturity, but was not paid. No notice of such non-payment was given to the drawer.

On the 10th of January, 1849, the acceptors failed, and assigned their property, effects and assets to the defendants, in trust, to pay their debts according to certain priorities in the deed specified, and to which, if deemed material, reference is to be had. On the 11th January, 1849, the drawer, Galphin, sold to Lowell Holbrook, one of the assignees, the cotton which had been delivered prior to the assignment, and which was stored in the yard of Lloyd & Flagg, and the proceeds of such sale were passed to the credit of the account due Lloyd & Flagg. Galphin owed Lloyd & Flagg, at the time of the assignment, a note of $2,326 43-100, and a current open account of about $600, in which latter sum was included the amount of the draft which, on acceptance, had been charged as before stated. The cotton was insufficient to pay the entire indebtedness of Galphin, and a new note was given to the assignees for the residue.

It is further agreed, that on the 18th day of March, 1848, William M. Footman drew his draft on the firm of Lloyd & Flagg, payable on the 21st December, 1848, in favor of one

Holbrook and Archer, Assignees, vs. Allen.—Opinion of Court.

89 Neeley, for the sum of eighty-three dollars and sixty cents, which was endorsed by Neeley to the plaintiff, and was accepted by Lloyd & Flagg, and charged to the debit of Footman on their books.

The bill in question was presented to Lloyd & Flagg for payment, at or about the time of its maturity, but was not paid. No notice of non-payment was given to the drawer, according to the rules and principles of commercial law.

On the 10th January, 1849, the acceptors failed, and assigned their property, effects and assets to the defendants, in trust, to pay their debts according to certain priorities in the deed specified, and to which, if deemed material, reference is to be had. On the 11th January, 1849, the cotton which was delivered prior to the assignment, amounting to nineteen bales, was sold, and proceeds passed to the credit of Footman on the books of Lloyd & Flagg, by the defendants, assignees. Footman owed Lloyd & Flagg, at the time of the assignment, a note of $100 and an account of $100 and a debit for the amount of the draft, $83 60-100, all of which was paid by the sale of the cotton, and the residue of the proceeds of said cotton were, by agreement, passed to the credit of Edward Footman.

Judge BAKER, of the Middle Circuit, sat in the place of THOMPSON, Justice, who had been of counsel in court below.

Archer, for Appellants. Allen and Woodward, for Appellee.

ANDERSON, Chief Justice, delivered the opinion of the court, as follows:

This was an action of assumpsit, instituted in the Circuit Court for Leon county by B. F. Allen, against Holbrook and Archer, assignees of the mercantile firm of Lloyd & Flagg.

The following statement of facts was agreed upon at the trial:—

Galphin, on the 18th of March, 1848, drew upon Lloyd &
90 Flagg, in favor of one Neeley, for the sum of $167.20. The draft was payable on the 21st day of December, 1848. It was endorsed by Neeley to the plaintiff, Allen, and was accepted by Lloyd and Flagg, and duly charged to the debit of Galphin on their books. Lloyd & Flagg were the factors or merchants of Galphin, who is a planter, and were in the habit of accepting bills for him and making him advances, receiving his crops when made. These were either purchased by them or sold by them on Galphin's account, and the proceeds of the sale placed to his credit.

The bill in question was presented to the acceptors about the time of its maturity, but was not paid. No notice of this non-payment was given to the drawer.

On the 10th of January, 1849, the acceptors failed and assigned all their property to the defendants in this suit, in trust, to pay their debts according to certain priorities specified in the deed.

On the 11th of January, 1849, Galphin sold to Holbrook, one of the assigneees, the cotton which had been delivered prior to the assignment, and which was stored in the yard of Lloyd & Flagg. The proceeds of the sale were placed to the credit of Galphin on an account due by him to Lloyd & Flagg. At the time of the assignment Galphin was indebted to his factors, (Lloyd & Flagg,) by note $2,326.43, and a current open account of about $600, in which last sum was included the amount of the draft. The cotton was insufficient to pay the entire indebtedness of Galphin, and a new note was given by him to the assignees for the balance.

It was further agreed that one Footman had drawn on the same parties for $83 60, at the same time and under the same circumstances. The material facts are the same in this case as in the other, except that the proceeds of the sale of Footman's cotton exceeded the amount of his indebtedness to Lloyd & Flagg, and the excess was placed to the credit of Footman, by agreement between him and the 91 assignees.

These facts are specially set out by the plaintiff in two several declarations, and he avers that by the respective payments made to the assignees by Galphin and Footman, they, the assignees, became indebted to the plaintiff in the amount of the two bills, with interest. The declaration also contains the common money counts and, among them, the count for money had and received by the defendants, to and for the use of the plaintiff.

The defendants plead in each case non assumpsit. The Judge of the Court below was of opinion that the law was with the plaintiff, and judgment was rendered in his favor against the defendants for the sum of $278.12, with costs. From this judgment an appeal was taken to this court.

The action for money had and received is a species of equitable action very much in favor with the courts. Its principles are liberal beyond those of any other known to the law tribunals. It lies in almost all cases when a person has received money which, in equity and good conscience, he ought to refund. The want of privity is no objection to this action, for the law will imply a contract from the equity of the claim. "If the defendant," says Lord Mansfield, "be under an obligation, from the ties of natural justice, to "refund, the law implies a debt and gives this action, found-"ed in the equity of the plaintiff's case, quasi ex contractu, "as the Roman law expresses it." 2 J. Burrow, 1015.

The plaintiff, then, in the case before us, may assert his claim in the perfect confidence that the courts will afford him sufficient remedy against the defendants, if his demand against them is equitable and just.

The money which he seeks to recover is the amount paid by Galphin and Footman to the defendants, in consideration of the acceptance by Lloyd & Flagg of their respective bills of exchange, drawn in favor of Neeley and endorsed to the plaintiff.

In investigating the nature of Allen's claim to this money 92 it is necessary to consider, in connection with it, the claim which is in conflict with his. This conflicting claim is not that of Lloyd & Flagg, nor that of Galphin and Footman, nor that of the defendants to this suit. These last have no personal interest in this controversy. They represent, so far as this case is concerned, the preferred creditors of Lloyd & Flagg, and it is the justice and equity of the claim of these creditors to the fund in question that is really in conflict with the claim of Allen. The relation in which they stand to the other creditors of Lloyd & Flagg, as entitled to priority of payment, is fully sanctioned by well established principles. A debtor in failing circumstances, in making an assignment of his property, has undoubtedly a right to give preference to one creditor over another. 2 Story's Equity, 302.

To determine between the respective rights of these preferred creditors and Allen, it is necessary to refer to the circumstances under which the fund in dispute was paid to the defendants. Upon the acceptance of the two bills of exchange by Lloyd & Flagg, they became the primary debtors to Allen, and Galphin and Footman became the sureties of the debt, being only secondary liable. "As be-"tween the acceptor and the payee it is not a collateral, "but an original and direct undertaking. The payee accepts "the acceptor as his debtor, and he cannot resort to the "drawer but upon a failure of the payment of the bill.— "The engagement of the drawer, therefore, may more prop-"erly be termed collateral." 2 Wheaton, 387.

Allen became, then, with his own entire consent, the creditor of Lloyd & Flagg, though retaining for a while his right of ultimate recourse upon Galphin and Footman, as sureties for the payment of the debt. But even this relation ceased between them after the 21st of December, 1848. On that day the bills fell due but were not paid, and no no-

93 tice of non-payment was given to the drawers. There does not seem to have existed any sufficient excuse for the omission of this notice, the acceptors being the factors of the drawers and receiving the crops when made, and the effect of the omission is a very familiar principle of commercial law. When a bill is duly presented for payment on the day it is due, and it be not paid, notice must be given to the drawer; otherwise he will be discharged from all liability, not only to pay the instrument itself, but also the debt in respect to which he became a party to it. Chitty on Bills, 465.

From this period, then, all privity between Allen and the drawers of the bill was at an end. By the consent of all parties, and by the operation of well known and well settled rules, Lloyd & Flagg became the sole debtors to Allen, and Galphin and Footman were indebted to Lloyd & Flagg, and to no one else. While these parties stood in this relation to each other, the rights of the other creditors of Lloyd & Flagg intervened and became vested in the defendants, Holbrook and Archer, as trustees. These rights were regulated by the deed of assignment made on the tenth of January, 1849, and it may be inferred from the statement of facts, as it was admitted in the argument, that Allen's claim as creditor was postponed to those of others more favored. The debts of Galphin and Footman to Lloyd & Flagg were a portion of the effects of the latter, and were conveyed with the rest to the defendants to be applied for the benefit of preferred creditors. Should they not be so supplied ?—Any right that Allen might have once had to this particular fund he had voluntarily abandoned, when on the 2st of December, 1848, by omitting the notice of non-payment, he released Galphin and Footman from their obligation to him, and was content to look to Lloyd & Flagg alone for the payment of the bills they had accepted. The preferred creditors certainly had a claim which might have been en-94 forced against the assignees for the fund in question, since these had received it as a portion of the effects of the assignors, and were bound by the provisions of the deed of assignment to pay it to those creditors; and it is difficult to conceive in what respect this claim can be called inequitable. Allen had abandoned his claim to it and contented himself with retaining his claim against Lloyd & Flagg alone.

But Allen, in his declaration, alleges that this money was paid to the assignees by Galphin and Footman by mistake, and he bases his right to recover it upon that allegation.—It is true that an action for money had and received will lie for money paid by mistake. Buller v. Harrison, Cowper, 567. But in this case is there any such mistake as the law here contemplates? It may be, that when Galphin and Footman paid the money, they were under the impression that their respective bills of exchange had been paid, and that if they had been informed that such was not the case, they might in ignorance of their legal rights and obligations, have declined paying the assignees. But this was a mistake as to the law which imports nothing; and their mistake or ignorance of the facts was not material. Though they might have hesitated to pay the money due by them, its payment could have been enforced by the assignees. Therefore it is that Allen is in no wise concerned in the mistake made by them, if any was made. He could not make them pay him, and they would not have volunteered to do so, when they found that they could be compelled to pay the assignees.

The right of the assignees to enforce payment against Galphin and Footman, is derived from the nature of the contract of these last with Lloyd & Flagg. The acceptance by this firm of their drafts was the consideration for their indebtedness to him—the amount was charged to them on the books of the firm. After the 21st of December, 1848, they were released from all liability to Allen—Lloyd &

Holbrook and Archer, Assignees, vs. Allen.—Opinion of Court.

Flagg were substituted in their stead, as the sole debtors of 95
Allen, with Allen's consent, and this, as we have said, was a sufficient consideration for the debt. Chitty on Bills, 85.

Lloyd & Flagg's liability to pay Allen still exists—their bankruptcy and assignment have not relieved them from it, and no delay or omissions of notice, on the part of Allen, will release them, until, by the operation of the statute of limitations, a presumption arises that payment has been made.

We think, then, that, regarding the rights of all the parties to this transaction, true equity dictates that Allen should be confined to the position he has selected for himself, that of a general creditor of Lloyd & Flagg, and that any attempt to relieve him, would only be at the expense of the paramount equities of others.

A case reported in 1st Barbour's Supreme Court Reports, at page 468, was relied on by plaintiff's counsel, as establishing Allen's right to look to the cotton, which is mentioned in the statement of facts, as the proper fund out of which the draft which he held should be paid. In the case referred to, a draft was drawn by a consignor of cotton upon the consignee, on account of such consignment, and was discounted by a bank, upon the faith of its being paid out of the proceeds of the cotton, and was accepted by the consignee—it was held, upon the failure of the consignee, that his assignees held the cotton, as a trust fund applicable to the payment of the draft. This was a proceeding in a Court of Equity. We are at a loss to discover in what material points this case resembles the one before us, even if we disregard the difference between the tribunals.

In the New York case, the draft was discounted on the credit of the cotton, and not of the consignee. In this, the cotton, which is claimed by Allen as an equitable fund for the payment of his drafts, was not in existence, and had not probably been planted at the date of the drafts. It does not appear that the drafts were drawn in reference to any 96 particular cotton, even in embryo, nor, indeed, upon the faith of cotton at all. They may as well have been supposed to be drawn on the corn, the tobacco, or the sugar, which the drawers during the year either did, or might, have sent to their factors to be sold; and still less does it appear that Allen's drafts were to be paid out of this particular cotton, rather than the remainder of the $2,936.21 due by Galphin, and the $283.60 due by Footman. All who dealt with the firm of Lloyd & Flagg, and become their creditors during the year 1848, were entitled to the same lien upon this cotton as Allen—that is to say, the lien belonging to them as general creditors, and nothing beyond, until a change was made by the operation of the deed of assignment. All traded with them alike, upon their general credit as merchants, and not upon the faith of any specified fund for security, as in the New York case.
